WASHINGTON, Jan. 17.—This morning the Committee on the Privileges of the House examined Mr. William E. Chandler, of the National Republican Committee, at great length, regarding his connection with the canvass of the vote of Florida. A few questions were asked the witness as to certain telegrams which had been sent by him to North and South Carolina, Louisiana, and Oregon. These he answered freely and fully. As to the canvass in Florida, however, he refused to testify on the ground that he had acted while in Tallahassee as the counsel of Gov. Stearns and the other Republican candidates, and that without their consent he could not reveal anything regarding their case. In urging this, however, he stated also that he was personally not only willing but anxious to tell all he knew about the counting of the vote of Florida, and he would advise his clients to allow him to do so. Until he had received their consent, however, he would be bound by professional honor to decline answering the questions which were put by the committee. Of course, this closed his examination. After he had retired the committee held a consultation and decided to bring him before the bar of the House for contempt. They might spare themselves this trouble, however, for Mr. Chandler knows nothing and can tell nothing about the canvass of the Florida vote that will injure the Republican cause or aid Mr. Tilden and his rebel supporters.

Col. Pelton, Secretary of the National Democratic Committee, and nephew of the defeated Democratic candidate for the Presidency, was examined again to-day by Senator Morton's committee. He testified, in answer to questions, that he knew Smith Weed, of New-York, and that he was aware of the fact that the gentleman named had gone to South Carolina soon after the election. He did not know under what name he had traveled while in that State. He had received several letters from Mr. Weed, but he did not remember their contents. The Democratic Committee did not keep its correspondence. All letters received were destroyed from time to time. He had received several communications stating that his committee could buy the votes of certain Electors. The price named in one of these was $30,000. He did not remember from whom these letters come, but knew that one was from a northwestern State, not Oregon, and the other from South Carolina. Col. Pelton will be examined again on Friday.

Ex-Gov. E. D. Morgan of New-York, Richard Schell, and other Directors of the Western Union Telegraph Company, arrived here today, in answer to the subpœna of Senator Morton's committee, to produce telegrams which were sent over their wires regarding the States of South and North Carolina, Florida, Louisiana and Oregon. It is expected that they will be examined to-morrow.

PROGRESS OF THE METAMORPHOSED COMMITTEE IN DISCOVERING PRIVATE LETTERS AND TELEGRAMS—TESTIMONY OF WILLIAM E. CHANDLER—THE DIRECTORS OF THE WESTERN UNION COMPANY TO BE SUMMONED BEFORE IT.

Dispatch to the Associated Press.

WASHINGTON, Jan. 17.—The select Committee on the Rights, Powers, and Privileges of the House in counting the Electoral Vote examined to-day William E. Chandler. He testified that he was a member of the National Republican Committee and of the Executive Committee, and that he left Concord, N. H., on the afternoon of the day of the Presidential election, arriving in New-York early on the morning of Wednesday, the 8th of November. Mr. Field conducted the examination. In reply to the question whether he or any other member of the committee sent telegrams to Louisiana, Florida, North or South Carolina, the witness replied affirmatively. He had seen copies of the telegrams produced yesterday by Mr. Clancey, but did not remember any others particularly. He, however, sent telegrams early in the morning before Clancey was up. He thought he sent them substantially to the same persons heretofore mentioned in those States, but briefer. His recollection was that he telegraphed that Hayes had received 185 votes, with Florida, Louisiana, and Oregon; that the Democrats would attempt to wrest these States from the Republicans by fraud or other improper means, and requested them to be diligent in ascertaining the result, and communicate it as soon as ascertained.

Q.—Were any promises made in those telegrams of money or troops? A.—None, to my recollection. In response to the question as to the name of the two friends mentioned in his dispatch to Mr. Keogh, who had left for Raleigh, witness replied, Gen. Kilpatrick and E. C. Chapsey.

Q.—Did you give instructions to these gentlemen? A.—I think not; none to my knowledge.

Q.—Were they furnished with money? A.—Simply to pay their expenses; no more. In response to a question, the witness said that while in Tallahassee he became counsel for the Governor of Florida and other Republican candidates for Congress and Electors.

Q.—While in Florida did you receive any letters or telegrams from any member of the National Committee in which mention was made of money or troops? A.—I ought not to answer without the consent of my client, whom I will advise to give me permission to answer. The committee, after private consultation, unanimously decided that the witness must answer the question, and that there could be no privileged communications between an attorney and his clients as against a committee of the House. The witness said, as at present advised, he declined to answer the question without the consent of his clients, and he declined with all due respect to the committee.

Q.—Did you, while in Florida, send a letter or telegram to any member of the National Committee, mentioning money or troops? A.—To the same answer as above. On being further interrogated the witness said he was not certain the letter to Mr. Keogh, produced yesterday, was actually sent to that gentleman. He thought many of the telegrams were known to Hon. Z. Chandler, and to Gov. McCormick, and that he [the witness] dictated all of them. Some of the telegrams were sent after consultation with members of the committee, and others were sent on his own authority.

The committee then went into private consultation, and although no formal action was taken it seems certain that they will report the case of Mr. Chandler to the House to-morrow for its action, in order to compel him to answer or be punished for alleged contempt.

The committee have to-day directed the Sergeant at Arms to summon all the members of the Executive Committee of the Western Union Telegraph Company to appear before the committee.

The Committee, to-day, discharged Mr. Keim, the newspaper correspondent, subpœnaed to appear before them in reference to an interview he had with the President Sunday before last on the subject of the Executive power in the District of Columbia, in which the President was represented as saying that the Presidential authority, exercised in accordance with the law, is as supreme in the District of Columbia as if it were a garrisoned fortress, and any demonstration or warlike concentration of men threatening the peace of the city or endangering the security of public property or the treasure of the Government, could be summarily dealt with, should the public safety demand, by a declaration of martial law. Mr. Keim having written out an account of his interview, permitted several correspondents to make an abstract to be used in their papers, reserving the full account for the papers of which he is a correspondent. The committee, somewhat alarmed as to the purposes of the President, and unable to reach him, summoned Mr. Keim, taking his published interview as the basis of inquiry. The committee, however, were uncertain as to their authority to interrogate Mr. Keim with reference to what may have been said in a conversation with the President, and therefore discharged the witness.

DEMOCRATIC CONSISTENCY.

POSITIONS OF THE PARTY IN THE HOUSE AND SENATE ON STATE RIGHTS—THE PRINCIPLE ASSERTED OR REJECTED AS THE POLITICAL EXIGENCIES DEMAND.

Special Dispatch to the New-York Times.

WASHINGTON, Jan. 17.—In the Senate, this morning, Mr. Johnston, of Virginia, wasted nearly the entire session in denouncing President Grant for sending a corporal's guard of United States troops to Petersburg just prior to the last election. He declared, in a long and rambling speech of the ancient States rights school, that the action referred to was illegal, unconstitutional, and an unwarrantable usurpation of power in a time of peace. The President had no right to send troops into any sovereign Commonwealth, or at least he could not do so without the consent and advice of the chief magistrate of that Commonwealth. While Mr. Johnston was talking this kind of nonsense in the Senate his party friends and associates in the other House, with marked inconsistency, were declaring that the members of the Returning Board and other State officers of Louisiana had no rights which the Congress of the United States was bound to respect. The debate came up on the resolution to call the Returning Board before the House for contempt, in refusing to produce their records, and it afforded Messrs. Hoar and Kasson opportunities to make very able arguments in opposition to the wild claims of the ex-Confederates. Mr. Cox also attempted to make an argument, but only succeeded in telling a very pleasing fairy tale, which was concluded by the following laughable anti-climax: "Again, Sir, I declare that the State of Louisiana was certainly carried for the right, for law, for truth, for justice, and for Samuel J. Tilden." It may be that Mr. Cox did not intend this passage for a joke, but every one who heard it laughed. The resolution was finally passed by a strict party vote—yeas, 158; nays, 81.

THE COMMISSIONER OF PATENTS.

CONGRESSMAN MACDOUGALL DECLINES THE POSITION—THE PLACE OFFERED TO A LATE ASSISTANT COMMISSIONER.

Special Dispatch to the New-York Times.

WASHINGTON, Jan. 17.—Congressman MacDougall, of New-York, has declined the position of Commissioner of Patents, which was tendered to him by the President. The place has been offered to Mr. Ellis Spear, of Maine, late Assistant Commissioner, and it is understood that he has accepted. Mr. Spear was Assistant Commissioner of Patents for some time, and was mentioned for the Commissionership when Mr. Duell was appointed. Mr. Spear afterward resigned, and his return to the office will bring knowledge of patent law and the technicalities of the office thoroughly acquired by long experience. The appointment will be well received.

THE SENATE ELECTION COMMITTEE.

FURTHER EXAMINATION OF COL. PELTON—SMITH WEED'S MISSION AND ALIAS IN THE SOUTH—THE PRICE OF ELECTORAL VOTES.

WASHINGTON, Jan. 17.—The examination of Col. Pelton was continued before the Senate Committee on Privileges and Elections this morning.

He testified, in answer to Senator Morton, that he knows Smith Weed, of Plattsburg, N. Y.; Weed went to South Carolina after the election; don't think the Democratic National Committee suggested the mission; don't know Weed's business; don't know why he went to South Carolina, except to see a fair count; don't know under what name Weed went while in South Carolina, but has no reason to believe that he went under any other than his own; received no dispatch in December last from the President of the Charleston, Columbus and Augusta Railroad; has no knowledge of a dispatch sent to him at the National Democratic Committee, in which the question was asked whether the committee would pay $30,000 for an Electoral vote; such a question was asked, but witness does not know from what source it came; there was a letter received from one of the North-western States (not Oregon) saying that an Electoral vote could be had for money.

Mr. Morton asked witness if he had in his possession any letters from Smith Weed. Witness answered that he did not know, as most of his correspondence had been destroyed from time to time; did not remember receiving a dispatch from Smith Weed or any other person saying that the vote of a colored Elector in South Carolina could be obtained for money; thought he would remember had he received such a dispatch. At this point Col. Pelton was excused until Friday morning, when he will be further examined.

THE TERROR IN MISSISSIPPI.

TESTIMONY BEFORE THE SENATE COMMITTEE—INTIMIDATION IN MR. LYNCH'S DISTRICT.

WASHINGTON, Jan. 17.—Representative John R. Lynch, of Mississippi, was examined by Senators Mitchell and Kernan, of the Committee on Privileges and Elections, to-day, in reference to the conduct of the late election in Mississippi. He testified that in two of the counties of the Congressional District which he represents, Jefferson and Claiborne, it was not safe for a man to vote the Republican ticket at the late election, and that no efforts were made to hold Republican meetings in either of these counties during the late campaign, on account of the terrorism which prevailed there. As for the other counties in his district, the witness stated that men voted the Republican ticket, and though there was a strong pressure brought to bear by the Democrats to prevent the Republican ticket being voted, there was no intimidation, so far as the witness knew, except in the counties of Jefferson and Claiborne. Mr. Lynch will be further examined by the committee to-morrow.

THE VENEZUELA CLAIMS INVESTIGATION.

WASHINGTON, Jan. 17.—John J. Flanagan, of Jersey City, testified to-day before the Committee on Foreign Affairs in relation to a claim which he had against Venezuela growing out of the seizure of certain railway materials by the Government. He had put the claim in the hands of an attorney, but it had not been allowed; and hearing that Mr. Whiton, of New-York, was interested in certain matters before the commission, he tried to secure his services; Mr. Whiton said he had relations with the commission which would enable him to have the claim passed, but that he must have 50 per cent. of the amount allowed. Flanagan replied that his claim represented dollars and cents, and he could not pay so much. A second interview terminated the same way, and when Flanagan called a third time, with his lawyer, Mr. Woodruff, Whiton said, "It is too late; I am not settling any more claims." The claim was not allowed.

James A. Mackie, a former witness before the committee, affirmed his previous testimony, although he said that Whiton had written a letter trying to convince him that he had made mistakes, and asking him to retract his statements. In reply to a statement of Whiton that Mackie had offered him 10 per cent. of a certain claim for which he was attorney, the latter testified that the offer was made only after Whiton had demanded 50 per cent.

THE OHIO RIVER.

CINCINNATI, Jan. 17.—The river at noon stood 48 feet and 3 inches in depth, and was rising at the rate of four inches an hour. This is within a few feet of the flood of 1875. "Rat" and "Sausage" rows, immediately upon the river front, are partially submerged, and the merchants below Front street are removing goods from their cellars. Reports from up-river points show that the water is very high and rapidly rising.

MAKING NEW SENATORS.

THE FIGHT IN NEW-JERSEY.

EX-CONGRESSMAN PHELPS RISING INTO PROMINENCE—THE DEMOCRATIC CAUCUS POSTPONED TO MONDAY EVENING—YESTERDAY'S DISCLOSURES.

Special Dispatch to the New-York Times.

TRENTON, Jan. 17.—The new element in the Senatorial caucus to-day is the growing confidence of the friends of ex-Congressman William Walter Phelps as to his ultimate election to the position. They say that the prospect is brighter to-day for him than at any time during the contest. Upon what turn in the course of affairs they base their hopes they refuse to divulge, on the ground that its publicity might break his combinations. It is intimated, however, that one of the two votes assured to Vanatta, the Attorney General of the State, may be the Democratic support which he hopes to use as a lever in his efforts to secure Republican support. Mr. Phelps is one of the largest owners of stock in the Delaware, Lackawanna and Western Railroad Company, for which Vanatta is the counsel; and the consequent intimacy of their relations may have given rise to the rumor that Mr. Vanatta holds his support at the service of the ex-Congressman. The relations existing between the Attorney General and prominent candidates on the Democratic side seem, on the other hand, to forbid the supposition that he will permit his friends, if he can control them, to vote for any one else than the caucus nominee of the Democratic Party. There is some talk among the adherents of Mr. Phelps about the propriety of the Republican caucus making no nomination, or of extending to Senator Frelinghuysen a complimentary nomination, with an understanding that if Phelps secures a Democratic vote the Republicans shall vote for him. The purpose of this arrangement seems to be this: That Mr. Phelps asks Democratic support on the ground that he is an Independent, and that his chance of getting such support will be hazarded if he goes into the joint convention as the representative of the Republican Party. It is also said that in the Democratic caucus he may receive two or three votes, upon which he can count at the critical moment.

The fight between Green and McPherson for the regular Democratic nomination waxes warmer and more bitter every day. McPherson gained a victory over Green last night, which Green set off with a triumph for his own cause this morning. The House Conference Committee seem to have had full power to act finally in the selection of a day for the joint caucus. The Senate Committee were obliged to report their action to the Senate caucus held this morning. They reported that they had agreed with the House Committee to call the caucus for to-night. The Senate caucus refused to ratify the arrangement, and the caucus which the committee, at McPherson's dictation had decided to hold to-night was deferred to Monday night next, the time at which Green's friends desired it to take place. The defeat has much dampened the ardor of the McPherson men, but they are, nevertheless, whistling loudly to keep their courage up. It may be that the postponement was engineered by some third candidate in his own interest. McPherson's friends very much fear that in the interim the State-house wing may succeed in manipulating some of their pledged support, but not all of them will admit it. Some of them even have the assurance to say that the postponement was effected with their cooperation. "We do not think it wise," is their explanation, "to show our hands too soon. If we defer the caucus till the last moment, the Republicans will have no chance to manœuvre with any of our 41 members." Significant for every one is the fact that the postponement was accomplished mainly through the efforts of Gov. Bedle.

THE CONTEST IN MASSACHUSETTS.

JOINT CONVENTION OF THE STATE LEGISLATURE—TWO BALLOTS TAKEN—NO CHOICE MADE—MR. HOAR AHEAD—A COMPROMISE CANDIDATE TALKED OF.

Special Dispatch to the New-York Times.

BOSTON, Jan. 17.—Two ballots only for United States Senator were had in the joint convention by the State Legislature to-day. These showed that the order given out by the leaders of the several factions to "stick" was generally followed, and that the predicted break-up is not yet. Though the expectations of the Hoar men were not quite realized, their gain was substantial, and now their candidate leads all others. They will enter into the contest to-morrow with as strong hopes as yesterday of success. The Boutwell men hung together better than was expected, and this fact has inspired their leaders to renewed efforts to win over converts. But they apparently meet with little success, and the general feeling to-night is that the time has come to consider the availability of the several compromise candidates in waiting. Gov. Rice appears to be the favorite of the Boutwell men, but at present his name finds little favor with the Hoar party, many of whom openly assert their determination to vote with the Democrats for Bullock rather than with the Boutwell men for the Governor. While some of the leading men are expressing their opinions freely as to the sure election of this man or that, they are fully acquainted with the make-up of the Legislature, and recognize the impossibility of any clique or combination to control a majority. They frankly confess that if there should be a break the result cannot be predicted any more than that of a game of chance. The two ballots of the day are as follows. Hoar men claim a gain of 11, four of their men who voted yesterday being absent to-day:

	First Ballot.	Second Ballot.
Whole number of votes cast	276	278
Necessary to a choice	138	139
George S. Boutwell	93	93
George F. Hoar	93	95
Jonah G. Abbott	61	62
Alexander H. Rice	17	17
Julius H. Seelye	4	4
A. H. Bullock	4	4
John E. Sanford	1	1

The changes direct from Boutwell to Hoar were five. The Boutwell men and the Democrats each held secret caucuses after the adjournment. The Boutwell men considered the qualifications of different compromise candidates, but voted to stick to their candidate another day; so also did the Democrats. The latter, however, talked over compromise candidates with a good deal of animation, and one proposition to unite with the least enthusiastic Boutwell and Hear men on Devens, found some favor. Rice was also somewhat talked of, but Bullock appeared to be the man of the majority, for a final choice to-night. There is a good deal of active canvassing, the Federal official friends of Mr. Boutwell being in earnest consultation wherever found. They are evidently determined to be prepared with a compromise candidate for whom they can count a majority of votes when the time for the desertion of their leading candidate shall come.

THE ILLINOIS CONTEST.

THE STATE LEGISLATURE IN JOINT CONVENTION—BALLOTING FOR UNITED STATES SENATOR—NO CHOICE MADE.

Special Dispatch to the New-York Times.

SPRINGFIELD, Jan. 17.—Six joint ballots were taken to-day, and on each of the last three Logan had 100 votes, the full Republican strength. Palmer went as high as 89, but stopped at 88, Davis and Anderson had 7 each, the rest scattered. Logan needed only three of a majority, and he expects to-morrow to get three independents. All the parties caucused this evening, and the 100 Republicans determined to stick to Logan to-morrow. The Democrats will vote for Palmer, the Senate independents for Anderson, and the House independents for Davis. It is not probable that Anderson will concentrate votes enough to elect himself, as he bolted the party two years ago, and the Democrats say they will vote for Logan rather than see Anderson Senator. If Logan is not elected to-morrow the Democrats will probably unload Palmer and nominate Davis.

NEBRASKA.

A SECOND BALLOT FOR UNITED STATES SENATOR TAKEN—NO CHOICE MADE.

OMAHA, Jan. 17.—A second ballot was taken for United States Senator to-day, and resulted as follows: Hitchcock, 27; Savage, 25; Saunders, 15; Briggs, 12; Connell, 12; Manderson 4, and the rest scattering.

NEW-HAMPSHIRE CONVENTIONS.

THE SECOND CONGRESSIONAL DISTRICT—HON. JAMES F. BRIGGS NOMINATED BY THE REPUBLICANS.

Special Dispatch to the New-York Times.

CONCORD, Jan. 17.—The Republican Convention for the Second Congressional District, was held here to-day, and was very fully attended. Hon. James F. Briggs, of Manchester, was nominated on the first ballot. The vote was as follows: Briggs, 137; O. C. Moore, of Nashua, 45; Austin Pike, of Franklin, 24; N. G. Ordway, of Warner, 24; C. H. Burns, of Wilton, 9. The resolutions indorse the platform adopted by the Republican State Convention, and pledge the support of the party to the nominee in the approaching campaign.

Dispatch to the Associated Press.

DOVER, Jan. 17.—The Republicans of the First Congressional District to-day nominated Gilman Marston for Congress on the first ballot.

THE STATE DEMOCRATS AT CONCORD—MR. MARCY NOMINATED FOR GOVERNOR—CHAIRMAN FRINK'S ELOQUENCE—THE RESOLUTIONS.

CONCORD, Jan. 17.—The Democratic State Convention met to-day and elected J. S. H. Frink, President, and the usual Vice Presidents and Secretaries, and appointed committees. Mr. Frink, on taking the chair, said the entire Democratic Party believe they have fairly and honestly accomplished the election of Mr. Tilden as President of the United States. The attempt is being made to cheat us out of the fruits of victory. He said hundreds of Republicans concede the election of Mr. Tilden, or distrust the election of Mr. Hayes. No sooner was the battle between the two parties settled than a skirmish of office-holders commenced. Every device of party warfare, and every menace of military strength was employed to overcome the victory of the people. The trickery of the Returning Boards too well known, and legerdemain by which States were converted from Mr. Tilden to Mr. Hayes. The speaker said history records no such abuse of the electoral system; and the efforts of extreme men in the Republican Party to strike terror into the Democracy by the use of military and to incite civil war had proved futile. In our State a declaration of war had been made by a gentleman directing the duties of the Florida Returning Board, and who guides conspirators at the capital, and directs affairs in New-Hampshire. His purposes are transparent; the attempt to incite the acceptance of a challenge to battle has fallen impotent. The Democratic Party want justice, but they put far away all thought of revolution. They expect justice. They have faith in the sagacity and statesmanship of the Congressional committees, which will make apparent the right way to settle all difficulties.

An effort was made by the friends of Daniel Marcy to have him renominated for Governor by acclamation, but a ballot was insisted on and proceeded with. Daniel Marcy received 385 out of 524 votes, and his nomination was made unanimous.

Thomas J. Dinsmore was nominated for Railroad Commissioner, and after adopting resolutions the Convention adjourned.

The resolutions are substantially as follows: The first reaffirms devotion to the cardinal ideas of the perpetuity of the Union, the supremacy of the Constitution, and the equality of the States.

The second declares a firm adherence to the doctrines contained in the National Democratic platform, especially the demand for reform indorsed at the polls by a majority of 250,000.

The third—We denounce the conspiracy organized at Washington by desperate and unscrupulous men among the leaders of the Republican Party to thwart the clearly-expressed will of the people through the action of illegally-constituted and corruptly-controlled Returning Boards at the South, as revolutionary and treasonable in purpose and effect, inasmuch as it strikes at the very life of the elective franchise, which is the basis and vital principle of this Government.

The fourth denounces the use of military by President Grant in South Carolina and Louisiana.

The fifth calls upon the Representatives of both houses of Congress to unite in securing a peaceful solution of the difficulty in which the country is involved.

The sixth counsels moderation, but claims it a paramount duty to defend the Constitution even to the last resort.

The seventh calls upon all who believe in the election of Mr. Tilden to unite in demanding his inauguration.

The eighth demands the reduction of the Army. Next follow several resolutions discussing exhaustively the subjects of the appointment of Electors, the functions of Returning Boards, and the duty of Congress touching the count of the Electoral vote, and concluding: "Believing that Mr. Tilden received a majority of the whole number of Electoral votes, we pledge him our hearty and unqualified support in the full exercise of his authority, in conformity with the Constitution and laws of the land."

NOTES FROM THE CAPITAL.

WASHINGTON, Jan. 17.—Secretary Morrill was to-day before the House Committee on Expenditures in the Treasury Department, in compliance with their request to furnish information regarding the work of the Printing and Engraving Bureau. His testimony was in substance that, under the act of Congress directing him to have the work of engraving and printing revenue stamps, &c., done by the bureau, instead of by the New-York bank note companies, in case it could be done as cheaply, he had the question carefully investigated by experts, who reported that it could be done more cheaply in New-York than by the department. He therefore continued the bank note companies' contracts for preparing the revenue stamps, and brought to Washington the work of printing the national currency, in order to avoid discharging a large number of the bureau employes, this class of work being done here to equal advantage.

The following is the official statement of silver disbursed since April 18, 1876: For fractional currency redeemed, $16,008,812 60; checks and obligations, $10,680,368 78; total, $26,689,181 38.

The War Department orders that the Superintendent of the Mounted Recruiting Service send 150 recruits to Fort D. A. Russell for assignment to the Fifth Cavalry.

Volney Spalding, Josiah Sherman, and Charles C. Cattell, were to-day each appointed Revenue Storekeeper and Gauger for the Second District of Georgia; W. A. Whitsen, for the Seventh District of Indiana; George B. Thomas, for the Third District of Maryland; N. F. Davis, for the First District of Texas, and William Hoed, for the Fourteenth District of Pennsylvania.

The receipts from internal revenue to-day were $281,891 50, and from Customs $431,118 10.

The Indian bill, reported in the House to-day, appropriates $4,376,000, or $272,900 less than last year.

The new Board of Police met this afternoon at 2:30 o'clock, at Head-quarters. Messrs. W. J. Murtagh, T. F. Gatchell, T. Somerville, and George W. Cissell being present and F. Douglas absent. Major H. A. Hall, as Justice of the Peace, administered the oath to the newly-appointed members—Messrs. Gatchell, Somerville, and Cissell.

The following is a statement of the balances in the United States Treasury to-day at the hour of closing: Currency, $8,058,067; special deposit of legal tenders for the redemption of certificates of deposit, $33,805,000; coin, (including $53,159,900 in coin certificates,) $87,873,233; outstanding legal tenders, $356,055,084.

The Director of the Mint at Brussels, Belgium, has made a proposition to coin silver for the United States Government. He states that the mints of Europe are closed against silver, and the European market is in a deplorable condition. He thinks that by using his bullion houses in Brussels, Paris, and London for purchasing bullion and coinage it at his mint, great stability would be given the silver market, and the United States would thereby be able to coin the trade dollar to an extent sufficient to control India and China exchanges. He is further of the opinion that American silver mining interests would also be promoted if his proposition were accepted.

ALBANY.

A SHORT AND BUSY SITTING.

BILLS INTRODUCED—A REORGANIZATION OF THE POLICE DEPARTMENT—THE CIVIL JUSTICES AND THEIR CLERKS—EXCISE BILLS—THE GOVERNOR'S MESSAGE—BUSINESS IN THE SENATE.

From Our Own Correspondent.

ALBANY, Wednesday, Jan. 17, 1877.

The session of the Assembly this morning lasted an hour. At 12 o'clock the chamber was given up to the State Agricultural Society for their annual meeting, in accordance with a resolution passed some days ago. Under these circumstances there was no opportunity to indulge in the unlimited talk which marked the sitting yesterday, and sent two-thirds of the members to their dinners in a state of lively alarm at the prospects before them for the session. Beyond the introduction of bills, resolutions, and petitions, and the presentation of reports, there was little done, nor was there time for anything. By an oversight the report of the Commission on the Lateral Canals was not presented. A long and high-sounding petition was presented and read against the completion of the new Capitol under the revised designs of the Special Commission. It protested against the "florid style" of architecture in more florid English than the Assembly is ever treated to, except by the imaginative youth, Purdy. The Governor's Message was taken from the Committee of the Whole, on motion of Mr. Husted, and its several parts referred to appropriate committees.

Mr. Strahan introduced a bill relating to the Police Department. It provides that any vacancy occurring in the offices of Commissioner of Police by reason of death, resignation, removal, or other cause, shall be filled by the Mayor in the manner provided by law; save that it is made his duty, in making any future appointment of a Commissioner of Police, to nominate a person who upon State and national issues shall be of the same political faith and opinions as the Commissioner to whose place he succeeds, the intention being to keep the caucus after disposing of this business went into the consideration of National affairs, which was the real object of its meeting. After some discussion a series of resolutions was adopted substantially affirming the right of the Vice-President of the Senate to count the Electoral votes. These resolutions will be presented to the Senate to-morrow. They are concurrent, and after being passed by the Senate will go to the House, where they will also be adopted, thus formally placing the Legislature of the State of New-York in the attitude of affirming the Republican position on this important question.

It is stated here that a scheme is concocting among the class of gutter politicians in New-York, and which will soon make its appearance here in the shape of a bill to return to the old method of electing the Police Justices, instead of having them appointed, as now. It is not known who are the particular set of jobbers at the bottom of this scheme, and still less who the Republican member of the Assembly may be who should have so little regard for his reputation as to introduce such a measure.

A bill to abolish the Marine Court will soon be introduced in the Senate. Another and more efficient court is to be substituted, which, at one-half the cost, will do double the work now done by the Marine Court, which it could do very easily. Whether such a bill does or does not pass, it seems certain that this court will receive a much-needed overhauling.

The bill fixing the salary and bond of the Superintendent of State Prisons was favorably reported to the Senate to-day, and will soon be passed and sent to the House.

The bill in relation to the Superintendent of Public Works sticks in the Assembly Canal Committee, and will not come out probably until some time next week. There are a thousand diverse influences at work against it, all tending to the common end of thus inacting any legislation on the subject. The Assembly, however, may be depended upon to do what is right, when the bill comes before it.

THE STATE CANALS.

THE REPORT OF THE COMMISSIONERS—SEVERAL CANALS ALMOST ENTIRELY ABANDONED FOR BUSINESS PURPOSES—RECOMMENDATIONS TO THE STATE LEGISLATURE.

Special Dispatch to the New-York Times.

ALBANY, Jan. 17.—In the report of the Lateral Canal Commission, to be presented to-morrow, the Commissioners say that they find the Chenango Canal, from Utica to Binghamton, has lost all its business in the transportation of coal and lumber. The timber in the section is exhausted, and the coal is now carried by railroads which run parallel with the canal and the coal beds. The people living along the line of the canal have long abandoned it for business purposes, and in these circumstances the Commissioners recommend that the whole canal be sold. The Chemung Canal, from Watkins to Elmira, with a feeder branch from Horseheads to Corning, has also lost all its coal business, and the only business remaining to it is the lumber interest centring at Corning and Painted Post. The demand for lumber has been small of late years, and the dealers have, at the places named, about 25,000,000 feet. The Commissioners recommend that the canal be kept open for one season longer; provided it can be done under the law of 1875, which allows an expenditure of twice the income of the canal for the prior year. The Crooked Lake Canal, from Dresden, on Seneca Lake, to Penn Yan, on Crooked Lake, has no business remaining of any consequence, and may be abandoned.

The Genesee Valley Canal, from Rochester to Mill Grove, on the Allegheny River, has no business left except that of lumber. At Mill Grove there are some 30,000,000 feet of lumber, which it would not pay to send by railroad, and on this account the Commissioners recommend that the canal be kept open for one season more, under the same conditions as the Chemung Canal. The Black River Canal runs from Rome to Lyon's Falls, and thence on by Slack water navigation to Carthage. At Boonville the feeder brings in the water from the great reservoirs in the north woods. The waters from these reservoirs are an absolute necessity to the Erie, and the expense of keeping them and the feeder in repair, added to the tolls received from the canal and its contribution to the Erie, are shown to be enough to pay the cost of keeping the canal open. It is therefore recommended that this canal be continued as a permanent part of the canal system of the State. Its structures are substantial and in good condition, while those of the other four canals are greatly dilapidated. It is not recommended that the canals be sold in their entirety, but that the structures be sold to the highest bidder, and such parts of the canals as lie in cities and villages, and which have become useful to the people for hygienic, hydraulic or other purposes, be sold to such cities and villages on special terms in each case. Such portions as pass through farms should be conveyed to adjacent owners, upon a relinquishment by them of all claims for keeping up bridges and other structures.

MOVING THE AMERIQUE.

THE VESSEL STILL HIGH ON THE SANDS—SHE MAY BE FLOATED OFF WITH A HIGH TIDE.

It was expected on Tuesday evening that the steam-ship Amérique, stranded on Seabright beach, would be floated off with the first high tide, but the tide that followed was a neap or low tide, during which but slight progress was made in getting her off. One of the Coast Wrecking Company's messengers yesterday morning, on his arrival in this City, reported that she had been moved about 200 feet, or nearly half her length, along the beach, and that she had been hauled out about 30 feet at her stern. She formerly lay in a parallel position to the shore, but now lies diagonally or "quartering." The depth of sand in which the hull is embedded varies constantly with the currents washing about her. Five 18-inch cables, 200 fathoms in length, are attached at one end to the ship, and at the other to anchors, weighing 5,000 or 6,000 pounds each, cast off shore. At half-tide, these cables are tautened by steam hoisting-engines on board the Amérique. Thus 61 heavy purchases, with 20 8-inch blocks and 7-inch falls, are brought to bear upon her to lift her at high tide, the strain tending to lift her. A deep channel runs very near the ship, and in her lightened condition, with a south-easterly wind to make a sea beneath her keel, it would be a mere matter to relieve her of her imprisonment and tow her off shore. She has not yet leaked a drop, it is said, and Capt. Merritt, with his force of 100 men, and the assistance of the tug Relief, which lies alongside, will as soon as possible float her off and bring her up to this City. The perigee tides will begin next week, and even should the moment of her relief be postponed until they act in, the Wrecking Company express their entire confidence in the eventual safety of the steam-ship. The whole matter of moving her is left to the discretion of the underwriters and the Coast Wrecking Company.

A NEW YEAR'S DAY TRAGEDY.

Coroner Woltman held an inquest yesterday in the case of John McDonnell, a truck-driver, who resided at No. 2 Gansevoort street, and who died at the Chambers Street Hospital from a pistol-shot wound in the head, inflicted by James Blake, during a scuffle on New Year's Day at the corner of Dominick and Varick streets. The testimony showed that McDonnell had been carousing with some friends and was grosely intoxicated. Blake had also been making calls with some acquaintances, and was also under the influence of liquor. When they reached the corner of Dominick and Varick streets McDonnell began to quarrel with Blake, and a scuffle ensued. McDonnell fell on his knees, and Blake thereupon seized him by the lappel, and putting the pistol to his head, fired. He then endeavored to make his escape, but was arrested. A verdict against Blake was rendered, and he was committed to the Tombs to await the action of the Grand Jury. He claimed to have acted in self-defense.

COMMERCIAL FAILURES IN CANADA.

Dun, Barlow & Co.'s mercantile agency has issued a report showing that the total of commercial failures in Canada during 1876 was 1,728, being 240 less than in the preceding year, with total liabilities for 1876 amounting to $25,517,991, as against $28,843,967 in the preceding year. These failures are still exceptionally large both in number and amount, being in 1876 one failure to every 32 mercantile firms, as against one in every 69 in the United States during the same period. The report attributes the depressed condition in Canada chiefly to overtrading, and shows that after three years of depression, there is a greater number of persons in business there, in proportion to the trade to be done, than in any other country where statistics are available. The remedy suggested is a less number of traders and higher standard of credit.

NEW PUBLICATIONS.

THE ENCYCLOPÆDIA BRITANNICA. A Dictionary of Arts, Sciences, and General Literature. Vol. V. Boston: LITTLE, BROWN & Co. 1876.

The ninth edition of this veteran encyclopædia attests the demand that is felt for works containing a condensation, as far as it is possible, of the vast multiplicity of modern knowledge. In Germany a much more popular work—Brockhaus' Conversations-Lexicon—has attained its twelfth edition, but its scope is such as to make a revision a much easier affair. The Encyclopædia Britannica has always sought to afford the very best information obtainable on all subjects, and has never spared money to procure the ablest talent that England has produced, nor has it been limited as to space for subject-matter. Hence the gigantic size of the work, and hence also the sense of security one feels when turning to it for information. Unless their services are well paid, it is idle to expect men distinguished in their several departments of thought to reduce, even to the generous limits of an article of this Encyclopædia, the full amount of their knowledge on a subject. But the publishers in this case are amply supplied with funds, and from the vantage ground of former editions can easily surpass every one else in this branch of the book-trade. Where others never can beat them is in price. This Encyclopædia is exceedingly expensive, but on the other hand it is the best in the English language, perhaps in some respects better than anything of the kind in French or German.

The fifth volume is a bulky affair of 830 pages, supplied with two full-page maps: one of Cape Colony, and the other of China. Although the fifth, yet it begins with the word "Canon," treated by S. Davidson, D.D., and gets no further than "Cloves." By an unexpected delay of one of the principal articles, the volume has not made its appearance as soon as expected, but setting aside all further chances of a like nature, it must be many years before the end of the alphabet can be reached. This, together with the price, forms a drawback to the usefulness of the work in the case of persons requiring the whole range of subjects to be present at hand, such as investigators of many topics, verifiers of statements by third parties, and the miscellaneous public that needs to turn to the best authority for facts at a moment's notice. On the other hand, the man who buys each volume as it appears and actually reads it—it would be curious to know how many do—will find under the name of a dictionary an array of essays of the first merit. Is it Bret Harte who tells the story of the dictionary which went the rounds of a miners' camp and was returned to its owner with the remark that "the stories were good but rather short"? The first half of the remark applies to the Encyclopædia, but the second will hardly fit some of the articles.

Among the shorter "stories" is one by W. M. Rossetti, a poet and Englishman of Italian stock, relating the life and achievements of "Canova," to whom modern Italy points as a proof that of late centuries the art of sculpture has not entirely deserted her. Rev. Robertson Smith devotes five pages to a learned exposition of "Canticles," Prof. E. Caird has eighteen in which to treat of the philosophy of Des Cartes under the word "Cartesianism." Mr. W. C. Smith writes on "Caste," and tells many things which it would be well for those persons to read who use that word freely. Canon Venables is the appropriate essayist who deals with "Catacombs," in ten pages. This article is profusely illustrated with ground plans, interior views, and pictures of wall and ceiling decorations. Dean Merivale lends the weight of his name to two comparatively short articles, namely "Cato," and "Cicero." That on "Celtic Literature" is an example of the superiority of workmanship exhibited by the Encyclopædia Britannica. It would be strange at this day, but by no means unparalleled in the history of philosophical dictionaries, if an encyclopædia having the specific title of Britannic should have passed lightly over a subject of this kind. But Prof. Sullivan has written for it an exhaustive treatise on a most prolific topic, and one to which only the last quarter of a century has given adequate attention. He handles the literature of Celtic origin with strength and learning, and traces the influence it has exerted on the literatures of Western Europe with singular ability. He holds to the belief that England was far from obtaining that exclusively Latin cast which we readily attribute to it during the occupation of the soil by Roman legions. He infers that only the rich and polite spoke Latin, and that British or some one of the dialects of the Celtic language was spoken by the common people, who clustered around a walled town or a camp of legionaries. These latter he remarks—a point very lately accentuated by discoveries of inscriptions in the north of England, which disclose Batavian legions settled along the great wall—were by no means Latin-speaking soldiers for the most part, but rather mercenaries, hired by Romans to do the conquering and the policing of their conquests. Moreover, in regard to the Saxons and Angles, he maintains that they no more eradicated the native populations than did the Danes and Normans after them; or at least, if they were more destructive, it was in no sense like our idea of what took place. The origin of the first beginnings of Welsh literature, which still flows in Tennyson's idyls, he lays in the northern central parts of England, and explains the withdrawal of the legends and early songs first into North and then into South Wales, along with the varying fortunes of British and Welsh men of literature. In accordance with Zeuss, and many other writers on the subject, he claims for Ireland the richest and most archaic literature of any branch of the Celtic stock, thus corroborating the violent assertions and boasts of several Irish writers on the subject who flourished at the end of the last and the beginning of the present century. Like them and the deeper and graver scholars who succeeded them, he does not waste words in proving the fraud practiced by Macpherson in his pretended translation of Ossian, but merely states it to be a fact, and calls the subsequent edition of Ossian in the Gaelic dialect a clumsy patch-work of bits of the old legends, fabricated in order to still further impose on a credulous world. The extent of Celtic literature and its effect on the literary productions of neighboring peoples will surprise any one who has not specially investigated the subject. Prof. Sullivan finds 30 pages none too many for an examination of a field which has already occupied the talents of many able writers, and bids fair to absorb the efforts of an increasing circle of students.

The United States contingent to the article "Census" has been prepared by Gen. Walker. "Ceylon" forms a dignified body of statistics covering 10 pages furnished by J. F. Dickson. "Chaucer" gets a little over four pages from Mr. W. Minto, who gives his works and genius a careful investigation. He acknowledges the obligations Chaucer was under to French and Italian models, but calls attention to the individuality of his genius. One of the most imposing articles, as to learning and length, is that on "Chemistry," which embraces 120 pages. It is by a triumvirate of chemical talent, composed of Prof. Armstrong, R. Meldola, and F. H. Butler. The article on "Chicago," by J. B. Runnien, is doubtless a result of that passion which Englishmen exhibit for the great centre of the pork trade. A traveler takes Niagara as a kind of type of American natural scenery, and Chicago as a type of American civilization and progress. Three pages are devoted to statistics and descriptions of the big city. An example of unusually quick appreciation after death is found in the article on "Col. Charles Cornwallis Chesney," the writer on military subjects, lately deceased. While living his work had great weight in England, and his remarks on American military affairs were noticed in this country, but he will hardly be able to keep the rank of an authority on the art of war for many years. W. N. Potter treats of "Chess" in 10 pages, and brings the history of the game down to the latest dates. He alludes to a statement, without definitely indorsing it, that Paul Morphy, of New-Orleans, was the strongest chess-player the world has ever known. The legendary origins attributed to chess by different nations will give life to an essay on a game which has an extensive literature of its own.

"China" is discussed at great length by Prof. Douglas—some 50 pages—as befits so important a member of the universal family of nations. Ten times that space would not be sufficient to treat of that country were Western nations really better prepared to discuss its affairs. But an inaccessible tongue, and an astute policy of concealment, make European digests of Chinese internal economy of very little worth. This is an article we may expect to see great changes in during the next 20 years, if the endeavors of Western diplomatists result in anything definite. Nevertheless, the treatise is interesting in the extreme. A remarkable feature is a small index at the end of the article, giving the page on which the various persons and subjects alluded to may be found.

The dry subject of "Chronology" is handled by W. L. R. Cates, the chief feature being a catalogue of the most important events in all countries, arranged under the year in which they occurred or are reckoned to have occurred. This large table of events begins with 2234 B. C., and ends (1875) with these words: "Tennyson's Queen Mary published." It forms a useful list, intended to supersede the books of chronological tables separately published. Considering the uniform excellence of the Encyclopædia—with the exception, perhaps, of American topics—it is surprising that the volumes should lack a well-digested index at the end of each. The American Cyclopædia of the Messrs. Appleton contains indexes not only of all the subjects according to their letters, but supplies the names of subdivisions of subjects and those of persons mentioned under general headings. This greatly increases the value of the work as a book of reference.

NOTES ON BOOKS.

—A Strange Sea Story, by Mrs. Julia McNair Wright, (New-York: National Temperance Society,) is another successful tale by a well-known writer. The book claims for its foundation absolute truth, with change of locality. Without any of the tedious cant peculiar to much temperance fiction, the tale is an earnest protest against the use of intoxicating drinks, and draws a terrible picture of the evils of overindulgence. Like not a few ladies who write about sea-life, the author makes some curious mistakes. However, the work cannot fail of becoming one of the most popular temperance tales of the season.

The Complete American Trapper. By William H. Gibson. (New York: James Miller.) Mr. Gibson possesses in a superlative degree all the requisites for writing such a book as this. He has had as much varied experience as a trapper of wild animals and birds as probably any man in America, he is a good narrative writer, always clear and plain, if not brilliant; he is a fair draughtsman, and has enriched his book with pictorial illustrations of the many different kinds of traps. Those admirable sketches illustrate his text well, and add to the value of the book as a practical guide to those who follow trapping as a profession or for sport. The first portion of the book is devoted to descriptions of traps for large game; the second to snares or noose traps; the third to traps for feathered game; the fourth to miscellaneous traps; fifth, household traps; sixth, steel-traps, and the art of trapping; seventh, campaign life in the wilderness, and a chapter devoted to miscellaneous advice. The space devoted to the description of traps is necessarily large and purely technical in its nature. When the writer comes to treat on the art of trapping, his wonderful knowledge of the habits of wild animals comes into play. He has carefully avoided any reference to personal adventures, and the reader can only form an idea of the value of the advice given by taking it on trust. Mr. Gibson has in no part of his work brought himself prominently forward, and yet no one can read the book without being convinced that the writer is a trapper of great experience and shrewd observation. Even to those who may never go a-trapping wild animals, the work will prove deeply interesting.

LITERARY NOTES.

— A writer in Blackwood for January has an article on "George Sand."

—Henry S. King & Co. have become the publishers of the Contemporary Review.

—The last volume of Theodore Martin's Life of the Prince Consort will be ready in March.

—Tissot's Journey to the Country of the Milliards has run through 20 editions in France.

—M. Renan is correcting the final proofs of his fifth volume of the Origins du Christianisme.

—A biography of Marshal Prim, compiled from the family documents, is preparing at Madrid.

—Mr. H. H. Howoth has written the History of the Mongols from the Ninth to the Nineteenth Century.

—It is rumored that Roberts Brothers will publish Mr. Pierce's Life of Charles Sumner in the Spring.

—Ariadne, by "Ouida," is announced by J. B. Lippincott & Co., the publishers of her previous novels.

—Good Words for 1877 will have a series of papers by Thomas Hughes, on "The Manliness of Christ."

—Robert Buchanan has in preparation a longer and more ambitious poem than he has heretofore attempted.

—Richard Grant White will contribute papers on his recent tour through Europe to the Galaxy during the year.

—Dr. Humphrey Sandwith, C. B., contributes the article on the "Servian War" to the January British Quarterly Review.

—The first two volumes of Bishop Thirlwall's Literary Remains are already published by Baldy, Ibister & Co., London.

— E. B. de Fonblanque contributes an article on "Goethe in his Old Age" to the January issue of the New Quarterly Magazine.

—The "Contributor's Club" in the February Atlantic will have some clever satire aimed at Mr. Rossiter Johnson's "Condensed Classics."

— T. Whittaker, No. 2 Bible-house, will soon publish a series of Pleasant Talks About Temperance, which are intended to discuss this subject temperately.

— The title of Gail Hamilton's new book, to be published by William F. Gill & Co. when Moody and Sankey visit Boston, is What Think Ye of Christ?

—F. B. Patterson, No. 16 Cedar street, publishes for a well-known young Boston lawyer, a thin volume of bright society poems, aptly called Vanity Verses.

—Mr. F. W. Palfrey, at the request of the General's friends, has undertaken to prepare a biography of the late Gen. Bartlett, of Massachusetts.

—Dr. Holland's Nicholas Minturn will deal with some of the difficulties which surround the question as to the proper treatment of the mendicant classes.

—Littell's Living Age has an excellent reputation for its choice fiction, which is not diminished by a short story, "A Peasant Prometheus," in the Number for Jan. 13.

—Bryant's poem, "The Flood of Years," is to be illustrated and brought out in book form by the Putnams as a companion work to the same poet's "Among the Trees."

—John Wiley & Sons have just issued Ruskin's complete works, in 20 volumes, with all the plates and with gilt tops, in a new style, for the surprisingly low price of $40.

—The staid London Examiner is to introduce fiction into its weekly issues for 1877, and begins with William Black's Green Pastures and Piccadilly, the sequel to The Adventures of a Phaeton.

—The author of the Life of Fénelon, just published by Pott, Young & Co., has nearly ready the Spiritual Letters of Fénelon, the first volume of which will be devoted to his letters to men.

—A memoir of Thomas Bright, the prison philanthropist, compiled by his grandson, with an introduction by the Earl of Shaftsbury, has just been published by Mr. Heywood, of Manchester, England.

—Rev. Dr. Lorimer, a sensational Baptist preacher at Tremont Temple, Boston, has written a book on The Great Conflict, evidently aimed at the Roman Catholic Church, which Lee & Shepard have in press.

—Cassell, Petter & Galpin are soon to publish a collection of Historical Scenes, taken from the writings of Fuller, Carlyle, Motley, Froude, Prescott, Fraser, Tytler, Milman, Archbishop Tait, Dean Stanley, and Dr. Arnold.

—It is believed that the Commander in Chief of the German Army is the author of The Influence of Firearms upon Tactics, which has just been translated from the German by Capt. E. H. Wickham, and published in England.

—Prof. James D. Dana's Text-book of Mineralogy, an illustrated and carefully-prepared work, edited by his son, Mr. E. S. Dana, and covering the entire subject, will soon be published by John Wiley & Sons, No. 15 Astor place.

—French Pictures in English Chalk, by the author of the Member for Paris, containing imitable sketches of French politicians and their days, is a new English book which should find a publisher in this City or in Boston.

—When the Leisure Hour recently completed its twenty-fifth year, the publishers issued a general index to the back volumes similar to that which the Atlantic publishers have had prepared. The English index included nearly 15,000 references.

—The Radical Review, to be issued May 1, if circumstances shall warrant, by Benjamin R. Tucker, of New-Bedford, Mass., with all the leaders of modern free thought as contributors, is the latest proposition to sink money in a literary enterprise.

—Farjeon's Christmas story, Shadows on the Snow, had reached its eighth edition in England before Dec. 25. This recalls the good old days when we depended upon Dickens for our Christmas reading, and Farjeon is so far the only man who has taken his place in fiction.

—Winds of Doctrine is Dr. Charles Elam's title to the book made up from his essays on automatism and evolution, which were completed in the December number of the Contemporary Review, and which are written to controvert the opinions of Dr. Tyndall and Prof. Huxley.

—Six Weeks in Norway, by Mr. E. L. Anderson, is a bright and modest brochure of Summer travel in that interesting country, which Robert Clarke & Co., Cincinnati, have just published. One can obtain more information from it about Norway than is often found in a much larger volume.

—The Riverside Press, Cambridge, is rapidly becoming the head-quarters for medical literature. In addition to very recent announcements, they will soon publish a medical work on The Cure of Rupture, Reducible and Irreducible, and of Varicocele, by George Heaton, M. D.; edited by J. Henry Davenport, M. D.

—The editor of the Literary World condemns the writer of an article on Thackeray in Harper's Magazine for January, for his incapacity to write the English language, and scolds Mr. James T. Fields as the supposed offender. The article in question, however, is said to have been written by Mr. George Lunt, and Mr. Crocker has evidently lashed the wrong map.

—In England the poets have taken issue upon the Eastern question, and now one of our own poets, Dr. Oliver Wendell Holmes, in the February Atlantic steps out of his imaginary sphere into the realm of fact, and in a poem of three pages, entitled "How to Settle It," discusses the vexed Presidential question as it appeared to him at the forty-eighth annual supper of the famous Harvard Class of '29.

—Hurd & Houghton announce for immediate publication Alexander Hamilton, an Historical Study, by Hon. George Shea, Chief Justice of the Marine Court. This is a very seasonable work for the present time. The political philosophy of Alexander Hamilton has attracted the special attention of statesmen and political writers and thinkers, and several persons are already engaged upon books or essays which cover the subject.

—James Miller, No. 647 Broadway, publishes this week a work which has been eagerly expected by the lovers of bright and gossipy literature, The Letters of Elizabeth Barrett Browning to Richard Hengist Horne. Edited by Richard H. Stoddard, making a single 16mo volume, which every admirer of Mrs. Browning's poetry will be glad to own, as perhaps the only biography of this gifted woman which we are ever likely to have.

—Martineau's Hours of Thought on Sacred Things, which has just appeared from the house of Roberts Brothers, contains some of the best discourses of leading Unitarian divines in England, and is likely to attract as much attention here as in London. It is the Thomas à Kempis for those who dislike dogmatism in religion, and is intended as a sequel to his Endeavors after the Christian Life, a work which for many years has found numerous readers.

—To Scribner's Monthly belongs the credit of having discovered and brought forward a new writer of fiction, Mrs. Fanny Hodgson Burnett, the wife of a promising young Tennessee physician and oculist. She was born in England, and now resides in Knoxville. Her first story which attracted attention was "Surly Tim's Trouble." She has extraordinary dramatic power, and the faculty of touching mind and heart alike. Her serial story, "That Lass o' Lowrie's," now running through Scribner's Magazine, is the earnest of what she is able to do.

—Mr. Gladstone recently told a young Liberal in England what historical works bearing upon political questions of the present time he ought to study: "Among the books you might read with advantage are Green's Popular History of England; Hallam's Constitutional History of England; Ranke's History of England; Guizot's History of the Great Rebellion; Sir E. May's Parliamentary History of England. These works are generally free from the spirit of partisanship. But let me observe that no one can effectually study history for present purposes without also examining into the accounts of other countries and of ancient times."

—The Christian Apologist for January, published by Williams & Horgate, London, is rapidly becoming the rival of the Contemporary Review in the eminence of its contributors and the timeliness of its articles. The current number contains articles on the "Industrial Aspect of Christian Theology," by Dr. Littledale; "The First Chapter of Genesis," by Rev. George Henslow; "Tennyson's Influence on the Formation of Christian Character," by J. E. Earle; "Transubstantiation and Modern Science," unsigned; and concludes with a paper by the editor on "Infidelity and the Working Classes."

—England and France are paying their tributes to the memory of Edgar A. Poe, as a counterpart to the monument erected at Baltimore a year ago. The poet is more popular to-day than at any time during his life. M. Mallarmé is translating his poems into French, and will preface his work by an original memoir. In England, Mr. Ingram has recently published a memorial volume, which includes the reminiscences of his personal friends, and the tributes to his genius from the leading literary men of France, England, and the United States. With Mr. Widdleton's present efforts to bring out a new edition of his poems here, and to collect all which can now be known about the poet, the present generation is not likely to forget him or his writings.

GENERAL MISCELLANY.

IMPRISONED IN A CLOSET.

SUFFERINGS OF AN OLD LADY IN NEW-HAMPSHIRE — HER NARROW ESCAPE FROM DEATH.

The Boston Journal contains the following in reference to the accidental imprisonment of an elderly lady in a closet in her house in the town of Hill, N. H., on Saturday, which was briefly referred to in our telegrams: "About 4 o'clock in the afternoon, as a resident of the town was driving home from his work, through a sparsely settled district, and passing the house of one of his neighbors, he thought he heard a sound like a groan issuing from it. Apprehensive that something was wrong, he made his way through the snow to the house and gained an entrance. The rooms were very cold, and there were no signs that any one had been about since morning. In a moment he heard a faint moan, apparently coming from a dark closet near the front door. He unfastened the door of this and beheld on the floor the inanimate form of Mrs. Salom P. Sanborn, an elderly lady of feeble health. The limbs of the woman were stiff with cold, and she was unable to articulate distinctly. He carried her into the sitting-room and built a fire, and then summoned the nearest neighbor. A physician was also called, and the other members of the family sent for. After being restored to consciousness in the evening, Mrs. Sanborn related the story of her terrible sufferings during the day. She had been left alone in the morning, the head of the family being at his work, and at her request the wife going away to attend a sick neighbor. Soon after she was seized with a fainting spell and tried to walk to the door to get fresh air, but in her weakness and confusion accidentally opened the closet door, which suddenly closed, with a strong spring lock upon the outside, and she, unable to help herself, fell to the floor. This was the only part of her experience which she remembers. She had recollections, however, of a partial realization of her condition. She could hear teams passing at intervals, and she would try to make herself heard, but in her weakness she was unable to arouse any one. She heard the clock strike hourly until noon, when, convinced that she could not survive until the family returned, she gave up all hope, and unable to make any further effort for relief, awaited death in her dark prison. She said she dreamed of attempting to cut holes through to the door near the lock. An examination proved that the poor woman had, in her delirium, found a knife and cut two holes through the door, as she had related, but the opening did not enable her to push back the bolt. Her story and the discoveries made showed that the sufferings of the woman during the nine hours she was imprisoned must have been terrible. Her frozen limbs testified to the cold which she had endured, while the wounds upon her hands showed how she had struggled. Notwithstanding her age and feeble health, there is a possibility that she may recover."

SCARLET FEVER.

CIRCULAR FROM THE BOSTON BOARD OF HEALTH.

The Board of Health of Boston has caused a copy of the following circular to be sent to every householder in the city. By a previous circular physicians are directed to report at once every case of sickness from this cause:

OFFICE OF THE BOARD OF HEALTH, BOSTON, Jan. 9, 1877.

SCARLET FEVER.—The Board of Health issues the following circular of recommendation with the hope that those not familiar with the care of scarlet fever may be benefited thereby: Scarlet fever is like small-pox in its power to spread readily from person to person. It is highly contagious. The disease shows its first signs in about one week after exposure, as a general rule, and persons who escape the illness during a fortnight after exposure may feel themselves safe from attack. Scarlet fever, scarlatina, canker rash, and rash fever are names of one and the same dangerous disease. When a case of scarlet fever occurs in any family, the sick person should be placed in a room apart from the other inmates of the house, and should be nursed as far as possible by one person only. The sick chamber should be well warmed, exposed to sunlight and well aired. Its furniture should be such as will permit of cleansing without injury, and all extra articles, such as window drapery and woolen carpets, should be removed from the room during the sickness. The family should not mingle with other people. Visitors to an infected house should be warned of the presence of a dangerous disease therein, and children, especially, should not be admitted. On recovery the sick person should not mingle with the well until the roughness of the skin, due to the disease, shall have disappeared. A month is considered an average period during which isolation is needed. The clothing, before being worn or used by the patient or the nurse, should be cleansed by boiling for at least one hour, or, if that cannot be done, by free and prolonged exposure to out-door air and sunlight. The walls of the room should be dry-rubbed, and the cloths used for the purpose should be burned without previous shaking. The ceiling should be scraped and whitened; the floor should be washed with soap and water, and carbolic acid may be added to the water—one pint to three or four gallons. The infected clothing should be cleansed by itself and not sent to the laundry. In case of death from scarlet fever the funeral services should be strictly private, and the corpse should not be exposed to view. Because children are especially liable to take and spread scarlet fever, and because schools afford a free opportunity for this, the Board of Health has excluded from school every child from any family in which a case of the disease has occurred, and has decreed that the absence shall continue four weeks from the beginning of the attack, except in cases subject to the discretion of the board, and that the scholar, to be readmitted to his school-room, must have the certificate of a physician that the required time has passed. The proper blanks can be obtained at this office on application. C. E. DAVIS, Clerk.

THE INDIAN TRIBES OF MAINE.

The Augusta (Me.) Journal says: "The remnants of two Indian tribes continue the wards of the State—the Penobscot and Passamaquoddy. The past year there has been expended for the first-named tribe, $8,437 01. The census of the tribe shows the number to be 443. At the annual election, held the 1st of November, Tomer Attian was elected Governor; Saul Neptune, Lieutenant Governor, and Sabattis Jacobs, Deputy to the Legislature. A larger vote was cast than at previous elections, many participating in the election who have in former years refrained from voting, and the indications are that a much pleasanter state of political feeling prevails than for several years past. There has been less demand for labor, and consequently a lower rate of wages has prevailed among the tribe for the past year. Sales of baskets, &c., at Summer resorts, have been less in quantity and in price than in previous seasons. No prevalent diseases have raged among the tribe during the year, and their condition socially, morally, and physically, has remained about the same. The expenditures the past year for the Passamaquoddy tribe were $4,893 08. Game has become scarce, and but very few can gain their livelihood by hunting. Tribe numbers 508—260 males and 248 females. As specified in a treaty made with the different sections of the tribe, dated Feb. 28, 1852, upon the death of John Francis (then Governor of that portion of the tribe living at Pleasant Point) a vote of the whole tribe should be taken, and the majority should decide whether to elect another Governor at Pleasant Point or to be content with the one living on the Indian Township. The office having become vacant by the death of John Francis, the tribe decided to elect another Governor at Pleasant Point, and have made choice of Selmore Francis. They have also, in accordance with the provisions of the treaty, chosen Peter Selmore Lieutenant Governor at Pleasant Point."

THE BALLET IN ELMIRA.

The Elmira Advertiser thus expresses its opinion of ballet dancers, incidental to a description of a recent performance in that city: "But the ballet was the most attractive part of the entertainment, and was the best one ever given in Elmira. It it is said that our people are hardly up to the finest kind of music, how much more can it be said that they are not up to the ballet. They didn't seem to appreciate it on Saturday evening. Some most graceful and beautiful dancing was allowed to pass without a murmur, while the athletic jumps of the master of the ballet, his gymnastic runs and evolutions, were encored. Four of the principal ladies were decidedly beautiful in their dancing, and looked pretty, except for their white skirts that didn't reach to the knee. Their dresses were the only ones out of character, and out of harmony with the ballet. The remainder of the troupe wore a graceful, neat, and not immodest costume that was Assyrian, that gave their limbs freedom of action, and withal was very pretty. If there is an ungraceful and ridiculous costume for a woman, it is the usual ballet girl's dress, the white gauze skirts, that are of no possible use, either for protection or attraction. They had much better be left off entirely. A woman thus accoutred looks like a hen with all of her feathers plucked off except a rim around the centre of her body, and becomes rather an object for laughter and ridicule than for admiration."

DIRT NOT DESIRABLE.

The Worcester (Mass.) Spy says that the Boston and Albany Road made a trial, a few months since, of a recommendation of a prominent railroad man to run engines without wiping. An engine was run on the Boston and Worcester division about four months without rubbing down, and, at the end of that time, it was a sorry-looking sight. In fact the train men used to say the machine looked so bad the road was ashamed to run it in the day time, and it always ran nights until it was cleaned, since when the experiment has not been repeated.

A BOSTON WOMAN.

It is a Boston newspaper, the Sunday Herald, that tells the following: "A lady upon a Metropolitan horse car yesterday offered the conductor a $20 bill from which to take her fare of six cents. The conductor could not change it, and no passenger in the car had the necessary rags of small denomination for the purpose. The conversation growing out of the episode naturally attracted the attention of all in the car to the lady and her case. She protested that she had no money with her but the $20 bill. 'Very well, Madam,' blandly replied the conductor, 'I will pay your fare,' and the proper strip was accordingly punched. Madam turned several colors within the space of a few seconds, hesitated, looked around, and finally drew three car tickets from her pocket-book, tore off one, and rather sheepishly handed it to the conductor."

DARTMOUTH COLLEGE.

PRESIDENT SMITH'S LETTER OF RESIGNATION.

The Boston Journal prints, as follows, the letter of Rev. Asa D. Smith, D. D., resigning the Presidency of Dartmouth College, after an incumbency of 13 years:

DARTMOUTH COLLEGE, HANOVER, N. H., Dec. 21, 1876.

To the Honorable and Reverend Trustees of Dartmouth College:

By what seem to me clear indications of Divine Providence, I am now constrained to a step which I had thought of taking at a somewhat earlier date. In the year 1874—which brought me to the close of the 70th year of my life—I had in mind, in accordance with views which I had for some time entertained, the resignation of the Presidential office. I even went so far as to prepare a resignation, and bear it with me to the place of your meetings. I was induced at length, however, by dissuasives and remonstrances from a quarter which I could not but greatly respect, not to present the document, but to attempt, if my health should be continued, two or three years of further service to the college.

At the commencement of the present college year, I was particularly desirous of continuing my labors, if I might, for a twelvemonth more. There were some special matters of great importance, as you know, to be accomplished—matters which, though somewhat difficult, seemed to me feasible. As the year opened, however, I found the tone of my physical system unusually depressed. This was probably owing in part to the want of adequate rest during the Summer vacation, too much of it having been devoted, as has too often been the case, to college work. As the weeks passed on, though I continued in the discharge of my ordinary duties, the fear sprang up and gained strength that I should not be able to accomplish the work of the year. About a week before the close of the last term what had been a growing fear became a manifest certainty. I had a sudden and very severe attack of disease, which utterly prostrated me, and from which, with its complications, I have now but partially recovered. Contrary to my hope and intention, I find myself entirely unable to attend your meeting—indeed I could not attend it even if it were in Hanover. I am able to prepare this document only by the aid of an amanuensis. I am slowly recovering, but there is still a bronchial difficulty, which it will take weeks, and probably months, fully to overcome. It is clear to me that I should not have the ability to do much more for the college during its present year. I might add that relief from care and responsibility seems to me essential to the full recovery of my health; but my thoughts are chiefly of the institution. I am unwilling to remain at its head with only limited physical ability to discharge the duties devolving on me. The college needs, for general and for special reasons, a vigorous hand upon the helm. It will particularly need it for the next twelvemonth, and such a hand can doubtless be selected, without much delay, from the broad circle of our alumni. Indeed, the present season of the year, as our college appointments are, seems in several respects better suited to such a change than the close of the academical year. My duty seems to me plain; and now, in the 73d year of my life—a later period than has been reached by the official service of any of my revered predecessors—and after more than 13 years of labor—on my part arduous and fatiguing—I am sure, and I hope not without some benefit to the college—I return to your honored hands the keys of office with which you were pleased to intrust me. I resign also my seat in the Board of Trustees, both these resignations to take effect at the close of the present month.

In making the communication, I cannot forbear gratefully to recognize the indulgence and forbearance, the favorable consideration, and the uniform support which I have received at your hands ever since I began to administer, under your direction, the affairs of the college. Few college Presidents, I think, have been, in this regard, so highly favored. Especially fresh in my remembrance is that thoughtful kindness which led you, in 1869, at an informal meeting, called without any solicitation or even knowledge of mine, to insist on my taking a rest of several months for the recuperation of my seriously impaired health. That rest has added six years to my period of official service. Nor can I refrain from a word in relation to my able and excellent associates in the Faculty—a Faculty which, as a body, I verily believe, has no superior among our American colleges. Whatever prosperity has been granted us during my administration has been largely owing, I am sure, to their able, unwearying fidelity and thoroughness with which our corps of instructors have done their work. Of the sympathy and encouragement afforded me by our alumni I can hardly speak in too emphatic terms. The enthusiastic associations which have sprung up in different parts of the country, and the generous gifts to the college—amounting, in some instances, to the founding of new departments—are known and read of all men. And even in the undergraduate ranks, as they have passed before me from year to year promised to pay Graham more than the $138,700 which he claims has been paid. He asks for a dismissal of the complaint, with costs, &c. The case is still on. Fullerton, Knox & Crosby, S. P. Nash, and William Gibson appear for the plaintiff, and Edwin W. Stoughton and Joseph H. Choate represent the defendants.

ALLEGED FORGED RECORDS.

A CASE IN WHICH A DEED WAS MADE PURPORTING TO HAVE BEEN EXECUTED BY A DEAD MAN—A SYSTEM OF REAL ESTATE SWINDLING.

Additional charges have been made in a suit in the Superior Court against Francis Covert, who was arrested on Tuesday charged with having falsified the records in the Register's office, and attempting to defraud Mrs. Atwill, of Poughkeepsie, out of $25,000 worth of property. Joseph C. Levi, the attorney for the plaintiff in the Superior Court suit, recently obtained an injunction against the Register, restraining him from putting on record a deed similar to one in the Atwill case. The details were kept secret until yesterday, in order that the accused should not take the hint and escape. Mr. Levi made to a TIMES reporter the following statement in regard to the matter yesterday:

On Dec. 17, 1876, I saw in one of the morning papers that a deed had been recorded the day previous, of some lots near Central Park, which deed was apparently executed by a former client of mine whom I knew had been buried some 10 or 12 years ago. Upon examining the records in the Register's office, I found it bore date September, 1876, and purported to convey some lots formerly owned by my deceased client, but now belonging to the estate of his widow. The consideration named was $12,000, and the grantee was one James H. Stevens, who was not known as being from Bridgeport, Conn. The conveyance was the short form of warranty deed and the fee for recording it had been paid. Of course my former client having died in 1864, could not make a deed in 1876, and I was satisfied that some fraud was attempted. The deed purported to have been acknowledged before George R. Jaques, a notary public of this City. Mr. Jaques pronounced the signature not to be his, but a carefully simulated copy of his usual signature. I then sent to Bridgeport, and was informed that there is no such person there as James H. Stevens. I then applied to Judge Van Vorst in the Superior Court, Special Term, and obtained an injunction to restrain the Register from putting the deed in question on record. In the meantime a watch was kept at the Register's office for any one who might apply for the deed, or desired to search the title. A young man came to the Register's office one day and examined the records. He proved to be a clerk in the office of Charles D. Ingersoll, the United States Loan Commissioner. I put myself in communication with Mr. Ingersoll, and discovered that Francis Covert had come to Mr. Ingersoll with no old man, whom he represented to be James H. Stevens, of Bridgeport, Conn. Covert said that Stevens was the owner of certain lots and was about to sell them to him. Mr. Ingersoll drew up the contract of sale, and was proceeding to examine the title to the premises. Covert tried to borrow $500 from Mr. Ingersoll on the property, but Mr. Ingersoll had been warned in time. The fictitious deed has been canceled.

Mr. Levi said he had no doubt, from what he had learned, that there is a systematic plan of getting up fictitious deeds and obtaining loans on them. For such a purpose property is selected which has been purchased for investment, or forms part of an estate left by an intestate. A deed is made up and put on record, and thus the chain of title seems complete. A loan is then obtained on the strength of the apparent ownership in property.

UNITED STATES SUPREME COURT

WASHINGTON, Jan. 16.—The following cases were argued to-day:

No. 104—United States vs. Annie Fox et al.—Error to the Court of Appeals of New-York.—This case, because of the importance of the question involved, was new reargued by order of the court. Charles Fox, of the City of New-York, died, leaving a will which devised certain real estate on Third avenue in that City to the Government of the United States, to assist in discharging the debt contracted in "the subjugation of the rebellious Confederate States." The will was contested by his heirs, and the courts of the State held that the law of the State of New-York did not authorize such a disposition by will of real property within the State, and that, therefore, the devise was invalid, inoperative, and void. It is here maintained that this decision was against the provisions of the Federal Constitution, and that the United States could have taken under the will as Trustees for their creditors. The defendants in error contend that the question was not as to the validity of the statute, but upon its construction, and that the State Courts alone have jurisdiction, and that this court is without authority to review the judgment. The Solicitor General for the Government, James Flynn for the heirs.

No. 797.—United States vs. Clark.—Appeal from the Court of Claims.—In this case, Clark was a Paymaster in the Army, stationed in Texas, and having robbed of $15,000 by the forcible entry of his official safe, the amount was charged against him by the accounting officers of the Government. Upon his petition, showing the fact of the robbery, the conviction and punishment of the guilty parties, the Court of Claims found, as a matter of fact, that he was entitled to recover the amount. The Government here insists that the proof was insufficient, because it did not show that the funds were taken; it only showed that the safe was broken open. It is also objected that Clark's letter, written to the department after the event, if it occurred, was not proper evidence, and should not have been given the weight of conclusiveness, in conjunction with the other facts. It is further urged that, as the suit was not commenced within six years, it was barred by the Statute of Limitation. Assistant Attorney General Smith for Government; C. E. Pike for claimant.

No. 798.—United States vs. Smith.—Appeal from the Court of Claims.—This was an action to recover upon an alleged breach of a Quartermaster's contract, by the Government. There was a judgment for $5,000 for the claimant, and the Government now alleges that the court did not compel the claimant to prove his damages, but that it took the mere proof of breach of contract, the court assumed a damnification as a necessary consequence, and proceeded to determine the extent a priori. And it is insisted that the court should have exacted strict proof of the damage alleged by requiring the claimant to show what expenditures he made for work and labor, &c., which were lost in consequence of the breach of the contract. Submitted without oral argument. Assistant Attorney General Smith for Government; James Lowndes for claimant.

No. 104.—The United States, plaintiffs in error, vs. Annetor et al.—The argument of this cause was continued by James Flynn, counsel for defendants in error, and concluded by Assistant Attorney General Smith, for the plaintiffs in error.

No. 164.—The Western Wisconsin Railway Company et al., plaintiffs in error, vs. D. J. Foley, et al., and No. 165.—The Western Wisconsin Railway Company et al., plaintiffs in error, vs. D. J. Foley.—These causes were argued by W. P. Vilas, of counsel for the defendants in error; no counsel appearing for the plaintiffs in error.

No. 73.—(Assigned.)—John G. Tameling, plaintiff in error, vs. the United States Freehold and Emigration Company.—This case was commenced by John G. Tameling, of counsel for the plaintiff in error, and continued by W. M. McFarland, for the defendant in error.

SEEKING TO SET ASIDE AN ARREST.

Judge Donohue, in Supreme Court, Chambers, yesterday, ordered a reference in the case of Colman Rouse against Marx Cohn, which came up on a motion to vacate an order of arrest against the defendant. It appears that the defendant is the owner of a store at No. 116 Chatham street. The plaintiff alleges that he went to Cohn's store on Dec. 6, 1876, to see about the payment of a bill of $900 for goods furnished to the defendant. Cohn, he alleges, said he was ready to pay the amount in advance, and on the strength of this statement obtained credit from the plaintiff for $300 worth more of goods. Cohn, he alleged, then began to sell off the goods at 25 per cent. below cost, and the goods were finally seized by the Sheriff in another action. Cohn was arrested for fraud, and on the motion to vacate the order of arrest yesterday, swore that he was not in his store on the day the plaintiff says he called. Mr. Cohn says he remembers the day distinctly, because he is a "Kowan," or descendant of Aaron, and is forbidden to be in a house where a dead body lies, and a corpse was in his house on Dec. 6 last. An affidavit in opposition to this was offered by the plaintiff, and Judge Donohue, hearing the conflicting statements, remarked that "there must be perjury somewhere," and sent the matter to a Referee to hear the testimony as to the facts.

FORGING PETER COOPER'S NAME.

A man who represented himself as the Captain of the schooner Mary Foster, which, he said, was lying at Pier No. 22 East River, yesterday, called at the ship chandlery of Charles H. Pratt, No. 24 Boring slip, and bought ropes and shipstores to the amount of $110. In payment he presented a check for $150, purporting to have been drawn by Peter Cooper. Before paying the difference, Mr. Pratt became suspicious, and told him to call again for the change. A porter was then sent to Pier No. 22 to learn whether a vessel named Mary Foster was lying there, and he returned to report that there was no such a vessel just as the "Captain" called for his change. Mr. Pratt kept the man engaged in conversation until an officer could be called. As Officer O'Donnell entered the store, the man crammed the check in his mouth and chewed it to pieces. On being arraigned at the TOMBS he denied all knowledge of the check, but was held in $5,000 bail to answer.

COURT OF APPEALS.

ALBANY, Jan. 17.—In the Court of Appeals to-day the following cases were argued: No. 138—Bonnell vs. Griswold. No. 139—Blake vs. Griswold.—Argued by A. Pond for appellant, and William C. Holbrook for respondent. No. 53—Curtis vs. Gokey—Argued by George Bradley for appellant, and George I. Spencer for respondent. No. 115—Cleveland vs. The New-Jersey Steam-boat Company.—Argued by W. P. Prentice for appellant, and D. C. Stoddard for respondent.

The day calendar for Thursday, Jan. 18, is as follows: Nos. 130, 125, 126, 61, 85, 145, 169, and 150.

COURT NOTES.

The case of Mansbach against the Metropolitan Life Insurance Company, already reported in THE TIMES, was argued before Judge Donohue in Supreme Court, Chambers, yesterday. The court took the papers reserving its decision. The action is to restrain the defendants from canceling a policy.

James Ryan, of No. 320 East Twenty-sixth street, attacked and robbed Katie Bradley of a locket and chain, valued at $85, on Tuesday last, while she was walking on Third avenue, near Forty-first street. Justice Bixby, at the Fifty-seventh Street Police Court, yesterday held the prisoner in $2,000 bail to answer.

John Fleming, of No. 507 Eighteenth street, Brooklyn, was yesterday arraigned before Justice Bixby, at the Fifty-seventh street Police Court, on the charge of stealing a horse from Frederick Knifalt, of No. 18 Pearl street. The horse was valued at $150, and Fleming was arrested while trying to dispose of him at the Seventy-fourth Street Horse Market. The prisoner was held for trial.

Pasquale Jaketi was convicted in the Special Sessions recently of the offense of keeping a disorderly house. His counsel obtained a certiorari to carry the case to the Supreme Court, General Term, and applied to Judge Donohue, in Supreme Court, Chambers, for a writ of habeas corpus, in order to have Jaketi released on bail pending the certiorari. Yesterday was the return day of the writ, and Judge Donohue dismissed it, remanding the prisoner.

Of four decisions handed down by the Court of Appeals yesterday, the City wins three. The most important of these are the petitions of Rhinelander and Zobrowski to vacate sewer assessments, on the ground that the Common Council never passed any ordinance regulating the building of the sewer. The Court of Appeals sustains the assessment. The decision covers not only the cases before the court but also more than 200 others now actually pending in the Supreme Court.

A sealed verdict was ordered by Judge Van Brunt, in Part II. of the Supreme Court, yesterday, in the case of Norman Peek and Louis F. Martin against Herman Von Keller. According to the complaint, the defendant brought to the plaintiff a number of promissory notes, aggregating $15,200 in amount, made by Griffith & Prentiss, for sale. The plaintiffs advanced $10,000 on the notes, and collected only $4,834 18. They sued for the remainder of the advances, and the only question is whether the plaintiffs made the advances on the defendant's responsibility or on that of Griffith & Prentiss.

Judge Van Brunt, in Part II. of the Supreme Court, yesterday dismissed the complaint in the case of Andrew Hieland against the Forty-second Street and Grand Street Ferry Railroad Company. The plaintiff's boy, it appeared, was run over by one of the defendants' cars, and was so severely injured that he died shortly afterward. The plaintiff brought the action to recover his expenses in paying for medical services and for burying his child. His complaint was dismissed because the plaintiff's special loss and damage accruing by the company's negligence were not specifically stated.

THE PARK COMMISSIONERS.

At the regular weekly meeting of the Park Commissioners yesterday, charges were presented by a citizen against Edward Kelly, a gatekeeper, for improper conduct, and upon investigation the latter was dismissed from the department. A report was received announcing that the Central Bridge, formerly known as McComb's Dam Bridge, was in an unsafe condition, and that the short spans were in a bad state. The engineer of the bridge was instructed to close it if it was found to be in a dangerous condition, and a communication was sent to the Board of Estimate and Apportionment requesting an appropriation of funds sufficient to place the structure in thorough repair. The specifications presented by the superintending architect for laying tiling on the floor of the Museum of Natural History were approved, and bids for the execution of the work will be called for at an early date. The New-York and New-Jersey Globe Gas-light Company was authorized to light the lamps in the Battery Park—186 in number—during the months of February and March. This company proposes to light the Park at the rate of $25 each lamp, cheaper than the City now pays for lighting the street-lamps, and 50 cents per lamp cheaper than the Department of Parks now pays.

ALLEGED VIOLATION OF REVENUE LAWS.

Some time ago the firm of William S. & Charles N. Miller, liquor dealers, were indicted by the United States Grand Jury for violation of the Revenue laws. It seems that the firm failed to enter upon their books a consignment of whisky received from the West until it had been sold. Last Monday the case came up for trial before Judge Benedict, in the United States Circuit Court, and was considered yesterday, the jury finding the defendants guilty. It being a technical violation of law only, the Judge discharged the prisoners on their own recognizance.

FORTY-FOURTH CONGRESS.

SECOND SESSION.....Jan. 17.

SUMMARY OF THE DAY'S PROCEEDINGS.

In the Senate the debate on the Message of the President in relation to the stationing of 24 soldiers in Petersburg, Va., during the election, was resumed, and Mr. Morton and others replied to the speeches of the Virginia Senators, made yesterday. The bill was then laid aside. The Consular and Diplomatic Appropriation bill was reported, with various amendments, and will be called up to-morrow. The report on the revision of the rules was taken up, and the amendment to compel Senators to be present when necessary to a quorum was adopted. An amendment declaring that the Vice President may by his vote determine the question, when the Senate is equally divided, was also adopted, and the report was agreed to.

In the House a resolution was adopted permitting Mr. Barnes to go to New-Orleans in charge of the Sergeant at Arms to procure the telegraphic dispatches asked for and bring them to Washington. The Indian Appropriation bill was reported. The Louisiana Returning Board contempt case came up, and, after a long debate, the resolution ordering the arrest of the members of the Returning Board was adopted by 158 yeas to 81 nays—a strictly party vote. The Senate amendments to the Contingent Fund Deficiency bill were in part only concurred in. The resignation of Mr. Spencer, appointed "Judge of the Supreme Court" of Louisiana by Mr. Nicholls, was presented. The Speaker announced his decision adverse to the point raised a few days ago that a member who reported a measure, and who occupied an hour in the opening, could also occupy another hour in closing the debate.

SENATE.

Mr. ANTHONY, of Rhode Island, from the Committee on Printing, reported, with amendment, the House resolution to authorize the Public Printer to bind in cloth copies of the House publication in regard to counting the Electoral vote. He said it would require but a small amount to pay for this work, but he desired to call the attention of the Senate to the appropriation made at the last session was insufficient to complete the work ordered by Congress; it was no use to go on now in ordering work when there was no money to pay for it. The resolution was agreed to.

THE ELECTORAL VOTE.

Mr. BOUTWELL, of Massachusetts, presented a petition of citizens of Massachusetts in favor of an amicable settlement of the Presidential question. Referred to the Special Committee of Seven.

THE EXPENSES OF INVESTIGATIONS.

Mr. MORTON, of Indiana, from the Committee on Privileges and Elections, said he desired to make a statement to exonerate himself from any responsibility in the matter which he would refer to. The money appropriated by Congress to enable the Committee on Privileges and Elections to make certain investigations had been expended. A bill appropriating $25,000 additional to conduct the investigations passed the Senate a few days ago, but was hung up in the House of Representatives. There was a sub-committee of the Senate Committee on Privileges and Elections now in New-Orleans. Its investigation was important, but it could not go forward without money. He stated these facts to exonerate himself from any responsibility in the suspension of this investigation.

Mr. THURMAN inquired if there was no money in the contingent fund of the Senate to continue the investigation.

Mr. MORTON replied in the negative.

THE OCCUPATION OF PETERSBUG BY 24 SOLDIERS.

Mr. MORTON then called up the Message of the President in relation to the occupation of Petersburg, Va., by the military, on the 7th of November last, the day of the general election, and replied at length to the remarks of Messrs. Johnston and Withers, of that State, delivered in the Senate yesterday.

Mr. MORTON said he confessed himself somewhat surprised this morning at reading two elaborate speeches of the Senators from Virginia, containing a formal indictment of the President for ordering troops to Petersburg last Fall. These troops were sent there on a requisition of a United States Marshal, and to carry out the circular of the Attorney General and acts of Congress. The troops were quartered in the Custom-house. They were not in the neighborhood of the polls and took no part in the election whatsoever. There were but 24 soldiers, with a Captain and Lieutenant. He entirely dissented from the views of the law expressed by the Senator from Virginia. He then argued that the President had the right, under the law, to send troops into any State for the purpose of enabling the officers of the United States to enforce the law and the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution. The law authorized the President to have troops at the polls, if necessary to keep the peace, but in Petersburg they were not at the polls, and took no part in the election. He then had read debris of George E. Maribie, Moses Norman, William Whyte, Daniel R. Butts, Edward Everett, and William Green, to show that violence and intimidation existed in Petersburg at the election in the Spring of 1876, and argued that the President was justified in sending troops there to prevent a recurrence of bloody outrages. Not one single case of fraud or outrages. A half dozen Republicans were nearly killed in the streets of Petersburg, but that was not considered violence.

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Virginia, said if he was satisfied that outrages had been committed in Petersburg he would be as quick to denounce them as the Senator from Indiana [Mr. Morton]. He (Johnston) denied that violence existed in that city as detailed by Senator Morton. The testimony which he had read was false; it had been manufactured.

Mr. MORTON said the Senator [Mr. Johnston] was not in Petersburg in the Spring of 1876, and therefore he did not know the facts. He did not exist. The trouble in regard to all the outrages in the Southern States was that they were denied. Evidence of them was piled up mountain high, yet they were denied.

Mr. WITHERS, of Virginia, said the white people of Virginia were not opposed to negro suffrage. His [Mr. Withers] motive in making the remarks he had here and from expressions, notably by the Senator from Indiana [Mr. Morton] and the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. Sherman,] a latent purpose on the part of the Republican Party to divest the colored people of the right of suffrage given them by the Constitution.

Mr. SHERMAN, of Ohio, said the Senator had imputed to him an idea which never entered his head. He denied that he desired to deprive the colored people of the right of suffrage. If left to themselves, the colored people would naturally vote for that party which gave them liberty and the right of suffrage. The history of the whole South showed that the colored people would vote as they had only been induced to vote the Democratic ticket by means which would compel white people to give up the freedom of the ballot. The time would come when the negroes would have the force and power to assert the freedom of the ballot-box. Let the negroes exercise their intelligence, and the Republicans would abide the result. If the white men of the South sought the vote of the negro against his will, the Republicans would resist it. He then referred to the occupation of Petersburg by the military, and defended the action of the President in that matter.

Mr. MORTON also denied that he desired to withdraw the right of suffrage from the negro, and said the Senator from Virginia could not find any lively evidence of that fact.

After some further discussion the subject was laid aside.

THE CONSULAR AND DIPLOMATIC BILL.

Mr. SARGENT, of California, from the Committee on Appropriations, reported back the House bill making appropriations for the Consular and Diplomatic service of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1878, with various amendments. Placed on the calendar. He gave notice that he would call it up for consideration to-morrow, or as soon thereafter as he could get the floor.

REVISION OF THE RULES.

The Senate then resumed the consideration of the report of the Committee on Rules revising the rules for the government of the Senate. An extended discussion took place upon an amendment proposed by the committee to compel the attendance of absent Senators when necessary to make a quorum. Messrs. Ferry and Hamlin spoke in favor of the amendment.

Mr. WHYTE moved to amend the amendment by striking out the words, "and, when necessary, to compel." Rejected. Yeas, 14; nays, 23.

The amendment proposed by the committee was then agreed to.

The committee also reported an amendment, declaring that the Vice President, when the Senate is equally divided, shall by his vote determine the question. After some discussion it was amended so as to read, "may by his vote determine," and as amended was agreed to.

The report of the committee was then agreed to, and it was ordered that a sufficient number of copies of the Revised Rules be printed for the use of the Senate.

The Senate then went into executive session, and when the doors were reopened, at 4:15 o'clock, adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

Mr. CAULFIELD, of Illinois, from the Judiciary Committee, reported a resolution permitting E. W. Barnes, the recalcitrant witness, to repair at once to New-Orleans in the custody of a Deputy Sergeant at Arms, for the purpose of procuring the telegraphic dispatches demanded of him, and requiring him to bring them within 10 days to Washington, and abide the further action of the House. Adopted.

THE INDIAN APPROPRIATIONS.

Mr. WELLS, of Missouri, from the Committee on Appropriations, reported the Indian Appropriation bill.

ELECTORAL VOTES NECESSARY TO A CHOICE.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia, offered a resolution instructing the Committee on Privileges and Duties of the House, to report what number of Electoral votes is necessary under the Constitution to elect a President. Referred.

THE LOUISIANA RETURNING BOARD.

The regular order being demanded, the House proceeded to the consideration of the resolution reported by the Judiciary Committee with reference to the arrest of the Louisiana Returning Board.

Mr. O'BRIEN, of Maryland, said that the report and resolution before the House received his entire approval. The House in conducting the investigation by its committees had the power to compel the production of the original papers showing the returns and results of the election for Electors.

Mr. HOAR, of Massachusetts, addressed himself to the simple question of the constitutional power of the House to require a State to give up its archives. He was struck with amazement that it should ever have fallen to his lot to defend the rights of an American State against a Democratic House of Representatives. He laid down this proposition, that whatever power the House had to compel the authorities of a State to deliver up the records of that State and bring them to the House to be kept according to its will, that same authority the Legislature of a State had over United States officials within its jurisdiction.

Mr. BLAND, of Missouri, asked if a committee of the House had not power to examine ballots in cases of contested elections for members of Congress.

Mr. HOAR replied that the records which were now sought for were the records of local elections and records which related to the experience of the Government of the State. Nobody doubted that there was a certain class of records to which the principle he had laid down did not apply; but the records of the election of Presidential Electors were a matter of the preservation of the State Government and sovereignty of the State itself, and Congress had no right to lay hands on them and bring them out of the territory of the State.

Mr. HEREFORD, of West Virginia, stated that the House had never ordered the papers to be taken out of the State. The Returning Board had refused over to ask for an injunction of them.

Mr. BANKS, of Massachusetts, said that the records demanded were the records on which the existence of the State Government and the Government of the United States depended. He defied any gentleman to find in the history of the United States a single instance in which such a demand was made. No man could justify the officers of Louisiana if they had given up their records into irresponsible hands.

Mr. SOUTHARD, of Ohio, said that in the forty-second session the Committee on Elections in the Senate had been ordered to inquire whether there was a State Government in Louisiana, and in that investigation the committee summoned to Washington the members of the Kellogg and McEnery Returning Boards, and the records of both parties had been produced before it.

Mr. BANKS replied that in that case the exist

The Joint Committee of the two houses of Congress has at last agreed on a plan for counting the Electoral vote. It makes the functions of the President of the Senate purely ministerial, and the two kinds of objections likely to be raised when the certificates are opened are to be settled as follows: First, when only one set of returns is presented from a State any objection to their reception must be sustained by the concurrent vote of both houses. Failing this, such returns must be counted as the vote of the State. When two sets are presented they are to be immediately referred to a commission composed of five Senators, five members of the House, four of the Associate Justices of the Supreme Court—whose names are given—and one other Justice selected by these four. The decision of this tribunal of fifteen is to be submitted, at some time not fixed, to the two houses assembled in joint session, and is to be final, unless both houses agree to reject it. Excepting the single element of deciding by lot the composition of the Counting Court, this plan is open to all the objections which have been frequently set forth in these columns. It imposes on the Judges of the Supreme Court functions which they were never intended to perform, and it relieves the President of the Senate of duties which the framers of the Constitution deliberately and distinctly imposed on him. It is merely a device to stave off the settlement of questions which can and ought to be decided at once, and it renders possible the occurrence of a Presidential interregnum which would neither be creditable nor profitable to the country.

Gen. AUGUR, now commanding the United States troops at New-Orleans, seems a little disposed to quibble over his instructions, and to give the Democratic claimant, NICHOLLS, the benefit of any doubt which can be extracted from their language. Gen. AUGUR was very plainly told by the President that the lawyers who came together at the call of NICHOLLS and designated themselves the Supreme Court of the State, could not be recognized as such, and that Mr. PACKARD, being the legally elected Governor of Louisiana, must be so recognized. But Gen. AUGUR persists in forcing the maintenance not of what diplomatists call the status quo ante bellum, but of the state of things as it was after the Nicholls revolution. The White Leaguers hold the courts, the Mortgage offices, and the Police stations, and the representative of the United States has used his influence to have them left undisturbed till he receives more explicit instructions. Considering how easy it would be, under existing circumstances, to precipitate riot and bloodshed in New-Orleans, this very scrupulous officer cannot be too soon admonished that the recognition of a legally elected Governor excludes the possibility of admitting that a usurper of some of the attributes of that position can be dealt with as having any official status whatever.

Mr. DANIEL MARCY, who may be described as a candidate with money, has been nominated by the New-Hampshire Democrats as a candidate for Governor. This is a triumph for the "hard-shell" wing of the party, and will not infuse enthusiasm into the Democratic part of the contest. It will be a strictly moneyed fight, as they say in New-Hampshire. The Chairman of the nominating convention took occasion to say in his opening address that the attempts of the Republicans to incite "civil war" had proved futile, and that the Democratic Party, for which he speaks, does not want revolution. This is very good of the New-Hampshire Chairman. His candidate a few years ago was so much opposed to civil war that he declared that the right of the Southern States to secede ought to be conceded with alacrity.

Possibly many of our readers, weary of the perpetual succession of storms of snow and rain with which we have been visited, may not understand the solicitude with which the Californians telegraph across the continent their local meteorological observations. On that side of the continent, however, everything depends on the rain. If none falls at this season, the drought is continuous throughout the year. The rain should have come by the last of November. None can fall later than February or March. But up to the beginning of this week, the season has been rainless. The plains and hills, which should have been green in December, were as brown as in August. There must be moisture for the vast wheat crops, and water for the sluices of the miners. A drought in California means a short wheat crop for this Continent, and a diminished gold yield. But the spell is broken, and the Californians made haste to tell us that a rain-storm is extending all over the State.

It should be remembered that the Salary bill introduced in the Assembly deals mainly with the reduction of the compensation of heads of departments, and only partially with the much larger question of the pay of heads of bureaus, clerks, and court attendants. The latter class include a large number of the lowest order of political hacks, and their pay is not only out of all proportion to the value of their services, but their numbers are very much in excess of the requirements of the public service. There also remain to be dealt with in separate bills the extravagant fees pocketed by the Coroners, and the ridiculously large remuneration attached to the offices of Sheriff, County Clerk, and Register. The present Legislature may not succeed in doing all which public sentiment demands should be accomplished, but it may, at least, effect a good many reductions which will be equally creditable to the party and satisfactory to the tax-payers. Only, let it resolutely refuse to be either advised or influenced by Republicans who are desirous of participating in the spoils of the City Government.

There are some points in Mr. STRAHAN'S bill for amending the law relating to the Police Department which look suspiciously like pandering to the desires of our new set of Tammany Republicans. A "non-partisan" Police Board is very well in principle, but when its practical results are found to be corrupt bargains for the defeat of reform legislation and an entire inability to protect the minority against gross and palpable election frauds, the utility of associating Republican with Democratic politicians as Police Commissioners becomes more than doubtful. The only way to make the Police Board "non-partisan" is either to take it out of the reach of professional politicians altogether or to make it a less desirable prize for that class of persons. It would be a decided step in this direction to deprive it of all but supervisory control over the election machinery of the City. Mr. STRAHAN'S bill provides for a Superintendent of Detectives, at $6,000 a year, whose utility is as questionable as his compensation is excessive. Measures like this and the still more dubious bill for legalizing armory jobs, which was introduced yesterday, ought to be carefully scanned by Republicans in the Legislature if they desire to make the session a creditable one.

THE DEMOCRATS IN CONGRESS.

"We have still profound confidence in the patriotism of Congress," remarks a contemporary with whose opinions we usually agree. In the present instance we cannot share the feeling it expresses. The course of events in the House of Representatives since the beginning of the session has tended to destroy faith in the temper and objects of the Democratic majority. On not a single occasion have they shown a disposition to rise above the low arts of partisanship and to judge of pending controversies irrespective of the bearing upon the fortunes of their candidate. If any patriotism remains in their natures, they have striven effectually to conceal it. Instead of looking hopefully to the action of the House, as auxiliary to the settlement of the points in dispute in regard to the Presidency, we see nothing but a succession of attempts to crush the rights of the Republican minority, to disregard the powers of the Senate and its presiding officer, and to minister to an outside agitation of the most mischievous character.

The consideration of the questions involved in the count of the Electoral vote might have been expected to develop any latent patriotism that existed. The occasion called for judicial candor and impartiality, and the appointment of a committee to act in conjunction with a committee of the Senate may have looked like a promise of good things to come. To this committee surely belonged the sole treatment of the subject, with a view to some common understanding between the chambers as to the proceedings on the 14th February. But the House Democrats are incapable of fairness when partisan interests are at stake. Having made a show of concession by accepting the proposition for a committee to sit in conference with the Senators, they appointed another committee, and gave to Mr. PROCTOR KNOTT and his associates the task of presenting, in their own way, some of the very issues which were referred to the Counting Committee. The consequence is, that the obviously partisan committee of Mr. KNOTT quickly jumped to certain prearranged conclusions, and while the other committees were still discussing various plans, laid before the House a statement of its alleged rights which, if acted upon, would inevitably bring it into conflict with the other branches of the Government. It is notorious that the extreme demands urged by Mr. KNOTT in behalf of the House are sustained by the Speaker and by Mr. TILDEN'S principal friends, and their presentation at such a time goes far toward rendering "confidence in the patriotism" of the Democrats in Congress impossible.

Tuesday's debate in the House on the motion declaring the members of the Louisiana Returning Board in contempt further illustrates the inordinate pretensions that are urged by the Democrats in the name of the House, and the despicable appeals that are made to popular passion in their support. Mr. MORRISON'S committee went to Louisiana, prepared by fair means or foul to capture that State for TILDEN. The "dragnet" which was cast into the telegraph offices was one of the many devices to fish out something that might keep alive partisan excitement. Then the committee undertook to sit in judgment upon the Returning Board, to usurp a revisory power which the Constitution places at the disposal of the State, and which the State had in due form delegated to the board. The committee, in fact, conceived the idea of reopening the court and compelling members of the board to swear in TILDEN. The members of the board, on the other hand, stand upon their rights, and deny the jurisdiction of the committee. Thereupon, Mr. MORRISON cries to Mr. RANDALL for help, and Mr. RANDALL turns to the Judiciary Committee, and the Judiciary Committee recommends that the terrors of the Sergeant at Arms be invoked, assigning in favor of the recommendation reasons that would make Congress the most despotic legislative body in the world. The terms of the Constitution, the powers of the States, the rights of the citizen, are all ignored by the managers of the movement for making Mr. TILDEN President. They hardly condescend to talk of patriotism—the word is obsolete in the dictionary of partisanship. They appeal, rather, to the mob in the galleries, and Mr. RANDALL only realizes the indecency of their responsive shouts when reminded of the scandal which has grown up under his Speakership.

And, while the House sends its hunting expeditions in all directions, and spends money without stint in its endeavors to establish a case that shall inure to Mr. TILDEN'S benefit, it withholds from the Senate the appropriation sought to defray the expenses of its investigating committees! Usage makes each chamber the sole judge of the requirements of its contingent fund. The Democratic House acts upon this presumption, but practically denies the privilege to the Senate, whose investigations in South Carolina, Louisiana, and Florida will, necessarily, be suspended. In effect, the House says: "There shall be no limit to the expenditures or the powers of committees intrusted with the task of getting up a case against the Republicans; but the Senate must not prosecute inquiries that bring together proofs of Democratic violence and fraud, and it shall have no more money to make the inquiries possible." With illustrations like these arising almost every day, we really are unable to cherish "profound confidence" in the purposes of the Democrats in Congress.

RESUMPTION BY FUNDING.

It is worth while recalling the fact that Secretary MORRILL, in his report recommends that, as a further provision for the resumption of specie payments, the Secretary of the Treasury be authorized to fund the outstanding United States notes, prior to the date fixed for resumption, into bonds bearing four and one-half per cent. interest. This is substantially a renewal of the recommendation made by Secretary BRISTOW a year ago, and is in accord with the policy so often urged in these columns. We suppose that it is hopeless to expect the adoption of so salutary a measure by the present Congress, but it is encouraging for the friends of honest money to know that now as during the last administration of that department, the influence of the Treasury is thrown in favor of an adequate and proper solution of the problem of resumption. To any sincere advocate of resumption, who understands the evils of our present financial condition, it appears almost too plain for argument that the policy proposed is the only safe and feasible method of getting rid of the surplus legal tenders. That the currency is excessive there can be no doubt. Its depreciation alone is perfect proof of its redundancy. If the volume of the currency were not greater than would be required on a specie basis, it would circulate at par. The fact that it is at a discount in coin shows that its purchasing power is less by the amount of the discount than that of coin, and this, in turn, is an indication that there is more of it in circulation than the business of the country can use at its par value.

This being the case, what is the best and safest way to dispose of the surplus? There are but two ways proposed. One is that provided by the Resumption act as it stands. It is, to accumulate, prior to the day fixed for resumption, by the sale of the bonds of the United States, a sufficient stock of gold to redeem all the legal tenders that may by any possibility be presented. The disadvantages of this plan are obvious. In the first place, the amount of coin required for the purpose cannot be foreseen. We may theorize as ingeniously as we please, but only the test of actual experiment can demonstrate the amount required. A calculation made a year in advance may be entirely upset by a change in the condition of business, a derangement of the exchanges, a foreign war, or some other unforeseen cause. It will, therefore, be necessary to accumulate a stock of gold sufficient to provide for any emergency which may arise. Failure in the attempt to resume, by reason of insufficient preparation, would be not only disgraceful but disastrous. The enemies of resumption in any form would ascribe the failure not to defects in the method, but to the intrinsic difficulties of the task, and the result would very likely be an indefinite postponement of a repetition of the attempt. But when the amount needed is determined upon, still more formidable difficulties remain. The coin must be taken out of circulation and locked up in the vaults of the Treasury until the day of resumption arrives. The process will, for the time being, diminish by so much the metallic circulation of the world. The coin for the purpose must, of course, be imported, and it is more than probable that an operation of such magnitude would seriously derange the exchanges between this and foreign countries. The locking up of so large a part of the world's capital might so advance the rate of interest, after a part of the coin had been secured, as to check further loans, and render the procurement of the remainder impossible at the rate of interest authorized to be paid. And for what purpose would this vast stock of coin be so laboriously accumulated? Simply that it might be put into circulation again on the 1st day of January, 1879. Nor would the coin remain in the country after it should be paid out. The currency being excessive when composed entirely of paper, would be just as excessive after part of it had been converted into coin. Consequently, the coin would immediately flow abroad again, and the country would not be one dollar the better off for having had it stored away in the vaults of the Treasury for a few months.

The alternative plan of funding the surplus legal tenders into bonds prior to resumption avoids all of these difficulties, while it arrives at the same goal in the end. Under its operation there would be no expensive and difficult accumulation of coin, no derangement of the exchanges, no sudden thrusting of a vast amount of coin into circulation, to immediately flow back whence it came. There would be, instead, a gradual retirement of the surplus legal tenders, and a gradual appreciation of the remainder toward par, unaccompanied by any of the unpleasant consequences of the other method. The essence of the problem of resumption is the retirement of the surplus greenbacks. How much more sensible and business-like it would be to retire them directly by funding them into bonds, than to resort to the roundabout device of first selling the bonds for gold, then paying out the gold in redemption of the greenbacks, and finally exporting the gold again in order to bring the circulation within normal limits! We are far from saying that the Resumption act is impracticable. We believe that any honest effort to resume is better than continuing in the aimless and vicious course in which we have so long drifted. At the same time, it is the part of wise statesmanship to recognize the imperfections of the present act, and to support any measure which will cure them. Such a measure we believe to be that which Gen. BRISTOW and Mr. MORRILL have ably advocated in two successive finance reports.

EMPTY THREATS.

The Democrats in the House are indignant that the President, in the exercise of the discretionary authority with which he is invested, has stationed a handful of troops at Washington. Ninety-nine of the members carry their indignation so far that they are willing to override the Constitution, and to prescribe to the President in a matter which is absolutely within his jurisdiction. We have not yet heard, however, of any attempt to elicit from the House a condemnation of the proposals made by one of its own members, and sustained by its Sergeant at Arms, for concentrating in the neighborhood of the Capitol a hundred thousand armed partisans, with the avowed purpose of influencing the action of Congress on the 14th of February. The precautionary measures adopted by the President under the law and for the maintenance of the peace, are, in the judgment of zealous Democrats, a rank offense. The scheme propounded by a Representative from Kentucky, and which had previously received the approval of the assembled Democracy of Ohio, Indiana, and parts of Illinois, provokes no display of temper on the side of the majority in the House, although the evident intention is to overawe the Government by demonstrations that would render the preservation of order all but impossible.

Another proposal, which Mr. HEWITT will to-day submit to the Democratic Executive Committee, contemplates other and equally irregular methods of fostering excitement and attracting to Washington, on the occasion of counting the Electoral vote, great numbers of Democrats, with the view of upholding Mr. TILDEN'S claim to the Presidency. The suggestion is that a National Democratic Convention shall be convened for that date, the expectation being that the assembling of such a body would draw together a vast Democratic crowd, and at the same time conceal its real object. Rumor credits Mr. HEWITT with opposition to the project, and the majority of Southern Democrats are also represented as deprecating it as inexpedient. However this may be, the fact remains that in issuing the call Mr. HEWITT yielded to a pressure which sufficiently indicates the intensity of party feeling, and the recklessness of the men who speak in behalf of the Western and South-western Democracy. Their desperation increases in an inverse ratio to the growth of moderation among the members of their party in Congress. Just as a cry went forth for indignation meetings to fire the Congressional heart when lukewarmness in the Tilden cause first became manifest, so now a demand is raised for the display of brute force as a means of strengthening weak brethren and fortifying hot-headed party leaders in any extreme position which they may assume in connection with the final count.

The prospect does not frighten any one. Mr. WATTERSON may blow a blast with the expectation that a hundred thousand fighting men will respond in person at Washington, but unless Mr. TILDEN reopen his purse and scatter greenbacks freely, how are they to get there? The person who draws the pay of Sergeant at Arms for services rendered as manager of the Democratic Party in Ohio may imagine that his incendiary appeals will do their work with or without Mr. TILDEN'S dollars. But the experience obtained on the 8th instant should teach these gentlemen to moderate their hopes. There are quite as many fools in the country as Mr. BEN HILL supposes, but their folly has not revealed itself in a desire for monster meetings and bloodthirsty resolutions. In other words, they are not prepared to embark in a civil war in which they would have to do some fighting. The fact is to a certain extent reassuring. And it may be taken as proof in advance of the failure that awaits any serious effort to put Mr. WATTERSON'S threat into execution. The only significance that attaches to the threat, or to the gathering of the Democratic Executive Committee to-morrow, is in the light which either sheds upon the revolutionary tactics of one portion of the Democratic Party.

THE COAL TRADE OF 1876.

An extended and careful review of the coal trade of last year by the Engineering and Mining Journal brings out some facts which are of general interest. Of course, the most prominent feature of the year was the collapse of the celebrated Anthracite Combination, which took place in the third week of August. We pointed out at the time some of the principal causes which led to this event, and which made it inevitable sooner or later. We have not hesitated to acknowledge some of the benefits secured to the consumer of coal by the combination, and especially the steadiness in price enjoyed by manufacturers, and the freedom from the necessity of carrying a large stock of fuel to guard against the great and sudden fluctuations in the quantity available which had previously been the rule of the market. Nor is it to be doubted that if the companies were cautious in their investments in coal lands and content with the gradual growth of the trade, a combination to regulate the out-put and the price of labor might save the trade from many dangers and losses to which it has been subjected since 1863. But these conditions were not fulfilled. The companies had far more coal lands than they could work, the interest on the cost of which was a heavy burden on consumption, and one which no combination could maintain in the state of trade prevailing since 1873. The coal combination broke because some of its parts were more heavily loaded than others, and there was no strong community of interest to equalize the strain. Its fall was unquestionably beneficial on the whole, but it is not worth while to forget that it worked much good in its time, and especially that it, for the first, made it possible to break up the "Molly Maguires" in the coal region, and to oppose with success the brutal and ignorant tyranny of the miners' trade unions.

When the combination came to an end on the 22d of August, the programme price was an average of $5 08 per ton. At the auction sale of half a million tons a week later, the price fell to $2 91. By Oct. 26 the Delaware and Hudson Canal Company's coal reached $3 28, but this was not maintained, and the average price since the break has been $3 09. The average price for the previous year was $5 34, a falling of for 1876 of about 43 per cent. It does not admit of question that as the mines have been managed for the past ten years, there is no profit in these prices. It is hardly less certain that there will be no renewal of the combination this year. The question arises, therefore, what will be the course of the trade for the coming year? Will there be an advance in price or a reduction in the cost of production? Everything points to the latter conclusion. Even with the utmost revival of general trade which can be expected, the demand for coal is not likely to reach a point where, without an arbitrary check on production, prices will advance. Nor, with the present administration of the mines, is the production likely to be curtailed sufficiently to bring about such a result. That a reduction in cost is possible, we, of course, cannot say with certainty; but that it is likely to be so all industrial history teaches. One source of economy will be found in the utilizing of what has heretofore been waste coal. As the Journal points out, everything below the size known as "chestnut" was regarded as useless, and even that size hardly paid the freight to tide-water. It is now quoted in many Northern and Western markets, and in some cases in this market, at the same price as "stove" coal. "Pea," which is the next smallest size, and which was wasted two years ago, is now quoted at the same as "lump" and "grate." And even the very fine coal and coal-dust, or "culm," of the mines is gradually coming into use for making steam, either when combined with pitch or used with a peculiar draught of air and steam. Nothing but the stimulus of considerable comparative profit is needed to make these latter processes generally useful.

The changes in the production of anthracite coal since it first felt the impulse of the war-demand in 1863 are very remarkable. In 1862 the production was something over nine million tons, (9,095,031.) With the exception of a slight falling off in 1865, and again in 1871, there was a steady and rapid increase until 1873, when the total production was nearly twenty-three millions, (22,880,921.) During the next three years, under the direction of the combination and by the influence of the decreased demand, the production sank about 3,000,000, until it is now estimated by the Engineering and Mining Journal at only 19,000,000 tons. The same authority is of the opinion that the collapse of the combination, followed by a heavy fall in prices and a corresponding increase in demand, prevented a further decline in production of from one million to a million and a half of tons. Meanwhile the production of bituminous coal, though falling off slightly last year, is gaining on the anthracite in its proportion to the total product. According to the census returns in 1870, the output of anthracite was about fourteen millions of tons, (13,985,960,) and that of the bituminous was somewhat over fifteen millions, (15,231,668,) the former being 47 per cent., the latter 52 per cent. of the total. In 1875, the anthracite product was 20,654,509 tons, and the bituminous product was 26,031,726. The former was 43.48 per cent., the latter 54.78 per cent. The bituminous regions include many only partially explored and developed fields, to which, with the revival of trade, capital and energy will doubtless be devoted. Greater changes are therefore probable in the production than can be looked for in the case of the anthracite mines.

STRATEGY.

Every one is familiar with the anecdote of the astute Irishman, who succeeded in driving a pig to Cork by pointing his snout in the direction of Dublin. The more the pig was implored with a sharp goad to go to Dublin, the more stubbornly he backed toward Cork, and thus his own obstinacy was made the weapon of his defeat.

The resemblance between the average pig and the street railway company doubtless suggested the brilliant strategy by which certain philanthropists have apparently succeeded in saving the public from the crowning outrage of street-car stoves. The ingenuity with which the companies have tortured their passengers has reflected the highest credit upon their inventive powers. Their cars are so planned as to secure the utmost discomfort which can be profitably furnished at the low rate of five cents. The seats are made of polished and slippery wood, so that the conductor, by suddenly stopping the car, can cause a whole seatful of passengers to slide violently forward, and thus provide an opening into which an extra passenger can be inserted and the highest attainable degree of squeezing be secured. The leathern straps from which the seatless passenger hangs and pokes the eyes of his fellow-men with his umbrella are unspeakably filthy, and the wet straw with which the bottom of the car is strewn combines all the advantages of a pestilential swamp and a small-pox hospital. The ventilators are nearly always shut, in order that the passenger may be sure of being poisoned, even in case the wet straw fails to do its duty; and at the same time ingenious draughts are so contrived as to strike the sitting passenger on the back of the neck, and thus help him to the easy acquisition of bronchitis. When to these discomforts are added the pains of excessive crowding and the presence of skillful pickpockets, it can hardly be denied that the patrons of the street-cars obtain more different kinds of misery for their money than any other class of people.

But the car companies are never weary in ill-doing. Whatever an enlightened misanthropy can suggest for the discomfort of the public, the companies are ready to examine, and, if practicable, to adopt. Not long since the project of heating the cars in Winter with coal stoves was brought before them by some local fiend of more than usual malignity. It is plain that by the use of the stove the tortures that passengers now undergo could be greatly increased. Those seated in its immediate neighborhood would be slowly roasted, while two or three of the occupants of the aisle could at any time be thrown directly on the stove and satisfactorily burned, by the simple process of suddenly checking the speed of the car. The odor of burning passengers, scorched leather, and melting India rubber would constantly fill the air, while the germs of diphtheria and other trustworthy diseases would be quickened into activity by the heat. In wet weather the car would be filled with noisome vapors generated by the slow baking of soaked men and dripping women. From time to time the small boy would roast a few pea-nut shells on the stove, and the tobacco consumer would use it as a convenient target for long or short range expectoration. Occasionally an exceptionally dry woman with calico skirts would take fire and fill the car with smoke, and when the car ran off the track the stove would lean up against the unprepared legs of some inflammable old gentleman. Of course, overheated passengers would constantly open windows, and thus bring drafts of cold air upon their perspiring fellows. This alone would decimate our car-riding population in the course of a single Winter, and in connection with the other diseases developed by promiscuous parboiling of the clean and the unclean, would cause our death-rate to surpass that of the most ambitious city of effete Europe by at least a hundred per cent. If the cars are uncomfortable and unwholesome in their present state, they would be infinitely more so were they to be heated with stoves, and it is certainly strange that the companies have so long delayed to avail themselves of such an efficient means of torture.

When it became noised abroad that the railway companies were seriously discussing the subject of car-stoves, intelligent men were filled with alarm, until they remembered the anecdote of the Celtic pig. Then they immediately began to clamor for stoves, as though their chief desire was to have their miseries increased. No one can for a moment suppose that any man of ordinary intelligence really desires to have coal stoves placed in the street cars. Those who advocate the measure do so as an obvious piece of strategy. They know that the moment the car companies imagine that the public desires any particular thing, they instantly resolve to die rather than to grant it. Thus, as soon as a demand for car-stoves was made in apparent good faith, the car companies said among themselves, "Aha! the public wants stoves, does it? Much good may it do them," and straightway resisted the demand with the utmost energy. If we escape the torture of the car-stove, it will be because a few noble philanthropists unselfishly pretended to demand what no sane person could dream of wanting, and thus thwarted the malevolence of the car companies. It is the old story of the Irish pig; the story of obstinacy made the instrument of its own humiliation.

Now let these philanthropists go a step further, and call a mass-meeting to protest against the outrage of warming the cars with hot-water footstools, and of removing the paleozoic straw from the car floors. In less than a week the car companies would remove the straw and furnish the cars with hot water. They will never do this so long as the public openly demands it, but the moment they think that it would be an objectionable measure they will strain every nerve to carry it out. Our escape from car-stoves ought to encourage us. We have discovered how to defeat the malevolence of the companies, and we should now try if the same strategy will not achieve more practical results.

THE FINE ARTS.

PICTURE GALLERY OF THE LENOX LIBRARY.

(First Notice.)

The gallery of paintings belonging to Mr. James Lenox has at last been opened to the public, under certain restrictions. Two days of the week have been set aside, viz., Monday and Thursday, during which the holders of tickets may enter the building between the hours of 11 and 4. Tickets are procured by addressing a postal-card to Mr. George H. Moore, Superintendent, at the library, corner of Fifth avenue and Seventieth street. Without them no one is allowed to enter. Attention to this regulation may prevent the annoyance of a long journey up town.

The collection Mr. Lenox made is remarkable chiefly for one branch of painting—that of portraits. The bulk of great names and the bulk of the good pictures belong to portrait painters. In a gallery of transient works of art liable to be broken up by sale, this would hardly be a recommendation, but in the present case it is a thing for congratulation. The Lenox gallery is to be a permanent fact, just as the library will be in the course of time. In all likelihood it will remain one of the ornaments of future New-York, and very possibly grow in size through bequests of outsiders or members of the same family that is founding it. Hence it will be more valuable as a gallery of reference for artists and art lovers than a place of amusement for those who merely like to see pictures. There is one Zamacois, one picture by José Jiminez, and one by Leon y Escosura, but these are about all that show the brilliant colors and peculiar attention to details which mark so many of the pictures just now in popular favor. The Zamacois, No. 133, happens to be one very familiar to New-Yorkers, having been a good deal exhibited. A court fool leans against a pillar supporting a stone head, to all appearance intended for an antique masque of Tragedy. The fool has his stick in his hand and regards attentively the Punch's head thereon. The catalogue affirms that the fool's face is that of the painter himself, so we may infer that he wishes to paint himself as a trifler in outward appearance, a fool for the world, but really a tragic fellow after all. This may or may not be the meaning. Whether it be or not makes little difference, for the merit of the painting lies in the technique, not the spirit. It does not appear in what the painter has said, but in what he has done. The Leon y Escosura, No. 118, is a careful painting of a parrot-dealer and customers, in which we can detect no ulterior design save color and freshness. There is a glass over this picture, and so the painting receives a certain glamour not its own, but still it looks like a very good specimen of a man who often turns out hasty work. The third modern has the indimitable variety of pose and crispness of coloring in his figures which seem a tradition among Spanish painters. This subject is a "Spanish Café," No. 137, and although it has one of the lesser places in the gallery, is worthier of a high seat than the work of many another notoriety present.

As before said, the Lenox collection is a portrait gallery. Therefore the head of the room and the main wall opposite the entrance are rightly occupied as to their central spaces by the two finest works of art. Sir Joshua Reynolds! His portrait of a lady as St. Cecilia occupies deservedly the post of highest honor, where it domineers, as it were, over all the inferior paintings. The lady stands on clouds, her head turned away a little, a music scroll in her hand. She forms by herself a picture of exceeding gracefulness, not posing for her portrait, not in action, yet just about to speak or sing. Her expression is modest, but not humble in any way; rather elevated by an inner consciousness of the worth of what she has to say. The left corner of the picture has a heavy dark cloud; above that is a bright space of sky; behind the long, graceful-lined figure runs a dark band of cloud diagonally upward and to the left. The figure has been apparently increased from the waist downward beyond the rules of nature in order to give it majesty. But of even more value than the portrait of Mrs. Billington herself, is the choir of little angels in the air, of whom one flies down from above with a garland to crown the fair saint, and the other four engage in earnest song. The leader, in dangerous proximity to Mrs. Billington's head, kicks his shapely little legs under his music-book, and while his face is screwed up in the eager exertions of his song, his right hand beats time with a scroll of music with the determined gesture of the leader of an orchestra. Two of his comrades have expressions of only a little less intensity, while another cupid, behind them, looks over his shoulder with the gesture often seen among the angels of some of the great Italians. This portrait deserves to occupy an alcove by itself.

The other wall centre, that over against the entrance-way, is occupied not only by a portrait of the Father of his Country, but also—the patriotic will be glad to learn—by one painted by an American. Nor can it be said that patriotism has favored unduly this picture. It deserves its place on its own merits, and commemorates not only the greatest days of the greatest man of the American Revolution, but one of the few fine painters America has to boast—Gilbert Stuart. It is a full-length portrait of Washington, painted for Peter Jay Munro, and bought for the present collection in 1845. Washington stands easily in a dignified attitude, when his dress, figure, and the accessories only increase. The face is of that well-known mild type, with rosy cheeks and individual but very excellent flesh tints, usually seen in Gilbert Stuart's paintings. His gray hair is shown against a pillar, while the face line is backed by a heavy wine-colored curtain. Beyond the curtain is a sky with a slight rainbow, referring perhaps to the American flag, according to the poem by Joseph Rodman Drake. His suit is black throughout; a dress sword is by his side, and he rests his fingers lightly upon an open scroll lying on a table. Curtain, table, scroll, pillar, sky, almost everything, is conventional, the kind of claptrap all the portrait painters of that day seem to have thought necessary to a portrait, yet the result in this case is fine, and would be almost imposing, were it not for the mildness of the face.

It is this characteristic of fine dignity which may be applied to the collection as a whole, in comparison with any other we can think of to be seen in the City. The portraits are by men who may have had less skill in rendering the texture of dresses, but their pictures exhibit a personality in the painter himself. The artist seems to have been a fuller and rounder individual than the makers of the genre pictures we admire nowadays. There is more of the gentleman (in the high sense) about them. Even Trumbull—whom the New-York satirist of the early part of the century apostrophized in the words (quoted from memory), "Paint on, my Trumbull, dare be dull!"—even Trumbull has this peculiar dignity in a portrait of a lady, No. 75, whose face has plenty of character and not a little feeling, although her garment, which to modern eyes looks suspiciously like a night-gown, is wooden in drawing and dull in color. No. 77, a portrait of a gentleman, is not so happy, but that, too, is not vulgar. But to return to Gilbert Stuart. The unfinished head of Mrs. Robert Morris, No. 65, is doubly interesting, as showing Stuart's manner of working. In this case he has worked from the centre outward, like the man who dressed himself from the cravat as a central point. Close to Stuart's Washington are two more of his portraits—one of Mr. Campbell, of Jamaica, the other of a Lady. They exhibit the same qualities as the Washington—a quiet, firm treatment of color, few contrasts, if any, and a dignified style that seems to respect the person painted, the people who are to see the picture, and also the art by the aid of which the painting is being done. Modern painters are very apt to differ widely from this last point. They do not respect anybody, neither the sitter, nor friends of the sitter, nor their own art. Hence a lack of that harmony which often gives great value to their painting on the part of the older workmen. No. 67 is another portrait of a lady by Stuart, of which the same thing may be said. Between it and No. 62 there is a strong family likeness, not only in features but in style of painting. Dress and arrangement of hair are noticeably alike; where the greatest difference exists is in the flesh tints. The latter portrait is by John Wesley Jarvis, and although his flesh painting is very good, it differs from that of Stuart.

Next in importance to the full-length Washington, we may place Leslie's portrait of Washington Irving, No. 74, not from the artistic point of view so much as the literary. It is the picture, perhaps the best picture we have, of one of the men who, for a little while, made New-York appear something better than a commercial centre. It has been engraved by Danforth, and used for some one of the many editions of Washington Irving's works. Leslie is represented also by a portrait of a lady, No. 68; "The Mother's Return to Her Child," No. 124—which may have technical excellences visible to artists, but to a layman looks like very poor art—"The Pharisee and the Publican," No. 125, an excellent production, judged from the old academical stand-point, and of much value to artists. As to the actors in this restrained little picture, we should not like to trust the Publican very far; he appears almost as Pharisaical as the Pharisee. "Our Saviour Teaching His Disciples a Lesson on Humanity," No. 127, is a peculiarly disagreeable picture, while little can be said in favor of the two remaining Leslies, viz.: No. 129, "The Reading Lesson, from an etching by Raffaelle," and No. 130, "Martha and Mary."

EXPRESSMEN'S BENEFIT ASSOCIATION.—BALTIMORE, Jan. 17.—The eighth annual convention of the Expressmen's Mutual Benefit Association assembled in this city this morning. Upward of 100 delegates are in attendance, representing all sections of the United States. The association has paid $83,000 to the families of deceased members, for 27 deaths.

THE ASHTABULA BRIDGE.

OFFICIAL EXAMINATION OF THE DETAILS OF CONSTRUCTION.

TESTIMONY OF THE EX-PRESIDENT OF THE LAKE SHORE RAILROAD—THE BRIDGE CONSTRUCTED IN ACCORDANCE WITH HIS PLANS—ITS SAFETY—HIS THEORY AS TO THE BREAKING OF THE STRUCTURE—A SLIGHT MISTAKE MADE IN THE WORK—HIS OPINION AS TO FREQUENT EXAMINATIONS—SAFETY STOVES.

Special Dispatch to the New-York Times.

CLEVELAND, Jan. 17.—The committee of the Ohio State Legislature sent to investigate the causes of the railway calamity at Ashtabula, returned from that place yesterday, and to-day took the testimony of Mr. Amasa Stone, who was President of the Lake Shore Railroad in 1865, and designed the Ashtabula Bridge. Mr. Stone being in delicate health, the committee met at his residence, on Euclid avenue. Being sworn, he testified as follows: He was at first Superintendent of the Lake Shore Road, from Cleveland to Erie, for two years, and was afterward President from 1856 to 1867, and has since been a Director of the road. The bridge across Ashtabula Creek was built in 1863; witness designed the bridge, but only superintended the drawing of the plan, while the details of construction were given into the hands of Mr. Albert Congdon, who was supervised by Mr. Joseph Tomlinson; the witness has not now the original plan of the structure, and does not certainly know where it may be found.

Q.—Were there full written specifications of the bridge at the time of its construction, and if so, where are they now? A.—There were all the specifications usually given, but I do not know where they now are.

Q.—Were there full specifications at the time? A.—There were.

Q.—Were the other papers preserved till the bridge was completed? A.—I am not aware that they were. The span of the bridge was 154 feet; the width of the bridge, from outside to outside, was 19 feet 6 inches, perhaps 20 feet; the width of the bridge between the chords, 14 or 14½ feet; the width of the truss was 19 feet 6 inches, and 20 feet in height from the lower edge to the upper edge; the width of each panel was 11 feet; there were four in all; there was no change in the plan of the work as projected by witness; there was no departure from the original plan as to strength, &c.; there was an error which gave the builders some trouble; this error was that they put in some parts horizontally that should have gone in vertically; the lugs may have been chipped off in remedying the mistake; the witness does not remember as to that point; the original design of the braces was not to be six inches flange, six inches webs; it was to be seven inches in both cases. The lugs upon the brace-block do not show, so far as I know, that they should be six inches; I was advised that the work was going on very slowly, and I went down to see what the trouble was. I heard of no trouble after the change from horizontal to vertical was made; Mr. Tomlinson was intrusted with the construction of the bridge in the beginning, but he was found very inefficient, and he was discharged, and Mr. Rogers was put in his place; Mr. Rogers had no experience either before or since in the erection of iron bridges, so far as the witness knows. There could have been no other mistake made than the one that was made. The weight and pressure of the bridge, bound by the vertical truss-rods, would hold it in place. The unscrewing of the rods from the bearings would loosen them; the dropping out of three or four counter braces would not affect the strength; one half of them out of place would not effect the strength; at the centre the counters become main braces, but at either end they are not so important; the dropping out of a few at the centre would injure its strength; no other means was devised to keep the counters in their places, because the lugs were placed on almost entirely for convenience in raising; they were for no especial purpose after the bridge was raised; the braces were held by other means; there would be no means of elongating the tie-rods sufficiently to injure the strength of the bridge; the struts upon the lower part of the bridge were 22 feet, perhaps, I don't recollect.

The bridge would be a very safe one without any lateral braces, it is so very thick. Witness has known bridges erected without any lateral braces to stand for years. There were in the bridge various iron cross-ties, fastened to the upper chords of the bridge by loop bolts, upon which the rails were laid. The resting of the iron rails upon the top chord in the centre of the panels would not weaken the upper chord; it is usual to have these beams thus rest; it is not usual to strengthen the top chords for this purpose, for they are supposed to be strong enough; the bridge must be twice as strong to carry two tracks as to carry one track in the centre; I have carefully considered the matter, and my conclusion is that the dead weight of the bridge and its load would not strain the bridge more than 8,000 or 9,000 pounds to the square inch, while it is capable of supporting 32,000 pounds to the square inch; one train on one side of the bridge would strain the trusses about 35 per cent. as much as it would were two trains passing over at the same time; when the bridge broke, it swung to the north, while the load was pitched to the south; it is very conclusive evidence to my mind that the bridge was carried down by the second locomotive leaving the track in some way; the bridge was not strong enough to carry a train across off the track; had the bridge broken of its own weakness it would have swung to the south; a model test to the extent of breaking a truss would show that that truss would break to the south and carry the bridge to the south; an engine dropping on the cross floor beams would tend to deflect them, and pull the truss which the train was passing over on to the north, and when pulled to the north it would then go down; the braces were fastened together in the centre by loop bolts, which kept them all in position; this bridge would have been stronger if the tie-rods had been perpendicular and the braces oblique; I have never constructed any other Howe truss bridge with wrought-iron braces, and know of no other anywhere in the country; when Mr. Rogers made the mistake in putting in the braces it was not negligence in permitting him to continue the superintendence of the erection of the bridge, for there was no other particular in which he could have made a mistake; it was not even unwise to permit him to continue; the directions of the witness were that the ends of the sway rods be enlarged so as not to be weakened by the cutting of the thread upon them; if this was not done, and the thread did actually reduce the strength of the rods, it was a poor job; when the bridge was changed, in correcting the mistakes there were no more braces inserted; no parts of the bridge were reduced in size because the rollers in the shop were not sufficient in size; witness had no interest in the mill where the iron was made; his brother, A. B. Stone, the Linsholms, and Mr. Jones, owned it at that time.

Q.—Ought not such bridges as the one under consideration to be examined by an experienced bridgeman as often as once in three months, and by the trackmen quite frequently? A.—There would be no necessity of tightening and loosening the nuts on account of the changes of the temperature, as the nuts are practically tight in warm or cold weather; the examination should be for the purpose of seeing whether the nuts had become loosened or any of them were off; the wrecked train and the passengers were burned up from fire kindled by the locomotive or stoves in the cars, probably by the latter.

Q.—Why did not your company comply with the law in regard to safety from fire in case of accident? A.—I examined the stoves, called safety stoves, and consider them more dangerous than those now in use.

Q.—Why did you not use steam for heating? A.—It is not practicable. No engine can furnish enough steam for its regular work and to heat the cars also; the work of braking with steam comes when the train is slacking up, and the steam for running the train is not in use. While the bridge was going up the witness gave no personal supervision to the work; the ironwork was done by us thoroughly a master-machinist as the witness knows of; witness was at the shops afterward while the bridge was being built; he was at the bridge only once during its erection; that was when there was a report that there was trouble in putting it up. When the bridge was tested it was stiffer and the deflection was less than expected; the difference in cost between the bridge built and stone arches would have been about $18,000; the bridge itself cost about $15,000; the bridge and arches cost perhaps nearly $76,000.

TESTIMONY OF THE CHIEF ENGINEER.

The Joint Legislative Committee of Investigation into the Ashtabula Disaster examined this afternoon Charles Collins, Chief Engineer of the Lake Shore Railroad, who testified as follows:

I do not know where the original plans of the bridge are, unless they are at Ashtabula before the Coroner's jury; they are the full working plans; I never saw them, however; such plans are generally preserved; they belonged to my office, but at about the time the bridge was constructed I was put on other work, and this was put into the hands of another man; I never saw the plans, therefore, as they were not sent to my office; I think they were up at the shop when the work was done; they would also be wanted when the bridge was set up; the examination of the bridge belongs to men under me; my instructions are to report everything wrong; G. M. Reed is at the head of the examining corps; he has no set time, but works on a general order; some time in September he reported verbally that the bridge was all right; they have not been required to report in writing in ordinary business; I never ordered any special examination of that bridge; I never made any statements to the effect that "the bridge was not mine but Stone's;" I was once staying at Ashtabula, and Mr. Rogers asked me to go and visit the bridge, and I told him the braces were in wrong, but that I had nothing to do with it; he requested me to have Mr. Stone come down; I went with Mr. Stone who remarked that he was surprised the braces were in wrong; it was still resting on the trestle-work; when I saw it next it was tested; the braces were afterward turned and an additional number put in; I made inspection of it afterward when the trains were passing over it; looked at it as an engineer, and thought the yokes about the angle blocks would hold the braces in position; I did not anticipate any trouble on account of the position of the braces; I considered the fastenings of the braces sufficient; in the change that was made the corners of the braces were chipped off, but this, I do not think, would affect it materially; I have never made any estimate of the weight of the bridge; I have had no experience in building that kind of a bridge, but it would have been stronger if the braces had been united so as to make them act together; I have never known of another bridge to be built of wrought-iron on this plan; this bridge was an experiment; I think the upper chords were not all the same size; I never saw or examined the strain-sheet of the bridge; I never myself made a mathematical examination of the bridge with a view to ascertaining its safety; there was a guard-rail which would prevent the wheel from jumping unless something had been tampered with; I think a locomotive might run across if there was nothing wrong; below the floors were beams or stringers; the bridge was built for a double track; the outside rail was immediately over the chord; the bridge would not be stronger if wider; it would have to be more than double as strong for a double track as for a single one; I have examined the wreck and found that some of the braces had slipped out of the angle blocks; since the accident I have been too busy for the erection of a new bridge to examine as carefully as I desired the material of the wreck; if one or more of the sway rods were to break, the floor would go one way, the train the other; the application of air brakes would check the train and possibly jump a car from the track; not to my knowledge was there any order given not to throw water on the burning wreck; there were two barrels filled with brine at each end of the bridge to use in case of fire; the company had no other facilities to put out fire than buckets.

Dispatch to the Associated Press.

A special dispatch to the Leader from Ashtabula says: "The inquest was resumed at 9 A. M. E. N. Beeborit was recalled, and testified; he thinks that the main braces of the bridge were insufficient; that they contained enough material, but were not of proper shape; he thinks the set braces would have been very much stronger to resist compression if they had been connected throughout their entire length by plates of iron riveted to them. This was the method prepared by Mr. Tomlinson for strengthening them when the bridge was built. The inquest was adjourned until to-morrow morning, to allow the witness to make an examination of some parts of the bridge just removed from the river.

AMUSEMENTS.

BRIEF MENTION.

A concert of English glees will be given at Chickering Hall this evening.

The sale of seats for Miss Kellogg's approaching representations of English opera, at the Academy of Music, opens this morning.

It is said that Booth's Theatre will be closed after Saturday's performance, to be reopened on Feb. 5, when "Fifth Avenue," Mr. Rowe's new drama, will be in readiness for production.

Announcement is made that the run of "Azurene," at Niblo's, will terminate with the present week, and that "Around the World in Eighty Days" will be brought out at that house on Monday next.

OBITUARY.

REAR ADMIRAL JOSEPH SMITH.

A dispatch from Washington announces the death, in that city, yesterday morning, of Rear Admiral Joseph Smith, said to be the oldest officer in the United States Navy. The deceased was born in Massachusetts, March 30, 1790. He was appointed a Midshipman in the Navy Jan. 16, 1809—almost 70 years ago. The oldest officer in the United States Army, Col. B. L. E. Bonneville, was first commissioned Dec. 11, 1815. Admiral Smith, it will be seen, had served his country several years longer than the soldier so graphically referred to by Washington Irving in one of his numerous works. The events of Admiral Smith's career, in brief, are as follows: He was commissioned as Lieutenant in 1813, and distinguished himself by his gallant behavior in the battle of Lake Champlain, on the 11th of September, 1814, when he was wounded; was concerned in the capture of Algerine vessels in 1815; was commissioned as Commander in 1827; attached to the Boston Navy-yard in 1829; to the frigate Guerriere, of the Mediterranean Squadron, in 1830; again at the Boston Navy-yard in 1834; was commissioned as Captain in 1837, and commanded the Mediterranean Squadron in 1845. In 1847 he was appointed Chief of the Bureau of Yards and Docks, a position which he filled until 1849, when his advancing years and failing health compelled him to resign. He was commissioned as Rear Admiral in 1862.

HON. STEWART L. DURLAND.

Hon. Stewart L. Durland, Assemblyman from the Second District of Orange County, N. Y., died at Middletown yesterday morning, of pneumonia, at the residence of his brother, ex-Assemblyman Daniel T. Durland, who is also seriously ill. He arrived in Middletown unwell, from Albany, on Saturday. Mr. Durland belonged to one of the oldest of the leading families of Orange County. He was a member of the Board of Supervisors seven terms, Associate County Judge eight years, and Justice of the Peace 20 years. He was 63 years of age.

OBITUARY NOTES.

UTICA, Jan. 17.—Col. Alrick Hubbell, aged 76, ex-State Senator and Mayor of Utica for several terms, died suddenly of apoplexy at 4 o'clock yesterday afternoon.

Franklin Moore, a prominent merchant of Detroit, Mich., and brother-in-law to Hon. Z. Chandler, Secretary of the Interior, died yesterday in that city, aged 75 years.

Col. Alvin White, who served gallantly in the war with the One Hundred and Seventeenth Regiment, New-York Volunteers, fell through an elevator at Fulton Hospital, in this city, yesterday, and was instantly killed.

ARRESTED FOR MANSLAUGHTER.

A WATCHMAN ON A UNITED STATES STEAMER IN TROUBLE—A QUESTION OF JURISDICTION SETTLED.

NORFOLK, Jan. 17.—On the night of Jan. 1, John W. Tatem, a watchman on board the United States steamer Canandaigua, which was lying near the Navy-yard, shot and mortally wounded Michael Joyce, a workman in the Navy-yard, who was attempting to steal old iron and copper pipes from that ship. Tatem was arrested and brought before United States Commissioner Barry, of the Eastern District Court, in that city, for examination, and bailed for appearance before Judge Hughes. A few days thereafter, upon hearing that Joyce died at his home in Portsmouth, the Mayor of that city issued an order for the arrest of Tatem; knowing that he had been bailed by the United States Commissioner. Tatem was arrested and committed to jail for trial before the Corporation Court of Portsmouth. Counsel for Tatem served out a writ of habeas corpus and a hearing of the case was had Monday afternoon at the United States District Court room, Judge Hughes presiding. The court decided that the Mayor of Portsmouth had no jurisdiction in the matter, the offense being cognizable by the laws of the United States, and committed in the Gosport Navy-yard, where the State of Virginia has no jurisdiction; that the courts of the United States have the sole and exclusive jurisdiction in such cases, and that an attempt on the part of the Mayor of Portsmouth to exercise jurisdiction over the offense was in violation of the laws of the United States. The prisoner was discharged from the custody of the Sergeant of Portsmouth and immediately arrested by the United States Marshal, who now holds him in custody.

MR. BENNETT SAID TO BE IN FLORIDA

HIS REPORTED ARRIVAL AT JACKSONVILLE—FOUR FRIENDS SAID TO BE WITH HIM.

JACKSONVILLE, Jan. 17.—It is reported that James Gordon Bennett and four friends arrived here this morning by the Macon and Augusta Railway, and stopped at the St. James Hotel, but left shortly afterward and went on board Astor's yacht.

NEW-YORK SAVINGS BANKS.

ORDERS GRANTED BY JUSTICE LANDON TO PAY CERTAIN AMOUNTS CONNECTED WITH THE NEW-AMSTERDAM AND THE BOND STREET SAVINGS BANKS.

ALBANY, Jan. 17.—At Schenectady, yesterday, before Justice Landon, R. M. Bent, Receiver of the New-Amsterdam Savings Bank, presented, through counsel, a petition for leave to pay certain claims amounting in the aggregate to $2,155 97 from the funds in his hands. Among the items was one for repairs to an organ—what description of organ is not stated. The remainder were coal, clerk fees, &c. The order was granted.

In the case of the people vs. the Bond Street Savings Bank an order was also granted by Justice Landon, yesterday, directing the United States Trust Company to pay to Willis S. Paine, Receiver, the sum of $164 72 required by him to clear off taxes on the bank property. The orders were entered in this county.

PENNSYLVANIA'S MILITIA.

CAUCUS OF THE REPUBLICAN MEMBERS—THE BILL TO PLACE THE MILITIA OF THE STATE UPON A WAR FOOTING UNDER DISCUSSION — AN ADVERSE REPORT ADOPTED.

HARRISBURG, Jan. 17.—A caucus of the Republican members of the Legislature was held here this morning. The committee of three Senators and four Representatives, including the Speakers of the two Houses who, were appointed last week to consider the propriety of introducing a bill into the Legislature to place the Militia of the State upon a war footing, it was expected would make its report to-night. This committee, since its appointment, held conferences with Gov. Hartranft, and finally decided that it was not expedient to offer any such bill to the Legislature at present, nor to make any specific appropriations for the purpose at this time, but simply to await the course of events and let the matter rest until the Governor in his judgment should think it necessary to call on the Legislature, by proclamation or otherwise. In arriving at this conclusion, the committee claimed to have been acting in a wise and temperate spirit. This was substantially the report made by the committee to the caucus. That body, which met at 7:30 P. M., appeared to consist of two elements, one urging the necessity of an appropriation to place the militia on a war footing as a matter of precaution, and the other advising a temporizing policy as best calculated just now to quiet the people and obtain if possible a peaceful and legal solution of the difficulty. Finally, after a debate which lasted for about two hours, the report of the committee was adopted; but it was additionally agreed that a committee consisting of four members of the House and two members of the Senate, should be appointed, to whom the bill making the appropriation for the reorganization of the Militia should be referred, and who should hold it subject to the course of events, taking no action thereon unless necessary.

THE DOMINION BOARD OF TRADE.

FIRST DAY OF THE ANNUAL SESSION—SUBJECTS UNDER DISCUSSION—DELEGATES FROM THE UNITED STATES ADMITTED—THE RIGHTS OF USING AMERICAN CANALS AND RIVERS.

OTTAWA, Jan. 17.—The annual session of the Dominion Board of Trade opened here to-day. The attendance was large. Among the subjects to be discussed are extradition, reciprocal use of canals and rivers, West India and South American trade, sugar duties, tax on lobster cans, fishery laws, &c. The President's address reviewed the trade of the Dominion for the past two years, and gave a series of statistics of imports and exports. No business of any consequence was transacted at the morning session. The American delegates will address the board this evening.

This afternoon the delegates to the National Board of Trade from the United States were introduced and accorded the privileges of the board, and requested to take part in the debates. The question of reciprocity was taken up by Mr. F. White, Jr., seconded by Mr. Fry. Resolutions were introduced in favor of the adoption of a treaty of reciprocity between the United States and Canada on a liberal and comprehensive basis, and in the event of the United States Government granting the request of the National Board for the appointment of a Commissioner together with the Commissioners to be appointed by Great Britain on the subject, this board urges Government to appoint a commission to join in the negotiations. Adopted.

Mr. J. C. Bates, of Boston, read an elaborate paper on the subject of the promised co-operation of the Boston Board of Trade in bringing about some understanding. Mr. Hervey, of Portland, Hon. J. D. Hayes, of Detroit, Mr. Orr of Buffalo, and a number of Canadian members spoke strongly in favor of a reciprocal treaty between the United States and Canada.

The next subject treated of was the impropriety of allowing American bottoms to be treated as Canadian vessels, by simple registration, and the following resolution in reference thereto was adopted:

Resolved, That the attention of the Government be called to the fact that foreign-built steamers and barges have been registered in the ports of the Dominion as owned by British subjects, said vessels being invariably mortgaged, and the original owners living abroad, this being an invasion of the Imperial laws detrimental to the interests of Canadian ship-owners. The question of securing to the Dominion the right of using American canals and rivers was touched upon and dropped. A resolution with the object of placing the extradition treaty between the United States and Great Britain upon such a basis as to secure the return of fraudulent debtors and those guilty of breach of trust was carried. The board then adjourned.

The following delegates, accredited by the National Board of Trade of the United States, have arrived here: Hon. A. C. Hervey, of the Portland Board; Wallace P. Groom, of the New-York Board; E. P. Dorr, of the Buffalo Board, and T. D. Hayes, of the Detroit Board of Trade.

THE WEATHER.

INDICATIONS.

WASHINGTON, Jan. 18—1 A. M.—For the Middle and Eastern States slowly falling or nearly stationary barometer, stationary to rising temperature, generally clear weather, southerly to westerly winds in the latter, and easterly winds shifting to southerly in the former.

RACING IN SOUTH CAROLINA.

CHARLESTON, Jan. 17.—The Spring meeting of the South Carolina Jockey Club, at the Washington Course, opened to-day. The weather was damp and foggy, and the track heavy. The first race, a mile dash, for all ages, for a purse of $120, was won by First Chance, Ascot second, and Abdallah third. Time—1:50½. The second race, mile heats, for all ages, for a purse of $150, was run between Brown Asteroid and Libbie L. The first was a dead heat. Brown Asteroid won the next two heats and the race in 1:53 and 1:55. The third race was a hurdle race, welter weights, over eight hurdles, two miles, for a purse of $120. The entries were Jim Hinton and Frang. The race was won by Jim Hinton by five lengths. Time—4:11.

THOUSANDS OF SNAKES IN MEMPHIS.

MEMPHIS, Jan. 17.—During a heavy rain storm on Monday, a fall of small live snakes was observed in the southern part of the city, where thousands of them could be seen yesterday. The snakes are each from one foot to 18 inches in length.

THE BRITISH COLUMBIA MAIL SERVICE.

OTTAWA, Jan. 17—Mr. Rhodes, of British Columbia, who has been here the past few days, has had an interview with the Premier on the improvement of the mail service between Victoria and San Francisco.

ARRESTED FOR ROBBING EMPLOYERS.

LATEST NEWS BY CABLE.

THE EASTERN QUESTION.

THE FINAL PROPOSALS OF THE POWERS—BELIEF THAT THEY WILL BE REJECTED — POLAND'S OPPORTUNITY — WILL RUSSIA ACCEPT THE CONCLUSIONS OF THE CONFERENCE—THE LONDON TIMES DOUBTS IT.

BUCHAREST, Jan. 17.—Safvet Pasha, the Turkish Minister of Foreign Affairs, has ordered the Turkish commandant at Silistria to punish the Bashi-Bazouks who crossed the Danube on the night of the 8th inst. and plundered a Roumanian outpost and killed two Roumanian soldiers.

CONSTANTINOPLE, Jan. 17.—It is believed that the Grand Council to-morrow will reject the final proposals of the powers. The Turkish Government is stated to have decided for the present not to issue the £7,000,000 Turkish paper money which was recently decreed.

LONDON, Jan. 17.—A dispatch to the Pall Mall Gazette from Berlin says: "It is stated that Baron Von Werther, the German Ambassador at Constantinople, is instructed not to sign the final protocol about to be submitted to the conference without having previously reported its text to Prince Bismarck and received a reply."

PARIS, Jan. 17.—The Messager de Paris reports that Russia has countermanded all the supplies which she had ordered in Germany. Gen. Tchernayeff has arrived in this city from Dresden.

LONDON, Jan. 18.—A dispatch from Belgrade to the Standard reports that the Russian Col. Milaradovi, commanding a brigade 6,400 strong, composed of Servians, Bulgarians, Russians, and others, in Servia, has promulgated an order of the day announcing that the brigade will henceforth be paid by the Russian Government. The first payment was to be made yesterday.

The Berlin correspondent of the Standard declares, notwithstanding the reports to the contrary, that the Poles seem determined to take advantage of Russia's difficulties. The North German Gazette states that the powers whose interests are involved are paying greater attention to Polish agitation than heretofore. Russia has rescinded the ukase by which emigrants were enabled to return to Poland under certain conditions.

The Times in its leading editorial discusses the opinion which is held by a large portion of the press and by the public generally, that Russia will quietly accept the abortive conclusion of the conference, and says: "We trust it will prove correct. But if we hold this opinion it must be as a matter of faith and not of evidence. What are the facts upon which judgment should be founded? The Czar's Moscow speech remains unmodified by any later utterance. The Russian Army is now indisputably in a high state of preparation. The latest news from Odessa, in a letter dated Jan. 12, and published in the Cologne Gazette, is that the railway company has again been ordered to suspend goods traffic from Jan. 15, as large numbers of troops, especially from the vicinity of Moscow, are to be sent southward. It is admitted that addresses continue to pour in upon the Czar almost daily from all parts of the Empire. The correspondent who states this fact adds, however, what is, of course, his personal impression that the popular enthusiasm is fast dying out. Allowing full weight for his judgment the inference from the above facts must be that the Czar has not abandoned his purpose. On the other hand Gen. Ignatieff has been the foremost advocate of conciliation at Constantinople. Are we to interpret Ignatieff's attitude as showing the Czar wants an excuse to refrain from war or is it simply a demonstration of his zeal for peace, which having failed leaves him free to fulfill the Moscow declaration? One alternative is as plausible as the other."

In connection with the above it is to be noticed that the Belgrade correspondent of the Times says information derived from Russian officers, who have arrived at Belgrade from Kichineff, shows that previous accounts of the bad condition of the Army were exaggerated.

"I am inclined to believe," continues the correspondent, "that the Russians are not averse to allowing their enemies to underrate the strength of the blow they are prepared to deal."

A Berlin dispatch to the Times says the preparations to cross the Pruth actively continue. A Pera special to the Daily Telegraph reports that Turkey and Servia have agreed to an exchange of prisoners. Gen. Tchernayeff, interviewed in Paris, said he doubted not that war would be renewed in the Spring.

All the Constantinople correspondents of the London journals, and nearly all those at other European centres, express the decided opinion that the Turks will not yield. The Daily News' dispatch from Constantinople says the ultimatum is a more efficient document than at first supposed. It does not sacrifice the executive powers of the international commission.

GERMANY.

THE SOCIALIST AGITATIONS—NEGOTIATIONS REOPENED WITH FRANCE—THE PARIS EXPOSITION.

LONDON, Jan. 17.—A Berlin special to the Pall Mall Gazette says: "The Socialists are not likely to succeed in any of the second ballots for Parliament, as the Conservative Parties are now thoroughly united against them, except the Ultramontanes, who will support the Socialists in some districts. The Government proposes to reintroduce the bill already once before Parliament, making more severe penal provisions against Socialist agitations."

A special dispatch to the Daily News from Berlin states that negotiations have been reopened between Germany and France, and there is now a probability that Germany will reconsider her original decision and agree to participate in the Paris Exhibition in 1878.

MISCELLANEOUS FOREIGN NOTES.

CALCUTTA, Jan. 17.—The Government of India has forwarded a dispatch to the India Office at London, estimating the total cost to the State on account of the relief works and other measures for mitigating the famine in Madras and Bombay at £6,500,000.

LONDON, Jan. 17.—Silver was quoted to-day at 57¾d. per ounce. India Council bills were awarded to-day at about 1/4d. per rupee advance.

PARIS, Jan. 18.—The Rome correspondent of the Univers say it is believed that Pope Pius intends to fill up all the vacant cardinalates.

FATAL RAILROAD ACCIDENT.

PORT JERVIS, Jan. 17.—The trucks of the express car on the Atlantic express train going east, broke near Lackawaxen this morning at 8 o'clock, throwing the car from the track to the left, striking a passenger-car on a way-train going west, by which Maggie Barton had her skull fractured, and two passengers and one train-man were slightly injured. Maggie Barton's injuries will prove fatal.

HEAVY RAINS IN CALIFORNIA.

SAN FRANCISCO, Jan. 17.—Later dispatches indicate that the storm is spreading southward. It was raining throughout the southern counties last evening, as well as in the central and northern parts of the State, and reports from all points say the prospects are good for a continuance of rain.

NEW-YORK EYE AND EAR INFIRMARY.

The fifty-first annual meeting of the New-York Eye and Ear Infirmary was held last evening at the Infirmary on Second avenue and Thirteenth street, President Royal Phelps in the chair. After reading the minutes the following officers were renominated and unanimously elected: President, Royal Phelps; First Vice President, Benjamin H. Field; Second Vice President, A. Du Bois, M. D.; Treasurer, John L. Riker; Secretary, Charles M. Allen, M. D. Three vacancies in the Board of Directors were filled by the following named gentlemen: Hon. William E. Dodge, John Carey, Jr., Jacob D. Vermilye, all of whom were unanimously elected. The Treasurer announced the following bequest and donations: Estate of Thomas Barron, $5,000; B. F. Wheelwright, $1,000; special donation of $50 from James S. Stokes to provide spectacles for indigent patients; Mrs. A. T. Stewart, $2,000; F. W. Mayer, $100; Messrs. J. J. Astor, W. C. Schermerhorn, J. B. Cornell, Rutherford Stuyvesant, J. D. Vermilye, and John Carey, Jr., contribute each $150, constituting them life governors. The annual report of the Directors was read, showing that 9,701 patients had been treated during the past year. Resolutions of respect and regret were adopted with regard to the deaths of Edward H. Owen, late legal adviser to the board; Dr. George Wilks, First Consulting Surgeon, and Dr. Hermes Herman Althof, Executive Surgeon. Dr. Charles M. Allin was elected Consulting Surgeon in place of Dr. Wilks.

THE BERDELL LITIGATION.

TRIAL OF THE SUIT OF ROBERT H. BERDELL AGAINST HIS FORMER WIFE AND OTHERS FOR THE CONVERSION OF $30,000 WORTH OF PROPERTY—TESTIMONY OF THE PLAINTIFF—THE COMPLAINTS DISMISSED.

From an Occasional Correspondent.

GOSHEN, Wednesday, Jan. 17, 1877.

The case of Robert H. Berdell against Mrs. Eliza W. Parkhurst, Mrs. Harriett B. Berdell, (his divorced wife,) Hon. Ambrose S. Murray, Wisner Murray, (now deceased) and others, for the conversion of about $30,000 worth of personal property on Nov. 9, 1875, when, during Mr. Berdell's absence, Mrs. Berdell left his house, taking her three children with her and the property in question, was called this morning before Judge Dykman, of the Supreme Court, now sitting at the Court-house in this village. The Court-house has been filled all day long. Messrs. Fullerton, Knox & Crosby, and Hon. Charles H. Winfield, of New-York, and Messrs. Bacon & Duryea, of Goshen, appear for the defendants, and William A. Beach and Lewis E. Carr, of New-York, and H. W. Nanny, of Goshen, for the plaintiff.

The first witness was the plaintiff, Mr. Robert H. Berdell. He testified that he now resides in New-York City, but spends most of his evenings with his sister at Allendale, N. J.; he commenced living in Goshen about nine years ago, and kept up such residence until last Summer; he had a family consisting of a wife and six children, the wife being his second; by her he had five children, three of whom are now living; while he lived here he conducted business in New-York, where he went almost daily; on the evening of Nov. 9, 1875, he discovered that the most valuable part of his household furniture had been removed from his house during his absence; his wife and children were also missing, and the house was found in the utmost confusion. The witness gave a list of the articles taken, the aggregate value of which was about $30,000. Some of these articles the witness thought were now worth twice as much, and others five or six times as much as their cost price; none of the articles above-named were ever given to Mrs. Berdell; some of the articles, however, enumerated in the bill of particulars, and which were stricken out on application of plaintiff's counsel, (jewelry and wardrobe,) were given to Mrs. Berdell, but a mosaic table and other personal property were not. The property given to Mrs. Berdell was not, the plaintiff said, given to her to run away with. [Laughter.] She did not own one of the articles taken by her on Nov. 9, 1875, except those mentioned. Witness owned the property unconditionally, and never stated that it should be had given it to Mrs. Berdell. In the trial for alimony, witness said he alluded to real estate, when he said that every vestige of property in Goshen had been conveyed away. When Mrs. Berdell left his house she moved into another house at the upper end of the village, owned by Mr. Miller. The former belongs to the witness' son, Charles P. Berdell. Counsel for defense endeavored to show where Mrs. Berdell had resided since November, 1875, and that witness knew where the personal property was, but the court excluded the testimony. Witness was asked if he had called at the house where Mrs. Berdell had lived since 1875, but the question was overruled. It was the habit of the witness to make Mrs. Berdell a present at the birth of a child; when she became the mother of their twin daughters, who died, witness promised to give her a handsome pair of solitaire diamond earrings, and gave her security for the fulfillment of the promise the Gignoux Winter landscape painting; afterward the ear-rings were purchased at a cost of over $2,000, and given to Mrs. Berdell in place of the painting; the value of the articles stricken from the bill of particulars amounted to about $15,000.

Thomas McGowan, a truckman, was then questioned to prove the carting away of the goods. He went to Mr. Berdell's house at 9 o'clock in the morning and did not get through until 2:30, and made some eight or nine trips between the houses of Berdell and Mr. Miller; he was ordered to do the work by the late Wisner Murray, and was paid by that gentleman.

Hugh Masterson, a detective, testified that he was at the Berdell mansion; was sent there by Judges Williams and S. W. Fullerton; when there he conversed with Mrs. Berdell about removing the property; witness was not subpœnaed as a witness, but came here at the request of counsel for defense; he assisted in removing the property, but said no tables were taken away; Fullerton, Knox & Crosby paid witness for services rendered in the matter; Mrs. Berdell gave witness orders as to what property to take away.

Hon. A. S. Murray knew nothing of the removal of the property until it took place, and don't think his wife had anything to do with the scheme; his coachman had no instructions from him, nor any member of his family, to assist in removing the property.

Mrs. Gertrude Murray, wife of the late Wisner Murray, and one of the defendants, said she was present part of the time, and the articles she took away were statements given to Mrs. Berdell by her father; she went there to take care of her sister's children, and was up stairs with Miss Lizzie Berdell when the articles were taken; Mrs. Berdell is now living in what is called the Howell House.

Mrs. Parkhurst, another defendant, testified that she was a resident of Berdell's house from 1867 to Nov. 9, 1875; was there when the property was removed and knew of the pre-arranged plan to remove it; the scheme was talked of and determined upon in the office of Fullerton, Knox & Crosby, in New-York. It was done, she thought, by the advice of Judge William Fullerton. The witness contradicted the testimony of Detective Masterson about the tables, saying that she saw the tables afterward at the Miller house. She thought Mrs. Berdell should have what belonged to her, and therefore favored the removal of the property.

Counsel on behalf of Hon. A. S. Murray and Frances Murray, his wife, moved to dismiss the complaint, and the other side acceding to the application, the motion was granted. The same action was taken in Mrs. Gertrude Murray's case. In regard to the case of the late Wisner Murray or his representatives, counsel for the plaintiff elected to proceed no further, and the complaint was dismissed. A long argument ensued on the motion to let Mrs. Parkhurst escape from the meshes of the case. Mr. Beach severely criticised her conduct, and said emphatically that she was privy to what he called a conspiracy, concocted and determined upon in a New-York law office, and consented to and favored the intended action. He quoted extensively from authorities to sustain his position, authorities, he said, that were very decisive on the point. The motion was, however, granted, and this left no defendant but Mrs. Berdell. A motion was then made to dismiss complaint as regard her, on the ground that no action at law can be maintained by a husband against his wife, and because Mr. and Mrs. Berdell were husband and wife at the time of the alleged conversion of property, and also at the time of the commencement of the action. The argument on this point was ably presented by counsel, but the Court granted the motion, and thus disposed of the case. A stay of proceedings for 60 days, to allow the plaintiffs to make a case for the General Term, was granted. Mr. Beach is satisfied that the point raised by the defense is not tenable.

A GIFT TO HAMILTON COLLEGE.

Special Dispatch to the New-York Times.

UTICA, Jan. 17.—Rev. Peter Lockwood, Hon. S. D. Hand, and Hon. Charles McKinney, all of Binghamton, have given Prof. Frink $1,500 for the rhetorical library of Hamilton College, as a testimonial of her late triumph at the intercollegiate contest in oratory in New-York.

LAW SUIT.

STEINWAY & SONS VS. WM. KNABE & CO.

In the suit of Steinway & Co. against William Knabe & Co., to prevent them from using other and stronger language in their advertisements of the merits of their pianos than the Commissioners of the Centennial Exhibition prescribed, the answer of Knabe & Co. was filed yesterday. It insists "that in the advertisement complained of they have but exercised their undoubted right to interpret the award of the Centennial Commission according to their own understanding and conviction of its sense; that their said interpretation is a fair and proper one, fully justified by the terms and spirit of the award itself, that it is not, it is for the public and not for the courts of justice so to adjudge; that the complainants have no more right than any other of their competitors to quarrel with said advertisement, and in order to establish even a color of right are bound to aver and show, not only that the respondents did not receive the highest award, but that they themselves did, which is untrue and impossible to be shown."—From Baltimore Bee, Jan. 16.

ATTACKED IN THE BOWERY.

Shortly after 9 o'clock yesterday morning, George Williams, aged 24, residing at Melrose, Mass., entered the drug store at the corner of Bowery and Second street, bleeding profusely from a very severe cut on his head. He was very much intoxicated, and a policeman who was called had the injured man removed to the station-house at the corner of First avenue and Fifth street. His wounds were dressed by the Ambulance Surgeon, and he was then taken to Bellevue Hospital, where he told the Surgeon in attendance that he had been attacked in the Bowery, and beaten and robbed of $15. Capt. McCullagh is making an investigation.

COAL FOR THE POOR.

President Brennan, of the Board of Commissioners of Charities and Correction, was occupied all day yesterday in supervising the distribution of coal among the the poor of the Eighteenth Precinct. As the coal was delivered, it was weighed on a small platform, in order to insure the receipt of the proper quantity. In some instances the weight fell short, and in consequence, Mr. Brennan has determined that a very rigid examination shall be made of all the coal delivered to the poor.

A LARGE FORGERY.

A BROADWAY BANK VICTIMIZED.

HOW A CLEVER FORGER PASSED A BOGUS CHECK ON THE UNION TRUST COMPANY FOR $62,400—EXCITEMENT IN WALL STREET OVER THE TRANSACTION—ARREST OF HORACE E. BROWN, A BROAD STREET BROKER, ON SUSPICION.

It was rumored in Wall street early yesterday morning that "a great forgery" had been detected, and that the Union Trust Company had been victimized for a large amount. Upon inquiry, Mr. King, the President of the company, denied that the institution had lost any money. His nervous manner induced other questions, which he refused to answer. He said, however, that in a few days he would make a statement to the public. Shortly after the interview with Mr. King, the following warning was sent over the wires of the Gold and Stock Telegraph:

The public are cautioned against negotiating our check, No. 10,392, for $9,500, gold, on Bank of New-York, certified by bank, payment having been stopped on account of fraud.

W. T. HATCH & SONS.

Inquiry elicited the fact that the above telegram was sent out at the request of President King, of the Union Trust Company. From statements made by Messrs. Hatch and others, the following facts in connection with the matter have been obtained:

For a long time past the New-York Life Insurance Company, of No. 346 Broadway, has had a large account with the Union Trust Company, whose banking-house is at the corner of Broadway and Rector street. On Jan. 2, inst., a check for $62,400, purporting to have been drawn by the former institution, was presented to the Cashier of the latter. It apparently bore the signature of Mr. Morris Franklin, President, and of other officers of the life insurance company, and in all respects appeared to be genuine. The Cashier of the Trust Company, therefore, certified it without hesitation. On the same day, (Jan. 2,) Mr. G. L. Maxwell, whose office is at No. 6 New street, was approached by a person who said his name was Brown. He presented a letter, apparently coming from Mr. Morris Franklin, in which Mr. Maxwell was requested to state the terms upon which he would act as the broker in Wall street of the New-York Life Insurance Company. The letter stated the company was dissatisfied with its present agent. "Mr. Brown" talked for a long time with Mr. Maxwell, and his conversation was that of an experienced business man. Mr. Maxwell asked time to consider the proposition made to him, and "Mr. Brown" graciously accorded it. The next day the latter appeared in Mr. Maxwell's office, and showing the check for $62,400, certified on the previous day by the Union Trust Company, asked him to purchase $50,000 gold for him. Mr. Maxwell then introduced Brown to Mr. S. L. Blood, the lessee of the office in which the former has a desk, and after consultation the two gentlemen agreed to purchase the required amount of gold. The certified check was left with them, and they made their purchases. From the firm of William T. Hatch & Sons Mr. Blood bought $9,500 of gold, and received a gold check for that amount on the Bank of New-York. From this, Mr. Blood gave his individual check for $10,141 25. The gold check of Hatch & Sons, with other checks of a like character, and a quantity of gold coin, were delivered by Messrs. Blood and Maxwell to "Mr. Brown." Mr. Blood deposited the certified check for $62,400 in the Mechanics' Bank and in due course it was collected by the Union Trust Company. The business seemed to be thus settled and "Mr. Brown" disappeared from the view of his brokers.

Nothing wrong in the transactions appeared until last Tuesday. On that day the accounts of the New-York Life Insurance Company with the Union Trust Company were audited. While checking off the entries the Cashier of the insurance company came upon the check for $62,400. He had no recollection of such a check, and upon investigation discovered that it was not recorded on the stubs of the check-book. Yet it had a genuine appearance, and the signatures upon it appeared undoubtedly real. He then showed it to President Franklin. That gentleman was astonished at the remarkable imitation of his signature, but immediately pronounced the check a forgery. Information of the fact was sent to President King, of the Union Trust Company. He immediately set about tracing the course of the check. It was soon found to have been deposited in the Mechanics' Bank by Mr. Blood, who, upon being questioned told substantially the story given above. Further investigation revealed the fact that the gold check issued by Messrs. Hatch & Sons had not up to that time been presented to the Bank of New-York for payment. That bank was thereupon requested by Mr. King to have the payment of the check stopped. When a simple request to that effect was made upon the bank, however, the officials of the institution refused to obey it. They decided that they must pay it, unless some definite declaration of fraud attending the issuance of the check was made. Messrs. Hatch & Sons, to make their position clear, determined to make the matter public, and, after consultation with Mr. King, published the caution printed above. Upon receipt of this notification, and a further explanation from Messrs. Hatch & Sons, the bank officials decided not to pay the check. It is thought by Messrs. Hatch & Sons that "Brown," after obtaining their gold check, which was certified by the Bank of New-York, became afraid to present it for payment. The other operations of the forger were too bold, however, for this supposition to hold good; and, besides, it appeared that "Brown" or a confederate had made an attempt to sell the check over the counter of a broker. On Tuesday a man entered the office of H. Mannel, at No. 23 Wall street, and presented the check for sale. It bore evidence, it is said, of having passed through the National Exchange Bank, and was indorsed by somebody, whose name cannot be ascertained, as attorney for S. L. Blood. Mr. Manuel sent to the National Exchange Bank to ascertain if it would guarantee the attorneyship, and, upon receiving a negative answer, refused to purchase the check.

Mr. Blood, when spoken to about the forgery, refused positively to make any statement. He said he had been requested by Mr. King to remain silent. Neither Mr. Morris Franklin, President, nor the Cashier of the New-York Life Insurance Company, could be found yesterday. Another officer of the company, however, made a brief statement of his knowledge of the fraudulent affair, which agrees with the details given above. It is understood that the Union Trust Company will make a claim upon the Mechanics' Bank for the $62,400 procured upon the forged check. It is also reported that the real identity of "Mr. Brown" has been ascertained, and that he is a person who has done business with both the New-York Life Insurance and Union Trust Companies, thus becoming acquainted with their inner workings. These reports could not be verified last night. The letter purporting to have been written by Mr. Franklin, and delivered to Mr. Maxwell by "Mr. Brown," with other documents bearing upon the case, are now in the hands of Mr. King, of the Union Trust Company. Detectives Sampson, Silleck, and Doyle yesterday afternoon arrested Horace E. Brown, a broker, of No. 35 Broad street, on suspicion of having been implicated in the forgery. The prisoner was taken before Superintendent Walling, at Police Headquarters, and locked up for the night. It is understood that three other men will also be arrested today on suspicion.

It was rumored late yesterday afternoon that a forged check for $27,000 had been discovered by a firm, into whose hands it had come in the regular course of business, and it was furthermore declared that "Mr. Brown" was suspected of having originally altered it.

THE WATER SUPPLY.

VIEWS OF COMMISSIONER CAMPBELL, OF THE DEPARTMENT OF PUBLIC WORKS—A STORAGE RESERVOIR REQUIRED.

The special committee of the Board of Aldermen, appointed to inquire into the necessity of securing a better supply of Croton water for this City, held their first session yesterday in the Chamber of the Common Council. Commissioner Campbell, of the Department of Public Works, was present for the purpose of furnishing such information on the subject as might be required. In reply to various questions put to him by Mr. Tuomey, the Chairman of the Committee, Mr. Campbell said that the scarcity of water which had been felt in the City was owing to the extreme drought that prevailed last Summer. The supply was the most limited they had had in many years. There was, however, enough water if it was properly stored. Even during the drought the supply was about 80 gallons a day to every person. What they required was storage reservoirs at the source of the supply. One was now being built which would hold 4,000,000,000 gallons of water. It would be completed in 1878, and there would then be a sufficient quantity for the people for some time to come. If storage reservoirs had been built before this, the drought would not have caused the scarcity that was complained of; and if the drought had continued, it would have been necessary to open more lakes in the adjacent counties and get a larger supply. A great deal of water was wasted on the docks, in livery stables, and in private houses. The waste in stables was very great; but the greatest waste was in dwelling-houses. The people in them let the water run in Summer to keep it cool, and in Winter to prevent the pipes from freezing. Water ought not to be used except for cleanliness, comfort, and necessity. They had high service pipes at High Bridge, which were of great benefit to the City in furnishing water. There could be nothing done now except to complete the new reservoir. As to the scarcity of water experienced in high buildings, it was owing to the fact that the water was below its proper level in the Park Reservoir, but it was gradually filling up. He did not approve of putting water-meters in private houses, but he thought that efforts should be made to prevent waste. He had appointed a number of men—all of them experienced—to find out where water was wasted, by visiting dwelling-houses, and what he had done was attended with a great deal of good. When the population of this City becomes a great deal larger than it is now, it might be necessary to consider the advisability of building a new aqueduct, so as to be in advance of any necessity that might arise; but the storage reservoir now being built would meet the necessities of the people for some time to come. Mr. Campbell then said that some of his views in relation to the water supply had appeared in two of his quarterly reports. After hearing this statement the committee adjourned until Wednesday next at 2 o'clock P. M.

A MAN WITH A MISSION.

HE BRINGS ABOUT A HAPPY MARRIAGE AND SUES FOR FEES REGARDING THE SAME—A DELICATE TRUST FULFILLED AND $400 ALLEGED TO BE DUE THEREFOR.

Mr. Leopold Stern, now of this City, but whilom hailing from different Western and Southern towns and cities, is a man who has discharged a delicate trust faithfully and well. He was only a traveling salesman, derisively called a "drummer," for the firm of Sutro & Newmark, of this City, but he is of the opinion, in common with several others, that his talents are not wholly restricted, as a corporation lawyer would say, "to the natural and usual scope of his employment." What the nature of the business of Sutro & Newmark is did not appear in a certain pleading just put in in a suit against them now begun by Stern in the Court of Common Pleas. One fact, however, did appear—to the credit of human nature be it said—and that is that one of the firm has, like Stern, a "soul above buttons," and one of those exquisitely sensitive, emotional natures in which prudence and affection are happily blended. This gentleman, presumably young in years, had looked with an affectionate eye, so to speak, on the personal loveliness of a young lady of New-Orleans, the other eye possibly—though this is not averred—glancing at the large portion of this world's goods with which the young lady aforesaid was endowed. He was, however, mindful of his business training, and was not willing to let "concealment, like a worm i' the bud, feed on the damask of his cheek," or words to that effect, but made up his mind that the fair object of his affections should be his. The manner of his procedure may perhaps prove of interest to other lovers, and for this reason is detailed by the reporter. The impressible member of the firm of Sutro & Newmark, heretofore referred to, was prompted by his love to annihilate space, after the manner of Puck, and hurriedly proceeding to New-Orleans, to throw himself and his all at the feet of the object of his honorable devotion. The prudence, however, already noticed as being one of his traits of character, here stepped in and suggested to his mind that this perhaps might not answer, and that a too sudden shock might disarrange the cheerful current of his true-love's thoughts and work injury to his suit. His native modesty, too, stepped in and deterred him from a too hasty declaration of his love. He was in a dilemma, but after careful pondering he bethought himself of Stern, Mr. Leopold Stern—his full name should be given to the trump of fame—and a gleam of hope shot athwart the firmament of his darkening prospects. "Stern," he reasoned, "is a traveler. He can therefore travel to New-Orleans with little difficulty, aided, as he undoubtedly will be, by sundry railroads, &c. Stern is an agent, and I need an agent in this matter. Stern makes sales on commission, and must therefore be conversant with commissions. This matter of mine being a commission, and a delicate one at that, Stern must evidently be posted and is just the man." He was satisfied with this logical deduction, and sent for Stern. The latter came duly and dutifully to his young employer's presence, fresh from Western scenes of wild excitement, and the sale of wares on the frontier. What thoughts were darting through the mind of Stern have not yet been made public, and may, indeed, never be. Whether he thought he had been recalled to be placed in a higher station, or whether he expected to be informed that he was a legatee under the will of some great millionaire, are matters perhaps too sacred to be lightly touched upon. One fact is plain. Mr. Stern came to his employer's presence, trembling with a sense of anxious solicitude and hopeful expectation. He was informed that his mission was to be the bringing about of the union, by the holy bonds of wedlock, of his young employer with a fair young Southern lady. He was somewhat staggered by the importance and the delicacy of the duty imposed on him. He did not, however, shrink from the task before him, but like a bold yeoman of old, who buckled on his leathern armor for his liege, he started on his mission with the zeal of those about Arthur's Round Table in their quest for the Holy Grail. It may be mentioned, however, here, lest some one be deceived, that Stern did not buckle on any armor, but merely "buttoned up his ulster" and took an early train. How he acted does not appear satisfactorily, but this may be owing to his thought "that there are some tender chords," &c. He arrived at New-Orleans, and he fulfilled his mission. Between the young lady and the impressionable member of Sutro & Newmark soon appeared tokens of love, evinced by an exchange of letters and later on by an exchange of cartes de visites. They were finally married, and have since been living happily together. Stern at first was so well satisfied with the manner in which he had discharged his trust, that his heart swelled with joy, and he had not even spleen enough left to kick a small boy who ran a sled against him and "barked" his shins. After a time, however, when his exultation began to wear away, he began to grew more prosaic and began to count the cost. He found that he had been engaged in the work for several weeks, and that he had lost about $900 in commissions which he would have made in the ordinary course of business. Mercenary thoughts like these kept intruding on his waking as well as on his sleeping dreams, and he mentioned the little matter of a bill for services to his employer. He wanted, in short, $900. He was paid $500, and now sues for the remaining $400, feeling satisfied, apparently, that another's happiness is not his, and that the laborer is worthy of his hire, though that be no higher than his ordinary rates of pay. The answer of the defendant will doubtless be put in in a few days.

THE PHELPS CONTEMPT CASE.

MR. BENNETT'S SURGEON AGAIN BEFORE JUDGE GILDERSLEEVE—HIS REPLY TO THE GRAND JURY'S COMPLAINT—DECISION RESERVED.

The Grand Jury of the Court of General Sessions came before Judge Gildersleeve yesterday, and, having handed up a bundle of indictments, the foreman, Mr. Courtlandt De P. Field, looking at Dr. Charles Phelps, who was present with his counsel, John A. Foley, said the Doctor had again refused to answer the questions put to him, and requested his Honor to dispose of the matter. Judge Gildersleeve asked upon what grounds the witness had refused to answer. The foreman replied, on the ground that it might criminate himself or render him liable to punishment. Judge Gildersleeve desired additional information as to the nature of the grounds of the witness' refusal to answer, whereupon Mr. Foley read the following statement, which Dr. Phelps had read to the Grand Jury the previous day:

"Without any disrespect, or intention of disrespect, I decline to answer each and all of the interrogatories propounded, upon the grounds, first, that the answer thereto, or to some part thereof, will expose or tend to expose me to penal liability, punishment, or to a criminal charge or offense; second, that the answer may or will criminate or tend to criminate me to a criminal offense, or subject me to an indictment and conviction therefor, either in this or in another State, or both; third, that the disclosure which the questions propounded call upon me to make, may be used against me to procure my conviction for a criminal offense, or to charge me with, or convict me of, a crime, in violation of law, or subject me to punishment for violation of the laws against dueling. Fourth, that the answer or disclosure sought may form a link in the chain of testimony which may be used to convict or charge me with the commission of a crime. I, therefore, claim the protection of the court, and invoke the rights secured to me by the common law, and the laws of the land in such cases; and for the reasons assigned by me, respectfully ask to be excused from answering the interrogatories propounded."

Judge Gildersleeve inquired if the questions propounded to the witness on that day were the same as those asked on the previous occasion, or whether any additional questions had been asked. The foreman of the Grand Jury replied that no questions had been added, and only some of those propounded on the former occasion had been asked. Judge Gildersleeve said that he would allow Dr. Phelps to go on his own recognizance until to-morrow, at 11 A. M., when he would announce his decision. Dr. Phelps and his legal adviser then left the court.

TILDEN'S FRIENDS IN SECRET SESSION.

The committee of Democrats having in charge the preparations for a mass meeting in regard to the Presidential question, and, as it is said, to urge the inauguration of Tilden next March, met last evening at the Everett House, ex-Mayor Wickham in the chair, and Hugh L. Cole acting as Secretary. Among those present were August Belmont, Peter B. Olney, William C. Whitney, Gen. Martin T. McMahon, James S. Thayer, Ed. L. Donnelly, Dr. John T. Nagle, Dock Commissioner Dimock, and Simon Sterne. The meeting of the committee was secret. It was ascertained, however, that nothing of importance was done. A meeting of the committee will be held next Saturday evening, when the form of a call for the meeting and other matters will be decided upon.

DEATH FROM A PISTOL-SHOT WOUND.

Dr. Nagle, Deputy Registrar of Records of the Board of Health, was informed yesterday that John Morris Hyne, aged 23, a clerk, had died from the effects of a pistol-shot wound in the left breast, which Hyne inflicted with suicidal intent on Nov. 27 last. The motive of the act is unknown, the friends of the deceased being extremely reticent regarding the facts. Coroner Croker has charge of the case.

LOCAL MISCELLANY.

MALARIAL EPIDEMIC.

MYSTERIOUS DEATH OF FOUR WOMEN IN THE EPILEPTIC HOSPITAL, BLACKWELL'S ISLAND—AN INVESTIGATION BY MEDICAL MEN—A CHEMICAL ANALYSIS OF THE BODIES TO BE MADE.

On Sunday morning last, Coroner Croker received a dispatch requesting him to investigate the cases of Lavinia B. Merrill, aged 19; Carolina Gardner, aged 31; Mary Poth, aged 38, and Mina Tape, aged 25, inmates of the Female Epileptic and Paralytic Hospital, Blackwell's Island, who died on Thursday night under mysterious circumstances. Deputy Coroner MacWhinnie, anticipating that the result of the post-mortem examinations would interest the medical profession, invited Drs. Finnell, Knox, Sterling, and others to assist him in making an autopsy in each case. The bodies were removed, at the request of the Coroner, to the Morgue in this City, and were early on Sunday placed in a dissecting room, where they were critically examined by Dr. MacWhinnie and the professional gentlemen whom he had invited to be present. Externally the bodies presented no marks of violence, and nearly all the internal organs were found to be in a normal condition. In one case evidences that death had resulted from epileptic convulsions were discovered, while in another the lungs were found to be inflamed to such an extent as to give rise to the supposition that acute bronchitis had been the cause of death. From the result of the post-mortem the doctors were inclined to the belief that death was in each case due to natural causes, but rumors having gained currency that the women were victims of narcotic poisoning, Dr. MacWhinnie took the precaution of placing the stomach of one of the women, and a portion of the viscera in a sealed jar for the purpose of having chemical analysis made.

The case was investigated yesterday by a reporter of THE TIMES, and the following facts in relation thereto were ascertained at the office of the Board of Charities and Correction: On Saturday, Dr. William McLean Hamilton, Visiting Physician of the Epileptic and Paralytic Hospital, addressed a communication to the Commissioners of Charities, in which he reported the death of the women and the fact that a large number of the patients were more or less affected by malarial fever, resulting from some defect in the drainage of the pavilion. In concluding his communication, Dr. Hamilton said:

"I strongly recommend and respectfully suggest the immediate removal of the female patients to either the 'dance hall,' Almshouse, or some place that your good judgment shall decide. Every hour is fraught with danger."

The board took immediate action on the receipt of the report. The female patients were all removed to a pavilion known as "Amusement Hall," which, under the personal supervision of Commissioner Brennan, was supplied with the necessary beds, bedding, &c. Supervising Engineer Knapp was directed to make a thorough examination of the abandoned hospital building, and to make needed alterations in the ventilating apparatus and drainage. At the request of the board, Dr. E. G. Janeway, of the Board of Health, and visiting physician of Bellevue Hospital, co-operated with Dr. Hamilton in a thorough investigation in the cases of the four women whose deaths were reported to the Coroner. The following abstract from the report of Dr. Janeway adds to rather than clears the mystery surrounding the cases:

"In all human probability the cause of death was due to some narcotic which the patients had procured and taken themselves, or which had been given them by some one. As no medicine of this kind was prescribed for them by the physician, it seems to me that an investigation is needed to ascertain how the medicine was obtained and who gave it. The case evidently belongs to the Coroner for thorough investigation, and I have so advised Dr. Hamilton. But, beyond this, I should advise a chemical examination of the contents of the stomachs and viscera, and for this end advised that the stomachs and some of the organs of the deceased should be placed in sealed jars. The necessity for the examination is, that such inquiry may prevent a repetition in the future. You may ask what agent could have produced such effects. I would reply that most of the phenomena are in accord with the supposition of poisoning by morphia. It suggested itself to me that it might possibly be some toxima, new agent recommended by some in the treatment of epilepsy, whose poisonous effects, as manifested in human subjects, are known from a very few cases, and hence may present such differences from its observed effects on animals as to have been the agent. There were no convulsions, such as usually occur in animals poisoned by this drug. The post-mortem appearances are in accord with this supposition, yet death might be due to morphine. I think a chemical analysis, for these reasons, absolutely necessary. The symptoms and the results of the post-mortem examination opposed the idea of congestive chills, cerebro-spinal meningitis, and such other diseases as produce rapid death, with such force as to amount to a moral certainty that the deaths were not due to them. I should be happy to aid you in any further examination which you might be pleased to desire in this case. Dr. Hamilton proposed the inquiry with me, and concurred in my opinion."

In concluding his report, Dr. Janeway suggested that the Epileptic Hospital be removed to the southern portion of the island, and thus placed more under the personal supervision of the visiting physician. On the 13th inst. Dr. Hamilton reported:

"Dr. Janeway and myself carefully investigated the deaths which occurred at the Female Epileptic and Paralytic Hospital, and, after the most rigid examination, are unable to give death certificates, and have therefore turned the matter over to the Coroner. It is a significant fact that since leaving the old pavilion there has been immediate improvement in the condition of those that were sick. One girl whom Mr. Brennan saw on Friday, and who we all supposed would die in the evening of that day, is alive and getting well. Beneath the middle of said pavilion we found a muddy spot, but Dr. Janeway does not think this sufficient to account for the symptoms. The instructions laid down in the report have been carried out as ordered, and the hospital is in good running condition."

Commissioner Brennan corroborates the assertion of Dr. Hamilton that all the patients who were suffering from illness when removed from the old hospital rapidly recovered in the improvised hospital in "Amusement Hall." Since the presentation of Dr. Janeway's report the opinion of his colleague, Dr. Hamilton, as to the cause of the sickness and mortality have changed. He is now positive that the inmates of the hospital were affected by a malarial epidemic, resulting from the condition of the land on which the hospital stands. This portion of the Island—the extreme northern end—was formerly marshy ground, and filled in with garbage and sweepings from the City. It has been considered by hospital authorities a decidedly unhealthy location, and for that reason the visiting physicians have repeatedly urged the removal of the epileptic and paralytic patients to the other end of the Island. Coroner Croker has not yet appointed a date for the inquest, but will do so when Dr. Withans, who has undertaken the task of making an analysis of the stomach and viscera, announces his readiness to report.

THE EMIGRATION COMMISSION.

ANNUAL REPORT FOR 1876—THE QUESTION OF HEAD-MONEY—NATIONALITY OF IMMIGRANTS—EXPENSES OF THE COMMISSION—RESUME OF OPERATIONS.

The report of the Commissioners of Emigration for the year 1876 was transmitted to the Legislature last night, and will be presented to-day. It opens with an account of the operations of the board since its organization, in connection with the question of head-money on immigrants, and gives the history up to the present time of the bill introduced in Congress in July last to impose a national tax upon the head of every immigrant arriving in the United States. It says that out of more than 8,000,000 immigrants reported as arriving in the United States since May 5, 1847, nearly 6,000,000, or about three-fourths of the whole number have landed at this port. The attention of the Legislature is called to the fact that the bill in Congress, even if it should become a law, will only provide for those immigrants who may land subsequent to its passage, and that it will be necessary to make such appropriation of money as will be needed for the care and maintenance of the immigrants who have already arrived until such time as the State can be reimbursed the money advanced, as is provided in the proposed law. Provision will also have to be made for the support of those immigrants who paid commutation, and whose claim on the State has not yet expired. The number of passengers from foreign ports who landed at this port in 1876 was 113,979, of whom 71,265 were aliens and 42,714 were citizens or persons who had before landed in the United States. The number of those who landed at Castle Garden, and thus came under the immediate care of this board, was 75,035. Of these 60,308 were alien, 2,351 were born in the United States, and 12,376 had previously landed at New-York or other ports in the United States. Of the whole number of aliens who arrived, 21,035 were from Germany, 13,314 from Ireland, 8,447 from England, 2,240 from Scotland, 5,636 from Russia, 2,618 from Italy, 3,693 from Sweden, 2,114 from Norway, 1,218 from Denmark, 2,168 from France, 1,210 from Austria, 2,721 from Bohemia, 493 from Hungary, 1,292 from Switzerland, 588 from Holland, 599 from Belgium, 253 from Wales, 82 from Luxemburg, 495 from West Indies, 860 from Spain.

During the year temporary relief, food, lodging, &c., was furnished 10,491 persons, and the sum of $1,397 was expended in forwarding destitute immigrants to their friends. The sum of $7,135 was received by the board for the purpose of forwarding immigrants on their arrival to their friends in the interior.

The Labor Bureau provided employment during the year for 10,215 immigrants, of which number 5,394 were males, and 4,821 females.

The receipts of the board for the year, including the sum of $127,617 97 on account of the State appropriation of $200,000, were $195,374 61, of which $193,597 78 were expended, leaving in hand on Dec. 31 a balance of $1,776 83. The report is signed by George T. Forrest, George W. Quintard, Daniel Manger, George Starr, Henry A. Hurlbutt, Smith Ely, Jr., James Lynch, and Sigismund Kaufmann.

ALLEGED FRAUDS IN WESTCHESTER.

THE KEEPER OF THE COUNTY POOR-HOUSE CHARGED WITH MISAPPROPRIATING LARGE QUANTITIES OF COUNTY SUPPLIES—HIS SON-IN-LAW THE PRINCIPAL WITNESS AGAINST HIM.

The committee appointed by the Board of Supervisors of Westchester County to examine into the charges of misappropriating the county supplies, thereby defrauding the county to the extent of several thousand dollars, which were recently preferred against William H. Hammond, the Keeper of the Poor-house, began an investigation into the matter yesterday at the Court-house, White Plains. The charges were first brought to the notice of the Grand Jury about the middle of last month, and Hammond was shortly afterward indicted for grand larceny, whereupon the present committee, which is composed of the Superintendents of the Poor of Westchester County and three members of the Board of Supervisors, all of the latter being lawyers, was appointed. The Chairman is Supervisor Read, of Yonkers. The first witness examined was Superintendent of the Poor, Adam Palm, Jr., who testified that he knew nothing of the charges until they were presented to the Grand Jury; the Superintendents visited the County-house about once a week; he had never seen any of the supplies abstracted from the County-house, nor did he ever hear of any of the inmates being inhumanly treated by Hammond; the Superintendents made a verbal contract with Keeper Hammond each year; Hammond's salary was $1,000 a year, besides which he received provisions for the use of his family.

Charles Dominick, Hammond's son-in-law, the person who, it is stated, first made known his father-in-law's irregularities, testified that he had been married to Hammond's daughter for the past six years; he lived at the County-house with his family, which is composed of his wife and two children; he was there from October, 1870, to May, 1871; afterward resided with his family at Hammond's farm at Pleasantville, being supported by the contents of the County-house; during the year he remained there until December, 1876; he knew of pauper children from the County-house being kept there since he left, and also of property having been taken from the County-house to the farm; Hammond sent about 4,000 bricks from the County-house to the farm in the Summer of 1875; at other times he saw County-house teams working on the farm. The witness himself carried them for plastering, laying sods, and other work; Hammond brought the teams there to be used in this work; Hammond owned four horses, which he kept at the County-house. The witness at Hammond's direction fed these horses with feed bought for the County-house; the paupers took care of them; the following Hammond's; he saw County-house oxen working on the Pleasantville farm; at one time they were there for three days; Hammond had a gray mare at the County-house which he kept for stock purposes; he knew of feed, corn, and oats having been brought from the County-house to Hammond's farm; he was the one of the stock there; on one occasion he held the bag while Hammond filled it with oats at the County-house; this occurred several times during the years 1875 and 1876; on one occasion the oats were taken from the County-house granary about 10 o'clock at night, the witness and Hammond being alone; two bags were filled and Hammond put them in a wagon which the witness drove to the farm; he took feed in this way on several occasions, always by Hammond's direction; he also saw quantities of corn taken from the County-house and drove the wagon containing it to the farm himself; hay was also removed from the County-house to the farm in the same manner last year; Hammond brought two bedsticks already made up to the farm; frequently he brought bags, containing sugar, tea, butter, meat, and other provisions, from the County-house to the farm; on one occasion the witness found some keys in the unoccupied drawer of a wash-stand in the garret of the house at Pleasantville; one of the keys unlocked a large chest which was also in the garret; on opening it he found that it contained a "small dry goods store;" in it were two pieces of new muslin, two whole pieces of new calico, and a number of smaller pieces of the same material, several petticoats, pairs of shoes, boxes of combs, and a quantity of needles, pins, thread, and buttons; while the witness lived at Pleasantville most of the sugar, tea, and other groceries used at the farm came from the County-house; the first Summer he lived there he had 17 boarders, and the next Summer 10; he also had a number of transient boarders all the time; he frequently received ham and fresh meat from the County-house; Hammond several times brought the articles himself; he also received quantities of butter in the same way; he was never charged for these things; the only thing he ever paid for was one ham, for which he gave $3; Hammond also brought and sent bags of flour from time to time; the witness always supposed that the things were given him to live on; his family while at Pleasantville were mainly supported on provisions sent by Hammond from the County-house; the house at the farm was almost entirely built by paupers, and four carpenters, inmates of the County-house, worked all one Summer at its interior. It is generally understood that Dominick was actuated in exposing his father-in-law by some disagreement which he had with the latter in regard to family matters. Dominick's wife has left him and is now living with her parents. The investigation will be resumed to-day.

THE BOARD OF EDUCATION.

A PROTEST AGAINST LITIGATION IN A CERTAIN SUIT—PRECAUTIONS AGAINST FIRE.

The Board of Education held a meeting yesterday afternoon, President Wood in the chair. A report from the Inspectors of the Fourth School District in reference to the condition of the buildings in their district was received and adopted. A communication was read from Judge Sandford E. Church, as counsel for James C. Isaacs, a contractor, protesting against any further litigation by the board in the suit brought by Mr. Isaacs for the recovery of the amount due him on a contract for building a school-house in District No. 64. Mr. Church, after reviewing the case, says, in his communication, that if any further steps are taken in contesting the case he shall deem it his duty to protest through the press against the waste of the people's money. A communication on the same subject was received from Corporation Counsel Whitney, in which he says he considers the case sufficiently important to warrant it being carried before the Court of Appeals. On motion of Commissioner Dowd, a committee of three, consisting of Messrs. Walker, Watson, and Beardsley, was appointed, with power to indemnify any sureties required in appealing the case. A communication was placed on file from Mr. E. J. Beckwith, of the United States Survey, offering to present to the Normal College a collection of specimens if the board would pay the cost of transporting them to this City from Colorado. A request from the Automatic Telegraph Company, asking permission to attach their wires and instruments to the several school buildings, was denied. The Building Committee, to whom was referred a resolution passed in December last, suggesting the necessity of drilling the children of the public schools in the proper conduct to be observed by them in case of fire, offered the following resolutions, which were adopted:

Resolved, That this Board deem it inexpedient to place Babcock's fire extinguishers in the several school-houses; and

Resolved, That the Trustees of the several wards be requested to instruct the Principals of the several schools and departments under their jurisdiction to train the pupils by necessary drill, so that they may on a sudden emergency be able to leave the building in the shortest possible time, and without confusion or panic.

On motion it was resolved to close Grammar School No. 63, in the Twenty-fourth Ward, during the progress of necessary repairs to the building, and the Trustees were notified to remove the furniture to a safe place during the work. The salaries of the teachers employed in the school will be continued. A resolution was passed directing the City Superintendent to keep a register of the graduates of the college and others desiring positions as teachers in the public schools; to detail them to certain schools on trial; and to keep a record of their teaching, and punctuality of attendance, to be obtained from the monthly reports of the principals of such schools. After some further routine business the board adjourned.

THE PHENIX BANK.

Formal notice was yesterday received by Mr. S. T. Russell, President of the Stock Exchange from Mr. John Parker, Cashier, of the reduction of the capital of the Phenix National Bank from $1,000,000 to $1,000,000. It was also announced that the transfer-books are closed except for the transfer of stock for cancellation, in conformity with vote of the shareholders at the meeting held on Tuesday, and of any stock the owners of which shall have conformed to the requirements of the vote by relinquishing four-ninths of the shares standing in their names, for which the bank will pay par value.

CITY AND SUBURBAN NEWS.

NEW-YORK.

The cost of removing 7,721 loads of snow from Broadway on Sunday last was $3,553 59.

Rev. Dr. Field will lecture to-night at the Charlier Institute, No. 108 West Fifty-ninth street, taking for his subject an account of his "Trip around the World."

At a meeting recently held by the Riot Relief Fund Committee, Mr. William H. Appleton was elected to fill the vacancy caused by the death of William R. Vermilye.

The benefit of accident insurance is again fully demonstrated by the late catastrophe at Ashtabula. So far as known, eight passengers on the ill-fated train were insured (to the amount of $35,000) in the Travelers', of Hartford.

Mrs. Lydia Newell, of No. 7 Jones street, last night accidentally shot herself in the left breast while carelessly handling a pistol belonging to her son, Henry Newell. She was attended by Dr. Finnell, of West Houston street, who pronounced the wound a dangerous one.

Mr. W. H. Wickham, the Receiver of the Security Life Insurance and Annuity Company, is sending out circulars to the stockholders of that concern reminding them of the fact that they have during several years been paid dividends which rightfully belonged to the policy-holders, and calling upon them to remit the same to him.

A Coroner's jury in the case of George McGill, whose death resulted from injuries received by being run over by a Third avenue car at the corner of Bowery and Houston street on the 4th inst., yesterday rendered a verdict recommending the passage of a law to compel railroad companies to place gates on the front platforms of their cars.

At a meeting of the Palette Club last evening, resolutions of respect and condolence were passed regarding the death of Mr. Francis A. Hart, formerly of the New-York Hotel, and a highly-esteemed member of the club. The members will attend the funeral, which will take place at 12:30 P. M. to-day from the Church of the Holy Communion, corner of Sixth avenue and Twentieth street.

The Yale Alumni Association will hold its regular annual meeting at Delmonico's, Twenty-sixth street and Fifth avenue, to-morrow evening, when an address will be delivered by Prof. William G. Sumner. At 9 P. M. an election of officers will take place, the following nominations having been made by the committee appointed for the purpose: President, William M. Evarts; Vice Presidents, Charles Tracy, William Walter Phelps; Secretary, Robert W. de Forest; Treasurer, Joseph C. Jackson; Executive Committee, A. DeWitt Baldwin, W. B. Ross, E. C. Seedman, Mason Young, W. R. Sperry.

BROOKLYN.

The Board of City Works has awarded a contract to Seth L. Keeny to clean the sewers of the city for a year, the contract price being $30,000.

Ann Freeman, a colored woman employed as a domestic at No. 128 Penn street, E. D., was arrested yesterday on a charge of causing the death of her illegitimate child.

The bond of William C. De Witt, as Corporation Counsel, has been filed in the City Clerk's office. The bondsmen are William Hester and William M. Van Anden, each of whom justified in the sum of $10,000.

Edward Malay, a lad of 13, who stole a watch and $60 in money from a fellow-boarder at No. 522 North Thirty-seventh street, Philadelphia, was arrested in Brooklyn yesterday, and returned to the former city for trial.

John Kirk, aged 19, residing at the corner of Lafayette avenue and Schenck street, was caught in the shafting of a Graham street rope-walk yesterday and severely injured internally. He was taken to the City Hospital.

Justice Ferry took his seat on the Bench of the First District Court yesterday, and appointed as his clerks Messrs. P. F. Cadden and Edward Moran. The appointments are made subject to the confirmation of the Board of Aldermen.

Bernard Higgins, employed in a brass factory in Pearl street, struck a fellow-workman named Anderson Williams on the head with a hammer yesterday, inflicting a severe scalp wound. The men had some dispute about work upon which they were engaged. Higgins was locked up.

George Brenner, 74 years of age, and an inmate of the Home for Old Men conducted by the Little Sisters of the Poor, visited a friend on Tuesday afternoon. Attempting to return to the Home he lost his way and was obliged to take refuge from the cold in an unoccupied building. He was found at midnight with his hands and legs badly frozen.

Lewis Jones, a colored man residing at No. 29 Cranberry street, was committed by Justice Walsh yesterday, on a charge of attempting to shoot James Smith, another colored man, who resides at No. 201 Concord street. The attempt was made while Smith was trying to force his way into Jones' house to make an explanation of some kind to the latter.

At a meeting of the Board of Police yesterday Patrolman Owens, of the Tenth Precinct, was promoted to a Roundsmanship in the Twelfth Precinct; Roundsman Reardon, of the Twelfth, was promoted to a Sergeantcy in the Thirteenth Precinct; Patrolman May was made a detective in the Twelfth Precinct, and Detective Edward Rigge was transferred from the Fourth to the First Precinct.

NEW-JERSEY.

Thomas Fryerly, one of the victims of the coasting accident in Newark last Saturday, has since died of his injuries.

The Hudson County Board of Health and Vital Statistics reports 316 deaths in the county during December, and 420 births in November and December.

Garrett S. Cannon's residence on Main street, Bordentown, and J. B. Woodward's and George B. Raymond's houses on Park street were entered by burglars on Tuesday night and robbed of jewelry, silverware, and other goods, valued at several hundred dollars.

Mrs. Loden, a resident of Hightstown, who has been married only 18 months, committed suicide on Tuesday by blowing one side of her head off with a gun. No cause can be assigned for the deed other than that a mania for suicide seems to be hereditary in her family. She was only 21 years old.

The funeral of Mundert Van Horn will take place at 2 o'clock this afternoon, and the funeral services will be conducted by the venerable Dr. Taylor, of the Bergen Reformed Church. Mr. Van Horn was a member of Dr. Taylor's church for more than fifty years, and held the office of deacon for many years.

William L. Darragh, who was arrested a few days ago on a charge of embezzling from an Elizabeth hatter named Taylor, by whom he was employed, was arraigned in the First District Police Court yesterday morning for examination. Taylor was called to the witness stand, and stated that he did not wish to press the charge, as the matter had been compromised. Justice Reese thereupon discharged Darragh and astonished Taylor by placing him under arrest for compounding a felony. Taylor claims that he made the compromise by advice of the Police authorities, and that he had no idea he was violating any law.

THE PROPOSED WAY OF COUNTING.

THE MEASURE REPORTED IN BOTH HOUSES —ABSORBING INTEREST SHOWN IN THE SUBJECT—TEMPER OF LEADING PUBLIC MEN AT THE CAPITAL AS TO THE PROJECT—GROUNDS OF THE OPPOSITION AND FAVOR THE SCHEME MEETS — CONSTITUTIONAL PRINCIPLES INVOLVED.

Special Dispatch to the New-York Times.

WASHINGTON, Jan. 18.—The bill of the Joint Committee, presented to Congress to-day, has absorbed such universal attention that all other subjects are for the time forgotten, and two really able speeches in the House were neglected, which ordinarily would have been closely followed. Proctor Knott succeeded in his purpose of having the report of the Committee on Privileges first before the House, but his speech was regarded as a bore, when it was discovered five minutes after he began that the report of the Joint Committee had just come in, and would have been reported if Knott had but a little delayed in taking the floor. The reading of the bill and report was listened to with unusual attention and silence on the floor and in the galleries. Everybody was anxious to catch every word. The time occupied by the formal reading and order to print was brief, and when the regular business of the House was resumed everybody began at once to seek for the opinions of everybody else. For a time most of the Republicans were non-committal, except in confidence, wisely, perhaps, desiring not to place themselves in positions where they would not be inclined to remain after mature consideration. The Republicans are, this evening, quite generally expressing themselves as willing to consider the bill and give a patient hearing to discussion; but they will not, in advance, say whether they will oppose or vote for it. The Democrats are more outspoken, and seem to have made up their minds one way or the other. The strongest opposition and the warmest support are found on the Democratic side. The Republicans may be as much divided, but they express themselves with more caution. There are two classes of objections urged by Republicans against the bill. One is by those who feel that the laws now existing, if executed, will certainly give the Presidency to Mr. Hayes. They oppose the bill because they say it is giving up a surety for something that is uncertain, and they very truly remark that if the party situation was exactly reversed, no Democrat would be found who would consent a moment to abandon such advantages as the Republicans possess.

The second class of objections is to the bill itself, as an unconstitutional or an impolitic measure. Some hold it is unconstitutional by reason of the establishment of the commission in which persons not members of Congress are given the power of exercising judicial functions, which, if they belong to Congress, cannot be delegated to any other tribunal. There is one still more important point, which Gen. Garfield raises, that has been left in doubt by the bill. It is uncertain whether the bill is to be construed to grant authority to the commission to go back of the election by the States, or to examine into the election of Electors, further than to see if the constitutional restrictions placed upon the States have been observed. If the bill authorized the commission to merely go behind the certificates to ascertain whether the requirements of the Constitution and federal law have been observed, that is one thing; but to go back of the election of Electors is quite another, and is a power which cannot be regarded and which never has been seriously claimed as constitutional. If such a construction of the bill is claimed, Gen. Garfield will surely oppose the measure with all his power. Further than this he does not wish to commit himself, but it is well understood he does not like the scheme.

There is also a strong feeling against having the Supreme Court mixed up in the controversy. The Senate, because of this sentiment, defeated Mr. Edmunds' proposition to refer the disputes to the Supreme Court. The bill refers to a portion of the court practically the same questions that the Senate refused to refer to the whole court. Secretary Morrill, whose views are more fully stated elsewhere, expresses very mildly a single phase of the feeling that exists against involving the Supreme Court in a partisan arbitration, and his suggestion that it would be preferable to refer the subject to the whole court as a court will meet with many hearty responses. The Democrats who oppose the bill do so on the ground generally that the arbitration would take the Presidency from the grasp of Tilden, and they say it would be much better for the Democracy to have Hayes declared President by the President of the Senate than to have their candidate defeated by a tribunal that cannot be attacked.

The Democrats who favor the bill look upon it as an unexpected offering by the Republicans, and as a good opportunity to retreat from an attitude of useless opposition to Hayes, which they feel cannot be maintained. Some Democrats have scruples about the Constitution. The Southern Democrats, except from two or three States, are inclined to support the bill, for reasons not very definitely given. Some say they do not care who is President.

The bill will receive a strong support on the Republican side, both in the House and Senate, but how extensive in numbers cannot be foretold. The reasons given are that the people demand a settlement, and will give the plan such an indorsement as to compel its adoption. There are many Republicans who think the measure is sure to pass anyway, and that it would be bad policy for the Republicans to attempt to defeat it, and, failing, allow the people demanding a settlement to look upon it as having been secured by the Democratic Party. Aside from such considerations of policy, Republicans almost unanimously feel such a degree of confidence in their cause that they are willing to trust it in the hands of a commission fairly impartial, and bound by oath to decide according to the Constitution and the laws.

It will be seen from this sketch, and from the brief statements of many members given in another place, that there is the greatest variety of opinion, and it will probably be inferred, as is the fact, that the bill meets with much more opposition than finds expression. The wishes of the people and the voice of the press will decide very largely whether this opposition shall increase, diminish, or be completely shifted. Within the party lines the almost unanimous expectation is that the bill will be passed, and a general change in its prospects of success would change considerably individual positions in both parties, so that the thing which seems so certain may turn out to be very uncertain. Republicans in the House are not much inclined now to make speeches, and in that business the Democrats must lead off.

The choice of the committees in the two Houses has been left for an agreement outside of the bill. The understanding in committee was, that there should be three Democrats and two Republicans from the House, and three Republicans and two Democrats from the Senate, and that each party should name its own members of the committee, in caucus, and the persons designated should be elected. This arrangement, if carried out in good faith, would place representative men or both parties on the committee; but for such an arrangement it would be possible for five Democrats to be chosen in the House, and for the Democrats in the Senate so to cast their votes as to secure the election of one or two undesirable appointments from the Republican side, and practically capture the commission. This point will be carefully looked after.

OPINIONS OF PROMINENT MEN.

FAVORABLE AND UNFAVORABLE EXPRESSIONS ON THE PROPOSED METHOD—NO DISTINCT PARTY DIVISION IN THE SENTIMENTS ENTERTAINED.

Special Dispatch to the New-York Times.

WASHINGTON, Jan. 18.—The following are some of the expressions of Senators and members, freely made and briefly recorded, as nearly as possible, in their own words. Senator Christiancy said it would take some study for him to determine whether or not he liked the bill, but the more he looked at it the more favorably he was impressed and thought that the committee had proceeded in a spirit of perfect fairness toward both parties. He thought he would support it. Senator Cameron, of Wisconsin, says he looks favorably upon the work of the committee, and will support the bill. Senator Booth says he is in favor of the bill, as an expedient in the interest of peace. Senator Ingalls, when asked what he thought of the measure, said he liked it as well as he would any prize-package document, and did not believe it necessary to hunt the country over to find a Supreme Judge who was in favor of Tilden for President. Senator Sargent said he was unalterably opposed to the measure. Senator Eaton said that the Constitution and the laws made the two houses of Congress the tribunal to count the Electoral vote, and he was opposed to transferring to any other body, no matter how respectable, any of the duties which devolve upon Congress, nor did he believe it could be done. He said he had great respect for the Supreme Court, but they had as much right to refer the question to Sir Edward Thornton as they had to this proposed commission. He had great respect for Sir Edward Thornton, but he did not want him to make a President of the United States. Neither did he want a commission to do it. Senator Wallace, of Pennsylvania, says that he is favorably impressed with the bill, and thinks he will support it. He says it gives Congress a sort of theoretical, if not a practical supervision, over the work of the commission, which would probably do away with any constitutional objections. Senator Whyte, of Maryland, says the bill is practically the same as was enacted by the Federalists in 1800, and is merely a temporary expedient to tide over the present emergency. As such he will vote for it. Senator Gordon says it may be the best they can do, but he does not like it as he at present understands it. Senator Allison, as at present advised, is inclined to be opposed to the bill. Senator Patterson, of South Carolina, is understood to be opposed to it. Senator West is inclined to look favorably upon it, but has not fully decided what he will do. Senator Withers, of Virginia, says: "It does not meet my views, but, nevertheless, I expect to support it, and believe it will pass." Senator Maxey, of Texas, says: "I have from the start made up my mind to support the decision of the committee, and I shall do so now because I believe that the result of their labors is worthy of my support." Senator Alcorn, of Mississippi, says: "I shall support the bill." Senator Chaffee, of Colorado, says he does not like the bill, but would dislike, in the present emergency, to take the responsibility of defeating it. Senator Price, of West Virginia, says he thinks he will vote for the bill. Senator Kelly says: "The bill strikes me favorably. I think I will vote for it." Senator Johnston, of Virginia, says he regards the bill favorably, but he would not like to say whether he would vote for it or not. Senator McCreery, of Kentucky, would not say whether he would support the bill or not. Senator Randolph says that he would not like to commit himself either way until after further consideration. Senator Bayard says that he regards the work of the committee as so eminently fair and just that no one ought to be willing to oppose it. Senator Ransom is pleased with the bill, and will give it his support. Senators Conkling and Edmunds, who, with Bayard and Ransom, are on the committee, are all for the bill, and will not only support it but urge its passage publicly and privately. The two Senators from Massachusetts, Messrs. Dawes and Boutwell, are non-committal upon the bill, but rather leave the inference that they are opposed to it. Senator Morton will present his dissenting views in the shape of a speech instead of a minority report.

In the House the diversity of opinion is as marked as in the Senate. Mr. Hurd, of Ohio, says, as he understands it, he is opposed to the measure. Mr. Walling, of Ohio, says it is an outrage on the Democracy and the country. Mr. Southard, of Ohio, says he is not favorably impressed with the proposition. Mr. Vance, of Ohio, says: "I am opposed to it." Mr. Bell, of New-Hampshire, says: "It is unconstitutional." Mr. Cate, of Wisconsin, says the bill is very adroitly drawn, and he is afraid of it. Mr. Hartridge, of Georgia, says there are some objections to it, but it will do. He will go as far as any man for peace. Mr. Terry, of Virginia, says: "I have strong objections to it, but may possibly vote for it." Mr. Goode, of Virginia, says: "I will support the measure." Mr. Walker, of Virginia, says: "If it's the fairest proposition I have heard, but am not prepared to say I shall vote for it." Mr. Tucker, of Virginia, says: "It is not exactly such a proposition as I would have drawn, but for fear that raising objections to minor points will jeopardize the bill, I shall vote for it as it stands." Mr. Douglass, of Virginia, profanely says: "I will see it in —— before I will vote for it." Mr. Cabell, of Virginia, says: "I don't like it, but may vote for it." Mr. Bright, of Tennessee, says: "It is absolutely illegal and unconstitutional, and if I vote for it I will do so under protest, and the country shall know it." Mr. Le Moyne, of Illinois, says: "I am not pleased. It is a bill of abdication." Mr. Landers, of Indiana, says: "As the only possible avenue of escape from our pending difficulties, I will vote for it." Mr. Watterson, of Kentucky, says: "I am not entirely pleased with it, but do not propose to make any fight against it. Mr. Willis, of New-York, says: "It does not strike me favorably, but I want to look at it further before I determine what I shall do."

Mr. Tarbox, of Massachusetts, says: "No department of the Government can abrogate any of its proper functions in favor of anybody. I prefer that Hayes should be counted in, and let the Republican Party take the responsibility of a fraudulent count, than that Congress should stultify itself by delegating any of its powers to any one." Mr. Cox, of New-York, elegantly says: "I want to let the matter soak till morning before I express a decided opinion, for I would like to consider whether we can give any of our powers to any other fellows, and who those other fellows are." Scott Lord, of New-York, says: "I am in favor of it, and believe it will pass. As to the question of the legality of transferring power to a special tribunal, all objection on that account is done away with by the fact that the two houses of Congress ratify all the acts of such tribunal, and although the tribunal may make the President, it will appear on the record and will be in fact the act of Congress. The commission acts only in a semi-ministerial capacity." Mr. Jerry Black, of Pennsylvania, says "It's a bad bill. The House Committee have been bull-dozed. The American Democracy are pigeon-livered, and have shown the white feather, and run before a gun is pointed at them."

Mr. Hurlbut, of Illinois, says he will vote against the bill, and so will Mr. Danford, of Ohio. Mr. Kasson, of Iowa, has not committed himself, but is likely to vote for the bill. Mr. Foster, of Ohio, is pronounced in support of the bill. Mr. Chittenden, of New-York, now expects to vote for it. Gen. Banks is reported as being strongly opposed to the measure. Prof. Scelye and Mr. H. L. Pierce, of Massachusetts, support it. Mr. Rusk, of Wisconsin, does not like it much, but thinks it will pass. Mr. Conger, of Michigan, proposes to think the subject over before deciding.

Secretary Morrill does not think the proposition the best plan that could be adopted. He thinks the bill rests upon a partisan basis, and regrets that the Supreme Court is made a portion of it. Each house selects five members of the commission, according to its partisan feeling, and these members are expected to adhere to their partisan views. Even in selecting the Associate Justices this partisan idea is faithfully adhered to, two of the Associate Justices having Republican, and the other two Democratic, proclivities, and they have been selected because of their partisan proclivities. He would prefer to leave the questions in dispute to the Supreme Court, as such. They naturally have some party bias, but they are eminent Judges and patriotic men. They have the esteem and confidence of the country, and might be safely trusted to decide upon the law and facts of the controversy. The preservation of a great principle is of infinitely more importance than the choice of a man to fill the Presidential office for four years, and, therefore, he thinks it would have been better could a plan have been adopted that would have placed the settlement of the questions in dispute entirely beyond all partisan considerations. He would not criticise the action of the committee. They may have done the very best that could be done in view of the emergency.

Senator Morton says he opposed the bill mainly because it surrenders the right of the two houses to count and determine the vote for President and Vice President. This power is lodged in Congress exclusively by the Constitution, and he cannot conscientiously consent to transfer that power to any other tribunal. Besides, he believes the bill empowers the commission to go behind the returns, which destroys all independence in elections in the States, and gives to the commission a power which he does not believe is even possessed by Congress. He says the Democratic members of the committee believe that the commission may go behind the returns, or they would not have supported the bill. He says that portion of the bill which declares that the commission may determine "how many and what persons were duly appointed Electors in such States, and may thereon take into view such petitions, depositions, and other papers as shall, by the Constitution and now existing laws, be competent and pertinent in such consideration," is a juggle of words, and will be construed that the commission may go behind the election to prosecute their inquiry. Senator Morton says this is the construction placed upon the language above quoted by Senators Bayard, Thurman, and other Democrats. He believes the Democrats have no case unless that construction be admitted, and the chance which they thus obtain by the bill is what induced them to support it. Mr. Morton has received several telegrams this evening, indorsing his opposition to the measure.

Dispatch to the Associated Press.

In view of the fact that Justices Miller and Field are two of the four Justices especially designated by the Joint Committee's bill to be members of the commission, the respective friends of these gentlemen desire it to be stated that a recently-reported conversation with Justice Miller, in which it was alleged that he had given public and emphatic views on the Presidential question is greatly exaggerated; and also that the published statement that Justice Field at a dinner party at the house of a Republican Senator recently expressed his opinions on the Presidential question, or regarding the action of the Louisiana Returning Board, is entirely untrue. The Republican Senator referred to is Senator Edmunds, who authorizes an emphatic denial of the whole story. Justice Field's remark on that occasion was simply to the effect that he believed there were good sense and patriotism enough in the two houses of Congress to devise some plan by which all existing or apprehended difficulties could be peaceably and satisfactorily adjusted.

WESTERN OPINIONS.

THE CINCINNATI REPUBLICANS OPPOSED TO THE UNCONSTITUTIONAL PLAN FOR COUNTING THE ELECTORAL VOTES.

Special Dispatch to the New-York Times.

CINCINNATI, Jan. 18.—The reported plan of agreement by the Congressional committees for counting the Electoral vote does not meet with approval by the mass of the Republicans here. The Gazette opposes it on the ground that it disregards the Constitution, and establishes a dangerous precedent for the future. The Commercial had nothing to say on the subject this morning, but will to-morrow have an article in favor of the compromise. Mr. Halstead thinks neither party can afford to oppose so favorable a means for avoiding trouble. Senator Morton's dissent from the report is generally approved by the Republicans of Indiana.

WHEN THE BILL MAY BE TAKEN UP.

CAUCUS OF THE DEMOCRATS OF THE HOUSE WITHOUT DECISION—OTHER CAUCUSES OF BOTH BRANCHES CALLED—A CONFERENCE OF REPUBLICANS.

Special Dispatch to the New-York Times.

WASHINGTON, Jan. 18.—As soon as the House adjourned, this evening, Mr. Lamar called the Democratic members together for a caucus to decide upon a day for taking up, in the House, the report of the Joint Committee on the Electoral count. The caucus was in session only about 20 minutes, and nothing of importance was done. As soon as the business for which the caucus was called was stated, it became manifest that there could be no agreement as to a day upon which the bill presented by the joint committee, with its report, could be taken up, as the members were anxious to have the bill and report printed and before them before determining that question. Therefore it was decided to hold another caucus next Monday evening, at which time it is expected an effort will be made to get an expression of the feelings of the Democracy upon the work of the joint committee. Until that time, there will probably be nothing done toward bringing the bill before either house. This evening there was a call issued for a caucus of the Democratic Senators on Saturday morning at 11 o'clock, and it is not unlikely that the action of this caucus may have some influence on the House caucus of Monday. The impression seems to be that the bill will be taken up in the Senate on Monday and in the House on Tuesday.

The Republicans will probably soon be called together for a conference, rather than a caucus upon the committee's bill.

The bill will not probably be called up in the Senate till Monday, though action must be speedy, if any is to be had. There are, counting Sundays, only ten days before the time set in the bill for the first meeting of the two houses, on the last day of January, to begin the count of the vote. The House will not, of course, take up the bill till after the meeting of their caucus. The subject will therefore not come up directly till next week, unless by unusual haste on the part of Mr. Edmunds, in the Senate. From the time the bill is taken up till the vote is recorded in both houses, there will be no other topic of thought or conversation in Washington, and the most earnest, most closely watched debate of many years will fill the galleries each day with eager listeners. That there will be much real eloquence, or any speeches that will become historical is doubtful, because this Congress has not many men capable of eloquence or oratory. But there will be many sound, able, well-considered arguments, and some sharp personal encounters, and all will be rendered interesting by the importance of the subject.

REPORT OF THE JOINT COMMITTEE.

The following is the report of the Committee of the Senate and House of Representatives appointed to report such measures as may be best calculated to accomplish the lawful counting of the Electoral vote: The committee say that they have considered the subjects named in the resolutions and have had full and free conference with each thereon, and now report the bill and recommend its passage. Continuing they say:

We have applied the utmost practicable study and deliberation to the subject, and believe that the bill now reported is the best attainable disposition of the different problems and disputed theories arising out of the late election. It must be obvious to every person conversant with the history of the country, and with the formation and interpretation of the Constitution, that the wide diversity of views and opinions touching the subject, not wholly coincident with the biased wishes of the members of political parties, would naturally exist. We have in this state of affairs chosen, therefore, not to deal with abstract questions, save so far as they are necessarily involved in the legislation proposed. It is, of course, plain that the report of the bill implies that in our opinion legislation may be had on the subjects in accordance with the Constitution, but we think that the law proposed is inconsistent with a few of the principal theories upon the subject. The Constitution requires that the Electoral votes shall be counted upon a particular occasion. All will agree that the votes named in the Constitution are the constitutional votes of the States, and no other, and when they have been found and identified there is nothing left to be disputed or decided. All the rest is the mere clerical work of summing up the numbers which being done the Constitution itself declares the consequences. This bill, then, is only directed to ascertaining, for the purpose and in aid of the counting, what are the constitutional votes of the respective States; and whatever jurisdiction exists for such purposes, the bill only regulates the method of exercising it. The Constitution, our great instrument and security for liberty and order, speaks in the amplest language for all such cases, in whatever respect they may be presented. It declares that the Congress shall have power "to make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution the foregoing powers, and all other powers vested by the Constitution in the Government of the United States or any department or officer thereof." The committee, therefore, think that the law proposed cannot be justly assailed as unconstitutional by any one; for this reason, we think it unnecessary, whatever may be our own individual views, to discuss any of the theories referred to. Our fidelity to the Constitution is observed when we find that the law we recommend is consistent with that instrument. The matter then being a proper subject for legislation, the fitness of the means proposed becomes the next subject of consideration. Upon this, we beg leave to submit a few brief observations.

FITNESS OF THE PROPOSED METHOD.

In all just governments, both public and private rights must be defined and determined by the law. This is essential to the very idea of such a government, and is the characteristic distinction between free and despotic systems. However important it may be whether one citizen or another shall be the chief magistrate for the period prescribed, upon just theories of civil institutions, it is of far greater moment that the will of the people, lawfully expressed in the choice of that office, shall be ascertained and carried into effect in a lawful way. It is true that in every operation of a government of laws, from the most trivial to the most important, there will always be the possibility that the result reached will not be the true one. The executive officer may not wisely perform his duty, the courts may not truly declare the law, and the legislative body may not enact the best laws. But in either case to resist the act of the executive, the courts, or the Legislature, acting constitutionally and lawfully within their sphere, would be to set up anarchy in the place of government. We think, then, that to provide a clear and lawful means of performing a great and necessary function of Government in a time of much public dispute, is of far greater importance than the particular advantage that any man or party may in the course of events possibly obtain. But we have still endeavored to provide such lawful agencies of decision in the present case as shall be the most fair and impartial possible under the circumstances. Each of the branches of the Legislature and the Judiciary are represented in the tribunal in equal proportions. The composition of the judicial part of the commission looks to a selection from different parts of the Republic, while it is thought to be free from any preponderance of supposable bias, and the addition of the necessary constituent part of the whole commission in order to obtain an uneven number is left to an agency the furthest removed from prejudice of any existing attainable one. It would be difficult, if not impossible, we think, to establish a tribunal that could be less the subject of party criticism than such a one. The principle of its constitution is so absolutely fair that we are unable to perceive how the most extreme partisan can assail it, unless he wishes to embark his hopes upon the stormy sea of unregulated procedure, hot disputes, and dangerous results, that can neither be measured nor defined, rather than upon the fixed and regular course of law that insures peace and the order of society whatever party may be disappointed in its hopes. The unfortunate circumstance that no provision had been made on the subject before the election has greatly added to the difficulty in dealing with it, inasmuch as many of the people of the country, members of the respective political parties, will perhaps look with jealousy upon any measure that seems to involve even the probability of the defeat of their wishes, but it has led the committees to feel that their members are bound by the highest duty, in such a case, to let no bias or party feeling stand in the way of a just, equal, and peaceful measure for extricating the question from the embarrassments that at present surround it.

NECESSITY FOR SPEEDY ACTION.

In conclusion, we respectfully beg leave to impress upon Congress the necessity of a speedy determination upon this subject. It is impossible to estimate the material loss the country daily sustains from the existing state of uncertainty. It directly and powerfully tends to unsettle and paralyze business, to weaken public and private credit, and to create apprehensions in the minds of the people that disturb the peaceful tenor of their ways and happiness. It does far more—it tends to bring republican institutions into discredit and to create doubts of the success of our form of Government and of the perpetuity of the Republic. All considerations of interest, of patriotism, and of justice unite in demanding of the law-making power a measure that will bring peace and prosperity to the country and show that our republican institutions are equal to any emergency. And, in this connection, we cannot refrain from expression of our satisfaction that your committee, composed of equal numbers of opposing parties, have fortunately been able to do what has been attempted in vain heretofore—almost unanimously agree upon a plan considered by them all to be just, wise, and efficient. We, accordingly, recommend the proposed act to the patriotic and just judgment of Congress.

PROCEEDINGS OF THE SENATE.

WASHINGTON, Jan. 18.—In the Senate, at 1 P. M. to-day, the members of the special committee of seven, appointed to devise means for a satisfactory count of the Electoral vote, entered the Senate Chamber.

Mr. EDMUNDS, of Vermont, Chairman of that committee, said: "I am directed, Mr. President, by the select committee raised under the resolution of the Senate on the subject of counting the Electoral vote, to submit a report in writing, with an accompanying bill. The report is signed, I am happy to say, by all of the members of both committees—it being a report in form joint and several to the two houses—with one exception; and all that I wish to say on this occasion, after stating that we desire to take it up at the earliest possible day, as time is running very fast, possibly, and I hope, indeed, on Saturday, the day after to-morrow, but certainly on Monday, to press it to a determination in some form steadily from that date forth. I only wish to say in addition, that the committee are of opinion that the measure we recommend is not what is called a compromise in any sense of the term, but is a measure in aid of the exercise of constitutional government; and that in no sense of the term will anybody have a just right to say that anybody's opinions or views have been surrendered in any substantial respect. It is not a measure of policy or contrivance, but a measure of constitutional justice, for the preservation of the peace and order of the Government.

Mr. SHERMAN—Let it be read.

The report of the committee, and the bill to provide for and regulate the counting of votes for President and Vice President, and the decision of questions arising thereon, for the term commencing March 4, A. D. 1877, were then read by the Chief Clerk, and it was ordered that they be printed.

The report is signed by George F. Edmunds, Frederick T. Frelinghuysen, Roscoe Conkling, A. G. Thurman, T. F. Bayard, and M. W. Ransom, on the part of the Senate, Mr. Morton being the only one who declined to sign it. On the part of the House of Representatives, it was signed by the seven members, namely, H. B. Payne, Eppa Hunton, A. S. Hewitt, W. M. Springer, George W. McCrary, George F. Hoar, and George Willard. After the report had been read, the bill was read a second time by title and placed on the calendar.

Following is the text of the bill:

A BILL to provide for and regulate the counting of votes for President and Vice President, and the decision of questions arising thereon, for the term commencing March 4, Anno Domini 1877.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America, in Congress assembled, That the Senate and House of Representatives shall meet in the hall of the House of Representatives, at the hour of 1 o'clock Past Meridian, on the first Thursday in February, A. D. 1877, and the President of the Senate shall be their presiding officer. Two tellers shall be previously appointed on the part of the Senate, and two on the part of the House of Representatives, to whom shall be handed, as they are opened by the President of the Senate, all the certificates and papers purporting to be certificates of Electoral votes, which certificates and papers shall be opened, presented, and acted upon in the alphabetical order of the States, beginning with the letter A, and said tellers having then read the same in the presence and hearing of the two houses, shall make a list of the votes as they shall appear from the said certificates, and the votes having been ascertained and counted as in this act provided, the result of the same shall be delivered to the President of the Senate, who shall thereupon announce the state of the vote and the names of the persons, if any, elected, which announcement shall be deemed a sufficient declaration of the persons elected President and Vice President of the United States, and, together with a list of the votes, shall be entered on the journals of the two houses. Upon such reading of any such certificate or paper, when there shall be only one return from a State, the President of the Senate shall call for objections, if any. Every objection shall be made in writing, and shall state clearly and concisely, and without argument, the ground thereof, and shall be signed by at least one Senator and one member of the House of Representatives before the same shall be received. When all the objections so made to any vote or paper from a State shall have been received and read, the Senate shall thereupon withdraw, and such objections shall be submitted to the Senate for its decision; and the Speaker of the House of Representatives shall in like manner submit such objections to the House of Representatives for its decision, and no Electoral vote or votes from any State from which but one return has been received, shall be rejected, except by the affirmative vote of the two houses. When the two houses have voted, they shall immediately again meet, and the presiding officer shall then announce the decision of the question submitted.

SEC. 2. That if more than one return or paper purporting to be a return from a State shall have been received by the President of the Senate, purporting to be the certificates of Electoral votes given at the last preceding election for President and Vice President in such State, unless they shall be duplicates of the same return, all such returns and papers shall be opened by him in the presence of the two houses, when met as aforesaid, and read by the tellers, and all such returns and papers shall thereupon be submitted to the judgment and decision as to which is the true and lawful Electoral vote of such State, of a commission, constituted as follows, namely: During the session of each house on the Tuesday next preceding the first Thursday in February, 1877, each house shall, by viva voce vote, appoint five of its members, who, with the five Associate Justices of the Supreme Court of the United States to be ascertained as hereinafter provided, shall constitute a commission for the decision of all questions upon or in respect of such double returns named in this section. On the Tuesday next preceding the first Thursday in February, A. D. 1877, or as soon thereafter as may be, the Associate Justices of the Supreme Court of the United States now assigned to the first, third, eighth, and ninth circuits, shall select in such manner as a majority of them shall deem fit, another of the Associate Justices of said court, which five persons shall be members of the said commission, and the person longest in commission of said five Justices shall be the President of said commission. Members of said commission shall respectively take and subscribe the following oath:

"I, ——, do solemnly swear (or affirm, as the case may be) that I will impartially examine and consider all questions submitted to the commission of which I am a member, and a true judgment give thereon, agreeably to the Constitution and the laws, so help me God."

Which oath shall be filed with the Secretary of the Senate.

When the commission shall have been thus organized, it shall not be in the power of either house to dissolve the same, or to withdraw any of its members, but if any such Senator or member shall die, or become physically unable to perform the duties required by this act, the fact of such death or physical inability, shall be by said commission, before it shall proceed further, communicated to the Senate or House of Representatives, as the case may be, which body shall immediately and without debate proceed, by viva voce vote, to fill the place so vacated; and the person so appointed shall take and subscribe the oath hereinbefore prescribed, and become a member of said commission. And in like manner if any of said Justices of the Supreme Court shall die or become physically incapable of performing the duties required by this act, the other of said Justices, members of the said commission, shall immediately appoint another Justice of said court a member of said commission, and in such appointments regard shall be had to the impartiality and freedom from bias sought by the original appointments to said commission, who shall thereupon immediately take, and subscribe to, the oath hereinbefore prescribed and become a member of said commission to fill the vacancy so occasioned. All the certificates and papers purporting to be certificates of the Electoral votes of each State shall be opened in the alphabetical order of the States as provided in Section 1 of this act; and when there shall be more than one such certificate or paper as the certificates or papers from such State shall so be opened, (excepting duplicates of the same return,) they shall be read by the tellers, and thereupon the President of the Senate shall call for objections, if any. Every objection shall be made in writing, and shall state clearly and concisely and without argument, the ground thereof, and shall be signed by at least one Senator and one member of the House of Representatives before the same shall be received. When all such objections so made to any certificate, vote or paper from a State shall have been received and read, all such certificates, votes, and papers, so objected to, and all papers accompanying the same, together with such objections, shall be forthwith submitted to said commission, which shall proceed to consider the same with the same powers, if any, now possessed for that purpose by the two houses acting separately or together, and by a majority of votes decide whether any and what votes from such State are the votes provided for by the Constitution of the United States, and how many and what persons were duly appointed Electors in such State, and may therein take into view such petitions, depositions, and other papers, if any, as shall, by the Constitution and now existing law, be competent and pertinent in such consideration, which decision shall be made in writing, stating briefly the ground thereof, and signed by the members of said commission agreeing therein, whereupon the two houses shall again meet and such decision shall be read and entered in the journal of each house, and the counting of the votes shall proceed in conformity therewith, unless upon objection made thereto in writing by at least five Senators and five members of the House of Representatives, the two houses shall separately concur in ordering otherwise, in which case such concurrent order shall govern. No votes or papers from any other State shall be acted upon until the objections previously made to the vote or papers from any State shall have been finally disposed of.

SEC. 3. That while the two houses shall be in meeting as provided in this act, no debate shall be allowed, and no question shall be put by the presiding officer, except to either house on a motion to withdraw, and he shall have power to preserve order.

SEC. 4. That when the two houses separate to decide upon an objection that may have been made to the counting of any Electoral vote or votes from any State, or upon objection to a report of said commission, or other question arising under this act, each Senator or Representative may speak to such objection or question 10 minutes, and not oftener than once; but after such debate shall have lasted two hours, it shall be the duty of each house to put the main question without further debate.

SEC. 5. That at such joint meeting of the two houses seats shall be provided as follows:

For the President of the Senate, the Speaker's chair; for the Speaker, immediately upon his left; the Senators in the body of the hall, upon the right of the presiding officer; for the Representatives, in the body of the hall not provided for the Senators; for the tellers, Secretary of the Senate, and Clerk of the House of Representatives, at the Clerk's desk; for the other officers of the two houses, in front of the Clerk's desk and upon each side of the Speaker's platform.

Such joint meeting shall not be dissolved until the count of the Electoral votes shall be completed and the result declared, and no recess shall be taken unless a question shall have arisen in regard to counting any such votes or otherwise under this act, in which case it shall be competent for either house, acting separately, in the manner hereinbefore provided, to direct a recess of such house, not beyond the next day, Sunday excepted, at the hour of 10 o'clock in the forenoon; and while any question is being considered by said commission, either house may proceed with its legislative or other business.

SEC. 6. That nothing in this act shall be held to impair or affect any right now existing under the Constitution and laws to question by proceeding in the judicial courts of the United States, the right or title of the person who shall be declared elected, or who shall claim to be President or Vice President of the United States, if any such right exists.

SEC. 7. That said commission shall make its own rules, keep a record of its proceedings, and shall have power to employ such persons as may be necessary for the transaction of its business and the execution of its powers.

DISCUSSION ON THE WALLACE RESOLUTIONS.

Mr. BOGY called up the resolutions recently submitted by the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. Wallace] in regard to counting the Electoral vote, and spoke at length in regard to affairs in Louisiana, in reply to the recent argument of Mr. Sherman. He spoke of the actions of the Returning Board in Louisiana, and argued that they were illegal. He argued that in East Feliciana the Republicans knew that the Democrats would carry the parish, and they formed a conspiracy not to vote, in order that they might charge that the Republican vote had been kept out by intimidation. He read from the testimony in support of his statement, and also to show that in various parishes most of the trouble grew out of violence toward colored Democrats by colored Republicans.

Before Mr. Bogy concluded his remarks he yielded to Mr. ANTHONY, of Rhode Island, who reported a resolution to print 10,000 extra copies of the report of the Special Committee on the subject of counting the Electoral vote, and it was agreed to.

PROCEEDINGS OF THE HOUSE.

After a good deal of time occupied in deciding whether the House should proceed to the consideration of the plan of counting the Electoral vote proposed by the special committee, or the resolutions reported last Friday from the Committee on the Privileges and Duties of the House in counting the Electoral votes, the House decided to take up the latter, which consist of these five points:

First—That the Constitution does not confer on the President of the Senate power to examine and ascertain the votes to be cast as the Electoral votes.

Second—That the only power which the Constitution does confer on the President of the Senate in the matter is to receive the sealed lists transmitted to him by the several Electoral Colleges, keep the same safely, and open all certificates, or those purporting to be such, in the presence of the two Houses.

Third—That the Constitution does confer on the Senate and the House of Representatives the power to examine and ascertain the votes to be counted as Electoral votes.

Fourth—That in the execution of such power the House of Representatives is at least equal with the Senate; and Fifth—That no vote can be counted against the judgment and determination of the House of Representatives.

Mr. KNOTT, of Kentucky, Chairman of the committee, said that the proper method of electing the President and Vice President had been one of the most difficult and momentous questions which occupied the attention of the framers of the Constitution. After having considered various plans, the convention had finally adopted the method which had been substantially pursued since the organization of the Government. He proceeded to show the three grounds which, under the Constitution, invalidated votes: First, the ineligibility of the person voted for; second, the lack of constitutional authority in the person pretending to give the vote, and, third, the fact that the vote was not given at the place, or in the manner, or was not certified to, as prescribed by the Constitution. There must, he said, be some authority somewhere to examine and decide these questions. Where was it? On whom did the Constitution devolve this tremendous power? Was it on the President of the Senate, as now contended by one party? From that view the committee positively and unqualifiedly dissented. If the framers of the Constitution had intended that the President of the Senate should count as well as open the certificates they would have said so in plain, simple language. But they do not choose to do so, and the irresistible conclusion must be that they did not intend to confer on the President of the Senate any such tremendous power as was now claimed for him. He admitted that neither house could reject any fair vote of a State. It would be revolutionary to do so, but it would be an equal crime to count a fraudulent vote. He then criticised the President, intimating that his construction of his duty in the premises was to strip the frontier and crowd the capital with troops. In conclusion he said: "Believing that this House has a high power and a solemn duty in regard to counting the Electoral votes for President and Vice President, in my humble judgment any attempt on the part of any man or body of men, executive, legislative, or ministerial, to coerce this House to count a vote which in its judgment is invalid or void, or to coerce this House to throw out a vote which in its judgment is legal and valid, or to interfere in any manner whatever with the peaceful discharge of its constitutional functions in this high regard, would be an utter subversion of our constitutional government, and, if accompanied by armed and organized force, would be treason to the United States of America." [Applause on the Democratic side of the House and in the galleries.]

THE MINORITY REPORT.

Mr. BURCHARD, of Illinois, a member of the committee, offered on behalf of the four Republican members of the committee, the following as a substitute for the resolutions by the committee:

Resolved, first, That it is the power and duty of the House, conjointly with the Senate, to provide by law or other constitutional method a mode for fairly and truly ascertaining and properly counting the Electoral vote of each State, so as to give effect to the choice of each State in the election of President and Vice President.

Resolved, second, That in the absence of legislative provision on the subject or authoritative direction from the Senate and House of Representatives, the President of the Senate, upon opening the certificates, declares and counts the Electoral votes for President and Vice President of the United States.

Mr. BURCHARD, of Illinois, addressed the House in favor of the minority report. He said that the resolutions reported by the majority asserted the most extreme power on the part of the House, and involved the great constitutional question whether the Federal Government had the right to review the proceedings of the officers of a State in the election or appointment of Electors. If that position was correct, then either house could examine collaterally whether the officers of a State had taken the oath to support the Constitution. He denied that right on the part of either house, and held that the acts of the duly constituted authorities of a State, when verified as required by law, must be taken as legal and correct. He claimed that there was no power to go behind such acts. John Adams and Thomas J

ALBANY.

BUSINESS IN BOTH HOUSES.

RESOLUTIONS ON NATIONAL AFFAIRS IN THE SENATE — COUNTY TREASURERS—THE STATE PRISONS—NEW BILLS IN THE ASSEMBLY—DEATH OF A MEMBER.

From Our Own Correspondent.

ALBANY, Thursday, Jan. 18, 1877.

The resolutions touching the counting of the Electoral vote agreed upon in the caucus of Republican Senators last night, and referred to in THE TIMES of to-day, were introduced in the Senate this morning by Senator Woodin. They express the unanimous sentiment of the Republicans of both branches of the Legislature, as well as the sentiments of all Democrats who are able to rise above the pettifogging partisanship of Samuel J. Tilden:

Whereas, The annual Message of the Governor invites the attention of the Legislature to the questions growing out of the recent Presidential election; and

Whereas, The Constitution of the United States provides that in the election of the President each State shall appoint, in such manner as the Legislature thereof may direct, a number of Electors, equal to the whole number of Senators and Representatives to which the State may be entitled in the Congress in which the Electors are to meet and cast the vote of the State, and certify and transmit the same to the seat of Government of the United States, directed to the President of the Senate; therefore

Resolved, If the Assembly concur, that the provision fixes the intent of the Constitution that the several States shall determine each for itself the mode of appointing the Electors, and of lawfully establishing who are appointed, and that the vote of the Electors thus appointed and lawfully certified shall be received and counted as the vote of the State

Resolved, That a majority of the votes of the Electors thus appointed by the several States and meeting in their respective States in conformity with law, on the 6th of December last, determined the election of President and Vice President of the United States, and that it only remains to make lawful declaration of the result so determined.

Resolved, That every State in full and undisturbed relations with the Union is entitled to participate in the election of President, and that the lawfully certified votes of its Electors, appointed in the manner designated by its Legislature, and subject only to the constitutional conditions, represent and embody the expressed will of the State, in accordance with the principles enunciated by Daniel Webster, that the will of the people must prevail when it is ascertained, and the only mode of ascertaining that will is by some regular rule of proceeding prescribed by previous law.

Resolved, That the declaration of the result of the Presidential election should be strictly governed by the principles of the Constitution, and by the established usage and practices under it; that the action of the convention which framed the Constitution in organizing the new Government thus created, when they resolved that "the Senate should appoint a President of the Senate for the sole purpose of receiving and opening and counting the votes for President;" that the argument of Charles Pinckney, a distinguished member of the convention, made in the debate of 1800, in which he stated that "in the Federal Convention great care was taken to provide for the election of a President independently of Congress, to take the business, as far as possible, out of their hands;" that the opinion of Henry Clay, exposed in a subsequent debate in which he declared that "unless the two houses agreed upon a different method, the President of the Senate would proceed to open and count the votes;" that the opinion of Chancellor Kent, which for half a century has remained unchanged and unquestioned, in which he held "that, in the absence of a legislative provision on the subject, the President of the Senate counts the votes and determines the result" combine to interpret the intent of the framers of the Constitution. Without going beyond its appropriate province, the Legislature of New-York earnestly insists that no partisan efforts should be allowed to defeat or obstruct the orderly course of law, which is so essential to the welfare and prosperity of the Republic.

Resolved, If the Assembly concurs, that the lawful declaration of the result of the election of the President, as determined by the vote of a majority of the Electors on the 6th day of December last, is binding upon all, and that in making such declaration, and in upholding the Constitution and laws, the national authorities are entitled to the support of every patriotic citizen.

Resolved, That any threat to disregard the result of the Presidential election and its lawful declaration is incendiary in spirit and revolutionary in character; that any attempt to inflame partisan feeling and excite political passions upon a question which has passed beyond the appropriate arena of partisan conflict and remains only to be declared according to truth and law, calls for unqualified condemnation; and that the united voice of the people must enforce, as the supreme obligation of the hour, the duty of prompt and unhesitating acceptance of the legal determination.

Mr. Woodin suggested that, if there was no objection, the resolutions be put upon their passage at once. Mr. Jacobs objected, and so the resolutions lie over under the rule, and are ordered printed.

Senator Wagstaff introduced a bill extending the time during which the benevolent fund of the late Volunteer Fire Department of the City of New-York shall be entitled to a share of the tax levied on foreign fire insurance companies. Mr. Corsa brought in the same bill in the Assembly this morning. A similar bill, introduced by the late Senator Booth, was passed last year, but was vetoed on some technical ground.

Mr. Baaden introduced a bill similar to the scores of bills that have been before previous Legislatures for the better protection of gas consumers.

The fruitless discussions over a "County Treasurers bill," that have occupied so much of the time of the Legislature for several years past, are likely to be closed this session by the passage of a bill reported by Senator Robertson from the Judiciary Committee this morning. The bill embodies the practical features of several bills introduced in past years, and will, it is thought, harmonize conflicting views on the subject. Its leading provisions are as follows: The selection of banks of deposit by the Treasurer, but the banks to be required to give bonds. Treasurers to receive no interest or deposits, nor any fees or perquisites of any kind. Salaries of Treasurers to be fixed by the Boards of Supervisors of the several counties, but this provision not to go into effect until the expiration of the terms of the present Treasurers.

The bill fixing the salary of the Superintendent of State Prisons at $8,000, with $2,000 additional for expenses, was considered in the Senate to-day. Mr. Woodin and Mr. Schoonmaker were in favor of fixing the salary at $6,500. Woodin thought it was about time the Legislature commenced that retrenchment which the Democrats had talked about so much in their speeches to the people. For his part he was ready to vote for a general reduction of the salaries of all State officials, including his own. He took occasion to remark that in his opinion those who expected that our State Prisons would be made self-sustaining under the new system of a State Superintendent would be grievously disappointed.

The Senate, in executive session, confirmed the nomination of Capt. D. D. Wylie, of New-York, for Commissary General. His brother-in-law, Police Commissioner Nichols, who has been here lobbying for his relative most of the time since the session commenced, can now return to the duties of his post.

PROCEEDINGS IN THE ASSEMBLY.

The business done in the Assembly this morning was of no special interest. A few bills were disposed of in Committee of the Whole, a short debate took place on some resolutions relating to the methods of State taxation, which were sent to the Ways and Means Committee for its consideration, a number of bills were introduced, and Mr. Graham, of Orange, in an address in excellent taste, and not without real pathos, announced the sudden death of his colleague, Mr. Stewart T. Durland, of the Second District of Orange County, who died last night, having been taken ill while on his way home from Albany last Friday. The House adjourned in respect to the memory of the deceased. Two other members, Mr. Rooney, of the Third, and Mr. Healy, of the Sixth District of New-York, are also dangerously ill.

Mr. Stein has introduced a bill "for the better protection of printers and lithographers." It gives printers and lithographers a lien on stereotype plates, wood-cuts, dies, &c., for work done. Such a bill, if it became a law, could only afford a protection when the materials named had been furnished by those who required the printing to be done. This is not a common practice, though perhaps common enough to give reason for the passage of such an act.

At the request of Mr. Dorman B. Eaton, Mr. Strahan introduced a bill this morning, the title of which is "An act to secure better public administration in the City of New-York." It might more properly be entitled, "An act to make City officers honest and faithful." It has six sections. The first declares that all employes of the City are officers for the purposes of the act; the second declares that it shall be the duty of all these officers to faithfully perform their duties to the end that the administration of the City may be honest and economical; that it shall be a misdemeanor to appoint, or conspire to appoint, to any office a person unfit for the place, or to pay an excessive salary to any employe, or to pay an excessive price for any material or supplies. But it is carefully provided that no officer who has acted in good faith shall be liable. The third section makes it a misdemeanor to demand, or conspire to demand, a political assessment from any officer; but the act is not to be construed to prevent voluntary contributions for political purposes. The fourth section affixes the same penalty for using money, promise of office, or other undue means, to secure the promotion, increase of pay, &c., of any City employe or officer. No standard is provided in the bill by which to ascertain whether a salary is excessive or extravagant. The intent of the bill appears to be to provide some way in which men who cannot be trusted to do their duty shall be made to do it. It has gone to the Judiciary Committee, and will probably remain there.

CAUCUS OF DEMOCRATIC SENATORS.

The Democratic Senators held a caucus this evening to consider what resolutions it would be advisable to prepare to offer as a substitute for those presented in the Senate this morning on the Presidential question. The discussion appears to have been animated and of some length, but no agreement was reached. Resolutions may be prepared to-morrow or the whole matter may be postponed until next week, which would afford an opportunity to consult in New-York with the person most interested in the matter. There is some talk of the Republican members of the Assembly caucusing on the Woodin resolutions when they come before the House. In view of an agreement being reached by Congress on the counting of the Electoral vote some members are of opinion that it would be a good thing at this time to go slow.

LOCAL MISCELLANY.

CLEANING THE STREETS.

GANGS OF MEN AT WORK IN THE LOWER PORTION OF THE CITY—GARBAGE AND ASHES STILL ENCUMBER THE SIDEWALKS.

The Street-cleaning Department has, at length, given evidence of its existence by the removal of a portion of the remains of the snow-storm which obstructed all the leading streets and thoroughfares in the City for some weeks past. The work was commenced on Broadway last Sunday, and yesterday that thoroughfare presented a tolerably clean appearance from the Battery to Fourteenth street. Since Sunday night a large number of men, divided into gangs, have been engaged each night, and over 16,000 cart-loads of snow and ice were removed up to yesterday morning. Las night about 300 men and 280 carts were employed upon the principal thoroughfares down town, and by Saturday night Commissioner Nichols, Chairman of the Street-cleaning Department, expects that Wall, Broad, Fulton, Nassau, Whitehall, and other streets adjoining will be cleaned. The men were divided last night into gangs, who were set to work upon Park row, Nassau, Fulton, William, and Cortlandt streets, and up to 12 o'clock considerable progress was made by the laborers employed in picking up the heaps of snow and ice which lined the sidewalks and carting it away. Besides the 280 carts employed to cart away the snow last evening there were 430 more engaged in removing the ashes from the streets all over the City. Commissioner Nichols, Capt. Gunner, and Deputy Inspector O'Brien were out in the various streets in which the men were employed superintending the work, and the laborers who were engaged in the different gangs appeared to work very diligently. On Sunday the entire force of the department will be employed on Broadway between Fourteenth and Thirty-fourth streets, in case all the principal thoroughfares down town should be cleared by Saturday night. Duane street will next be cleaned, after which an effort will be made to clean Tenth, Fourteenth, and Twenty-third streets. Commissioner Nichols expects that by Monday morning all the leading thoroughfares down town will be in good shape. The condition of the streets yesterday all over the City, with the exception of that portion of Broadway from which the snow and ice had been removed, was wretched in the extreme. Along all the cross-town streets, and most of the principal avenues which were exposed to the sun, pools of water collected in the gutters and, overflowing the sidewalk in several places, rendered pedestrianism very disagreeable. Owing to the immense heaps of congealed snow which are piled along Third and Sixth avenues, blockades occurred several times during the day along these lines whenever a truck or wagon heavily laden happened to get fast while attempting to cross over the tracks of the horse railroads, the way of the street cars.

While the laborers of the Street-cleaning Bureau are exerting themselves to dig up and cast away the ice and snow which has been allowed too long to accumulate in the streets, and while West, South, Greenwich, and Washington streets are still in almost an impassable condition, the garbage and ashes from the buildings in the lower part of the City are collecting in such quantities as to threaten the serious blocking up of the sidewalks along many of the streets. A reporter of THE TIMES noticed yesterday that on Nassau street alone heaps of receptacles had been filled and arranged in lines upon the curb-stones. Between Fulton and John streets 36 of these handsome objects were counted, in groups of from three to six. These occupied about half the width of the walk, and frequent loadings of passengers on the sidewalk, and of wagons in the street, had resulted in the upsetting of some of the vessels and the strewing of their miscellaneous contents upon the already dirty pavements. Opposite the old Post Office building there were several picturesque groupings of tin-boxes, iron kettles, flour barrels, kegs, and baskets. In front of the banking-house of George Opdyke there were three or four barrels filled to overflowing, and at the door of the Fourth National Bank a half-dozen huge stacks of ashes demanded to be taken away. Along Maiden lane, John street, Pearl, Front, Water, Burling slip, and other down-town streets there were to be seen evidences of friction in the Street-cleaning Bureau. On the west side of the City, where many of the houses are filled with tenants, the huge boxes into which all manner of vile substances are thrown were seen overflowing with their loads of filth, and in many places where barrels had been used they had been relieved of their contents by boys who prowled in search of fire-wood, and the ashes were mixed with the melting ice and snow in the streets. In front of some of the warehouses on the business streets great hogsheads had been put out after the ordinary iron ash-kettles had been filled, and these were supplied so that the ashes were heaped up above the edges. There these had stood for several days, the occupants of buildings near by had not stopped the work of filling when the cone had been perfectly raised, but had poured on pan after pan of ashes until they had showered off and accumulated in banks outside of the barrels or hogsheads.

THE ASSOCIATED PIONEERS.

ANNUAL REUNION AT THE STURTEVANT HOUSE—AN ENJOYABLE EVENING AMONG THE OLD PIONEERS.

The Associated Pioneers of the Territorial Days of California had their annual reunion and dinner last evening at the Sturtevant House. The rooms were handsomely decorated with flags and streamers, prominent among which was the "Pioneer Bear Flag." Among the mottoes and devices on the walls were; "Monterey, July 7, 1846;" "The Bear Flag Men of 1846;" "The Horn Around in 180 Days;" "Sloat, Stockton, Shubrick;" "The Exchanges of '49, El Dorado, Bella Union, Parker House;" "The Fastest Ship, Young America, the Largest Ship, Three Brothers;" "The Isthmus Across by Bungo and Mule;" "The First American Newspaper in California, the California Star." The ornaments on the table included a "California Hunting Scene," and "Corn d' Abundance," and among the characteristic dishes were "Lobster Salad à la San Francisco," "Pork and Beans, à la '49," and "Roast California Quail, à la Pacific Slope." Among the guests were Gen. Joseph Hooker, Gen. C. P. Stone, Commander Richard W. Meade, Gen. John S. Ellis, Gen. James F. Curtis, Col. John A. Godfrey, Col. James E. Nutt-man, and Clark Bell. Letters of regret at inability to attend were received from President Grant, Gen Sherman, Gen. Sheridan, Gen. John A. Sutter, Mark Twain, Bayard Taylor, and Peter Deacbe, Esq., President of the Pioneers of San Francisco. Gen. H. G. Gibson, President of the Pioneers, occupied the chair, and the guests obeyed with alacrity his injunction to "pitch in and enjoy the feast to your heart's content." Following are the toasts and the names of the respondents: "The President of the United States," Col. Thorpe, (formerly aide de camp of Gen. Zachary Taylor;) "The Day we Celebrate," (the anniversary of the discovery of gold in California,) Gen. Thomas D. Johns; "California," Col. Edward F. Burton; "Days of '49," Col. S. C. Upham; "Gen. John A. Sutter," (the Pioneer and Philanthropist,) Gen. H. S. Gibson; "Pioneer Associations of California," Hon. R. H. McKune; "Our Honored Dead," Col. James M. Turner; "Woman," Col. John A. Godfrey. The toasts were interspersed with music and singing by Prof. Jules Lumbard and an excellent quartet. Col. Thorne said he never saw such a centennial. We couldn't tell who was our President, and three of our States had each two Governors, and nobody could tell who was who. The two houses of Congress had got into a snarl, and the lower house (and by the way it was very low) [laughter] didn't seem to know what it was about, and had apparently lost its wits. The speeches of the evening were mainly in relation to interesting reminiscences connected with the discovery of gold in California, and were greeted by frequent applause from those who had taken an active part in the early mining operations in the "El Dorado of the West."

THE RUSSIAN OFFICERS.

NORFOLK, Jan. 18.—The Grand Duke Alexis did not attend the German given here last night, but the Grand Duke Constantine and several Russian naval officers were present.

BROOKLYN REPUBLICANS.

DISCOMFITURE OF A FEW PERSONS WHO WANTED TO CENSURE THE MAYOR AND THE REPUBLICAN MEMBERS OF THE BOARD OF ALDERMEN.

Some time ago a few Brooklyn Republicans, members of the Kings County Club, who were dissatisfied with the action of Mayor Schroeder in renominating Corporation Counsel DeWitt, and with the 12 Republican members of the Board of Aldermen for voting to confirm the nomination, held a meeting and passed resolutions expressing their disapproval of the course pursued by the officials in question. The meeting was held in the Kings County Club-rooms, and the proceedings were published in some of the local papers as if the resolutions relating to the Mayor and Aldermen emanated from the club—which is a Republican organization—as a body. That they did not express the opinions of a majority of the members of the Kings County Club was sufficiently proved at a meeting held on Wednesday evening, when the rooms were crowded, and resolutions indorsing the action of the Mayor and Republican Aldermen were passed, one person voting in the negative. The dissatisfied Republicans who originated the resolutions condemning the Mayor succeeded in having a special meeting of the Republican General Committee called for last night, at which it was proposed to give expression to the opinion of the Republican Party in the county through its representatives relative to the appointment of Mr. DeWitt. If the dissatisfied ones—and they are very few—indulged the hope that the committees would censure the Mayor and Republican Aldermen, they were sadly disappointed.

After the roll had been called no person in the room seemed to know just what business was to be transacted. At length Mr. Jesse Madden, of the Eighteenth Ward, moved that a committee of seven on grievance be appointed, with instructions to report at the next regular meeting of the committee; and that all resolutions, which might be offered at the meeting then in session, should be referred to that committee. The motion was promptly voted down. A motion to adjourn was then made and lost. At this point, Corporation Counsel DeWitt appeared in the room, and asked permission to make a brief inquiry. Being accorded permission, Mr. DeWitt said that he wished to know if the meeting was held merely for the purpose of considering the political or partisan wisdom of his appointments. If it were held for that purpose he, being a Democrat, would withdraw. If the committee wished to inquire whether he was connected with any persons or body of persons called a ring, or called by any other opprobious epithet; if they wished to investigate any part of his official career, he wanted to be present. While he was somewhat like Paul before Agrippa, willing to be questioned and competent to answer, he did not appear only for himself. He had heard that an attempt was to be made to cast a slur on the honored chief magistrate of the city and the Republican Aldermen who stood bravely by him when he was fighting the corruptionists. Mr. DeWitt concluded by repeating that it the action of this committee were to be merely of a political nature he would withdraw. The mention of Mayor Schroeder's name was received with uproarious applause. At the conclusion of Mr. DeWitt's remarks a motion to adjourn was made and carried, and as the members of the committee crowded out of the room they laughingly inquired of one another why they had been called together. The moral of the meeting appears to be that the Republican Party in Kings County cannot be run by any clique.

A COUNTY OFFICER IN TROUBLE.

THE CHARGES AGAINST THE SUPERINTENDENT OF THE POOR OF WESTCHESTER COUNTY—FURTHER TESTIMONY IN THE CASE.

The joint committee of the Boards of Supervisors and Superintendents of the Poor of Westchester County appointed to examine into the charges of misappropriating the county supplies and inhumanly treating paupers, recently preferred against William H. Hammond, the Keeper of the County Poor-house, resumed its investigation yesterday at the Court-house at White Plains. The examination of Charles Dominick, Hammond's son-in-law, and the principal witness against him, was continued. Dominick testified that he saw Hammond on one occasion beat one of the paupers, a crazy man, who was attempting to strike him (Hammond) with a club. He also saw Hammond beat paupers on several occasions when they seemed to be unruly.

Jesse Ryder testified that he was present on one occasion when a difference occurred between Keeper Hammond and an inmate at the County-house. A pauper was brought into the office by two men, and he was asked to sign his pension over to Hammond. This he refused to do, and Hammond ordered him to leave the office. He moved slowly toward the door, and Hammond shoved him violently, knocking him down. Hammond then "grabbed" him by the collar, and dashed him against the door-post.

The next witness was Wallin Rosell, who testified that Hammond was his uncle by marriage; on the 1st of last September Hammond placed him in charge of the farm at Pleasantville; witness could not speak about his (the witness') paying any rent; he asked him a few days afterward to come down to the County-house; witness did so, and there met some of the Superintendents of the Poor, with whom he talked about boarding several of the children in the institution; one Superintendent said that they had been paying about $2 or $2 50 a week for each child's board; he did not make any definite arrangement that day, and the next he knew of the matter was when the children were sent up to the Pleasantville house; at present he had 15 children boarding with him; the youngest was about 4 years of age and the oldest 7; he was always paid for their board by Hammond, as he supposed, by direction of the Superintendents; he paid $20 a month rent for the house; he used to go to the County-house for his money, and Hammond always deducted the rent; his wife kept the accounts and he was unable to state the amount he received each month from Hammond; he had seen County-house teams working on the farm; one of the children boarding with him was sent to school; on Sunday the children were kept in the house and were not sent to church or Sunday-school.

Rivington Lefurgy was the next witness examined. He testified that he lived on the road leading from the County-house to Hammond's farm, at Pleasantville; during last year he frequently saw County-house teams of two horses and oxen going; they were generally driven there in the night time, and sometimes the wagons were loaded; the teams were usually driven by Hammond or his son; he sometimes saw paupers from the County-house riding in the wagons at night to the farm; he could not positively swear that they worked on the farm, but he believed they did.

The investigation will be continued on Tuesday next.

OVERDUE AND MISSING VESSELS.

THE AUGUST ANDRE ARRIVES AT HALIFAX—THE GROUNDING OF THE STEAMER PERIT—A CASE OF APPARENT CARELESSNESS—NO NEWS OF THE COLOMBO.

The Antwerp steam-ship August André, which has been a month in crossing the Atlantic, and has been so long overdue as to create some fears about her safety, has been heard of at Halifax. She was on Wednesday afternoon towed into Halifax by the steamer Switzerland, having been found two days before in a disabled condition, leaking badly, and making slow progress. She will discharge her cargo and undergo repairs before coming to New-York. The Switzerland will bring on her passengers. The British steam-ship Perit, (formerly the American steam-ship of the same name,) from Halifax for New-York, went ashore on Wednesday at Chatham Beach, Mass. A dispatch from Capt. Hudney says: The steamer left Halifax on Jan. 12 with a cargo of fish and potatoes. They made heavy weather soon after leaving, and laid to 36 hours in the Bay of Fundy. She approached land that was supposed to be Cape Cod on the evening of the 15th, and stood back east 20 miles in a dense snow-storm. On the morning of the 16th they stood back and made Cape Cod and traced the shore down to Pollock's Rip, but the fog was so thick that they could not find the entrance. Stood off again, and soon after dark it cleared up, but the Captain did not deem it prudent to pass over the shoals until morning. Ran off north-east under short steam. Ordered the ship to be kept off the shore six to 10 miles until morning, and having been up all the previous night, turned in. He was awakened at 1:30 by the ship striking the beach, with the Chatham lights ahead. At the time of striking she was in charge of the objet mate, Capt. James McArthur, of Sydney, who had shipped in place of the mate, Mr. Hilton, who was sick. At the time the ship struck the beach the lights were all in plain view, and the mate had changed the ship's course to north-west, which was four points on land. Should the wind remain westerly he hopes to get her off, and will discharge the cargo. The agents of the steamer in this City were Erhard & Brewer, No. 36 Beaver street.

Wright & Co., agents of the Hull line, said yesterday that nothing had been heard of the steam-ship Colombo, now nearly 50 days out, but they are not disposed to give her up, believing still that she may be proceeding under sail. The cargo that would have been shipped by the Colombo is being repacked and made ready for shipment by the steamer Othello, of the same line, which will leave for Hull on the 24th inst. There are no tidings of the steamship George Cromwell.

DUMPING STREET DIRT IN THE DOCKS.

James H. Lynch, a fish-dealer doing business at Pier No. 93 East River, yesterday appeared before Pilot Commissioner Blunt, and made complaint that the Street-cleaning Bureau had dumped 1,700 or 1,800 loads of street refuse in the dock leased by him. The dirt filled up the dock, and had been placed there during the night, when he was not present to interfere. By the terms of his lease, he is obliged to maintain a depth of 20 feet of water at the bulkhead, and he fears that the expense of clearing the dock will fall upon him. Mr. Blunt said he could do nothing for Mr. Lynch, although he sympathized with him in his opposition to the practice of filling up the piers, and recommended that he should take his case to the Dock Commissioners for their consideration.

THE COMMON COUNCIL.

PROPOSED MEMORIAL TO THE LEGISLATURE—TAXABLE PROPERTY TO HAVE A REPRESENTATIVE IN THE BOARD OF APPORTIONMENT — THE QUESTION OF DUMPING SNOW INTO THE MAN-HOLES TO THE SEWERS.

In the Board of Aldermen, yesterday, Mr. Lewis J. Phillips offered the following:

Whereas, In the annual Message of his Honor the Mayor to the Common Council the following occurs: "The Board of Estimate and Apportionment, consisting of four of the highest City officials, are charged with a most important duty in fixing and limiting the amount to be raised by taxation and to be expended by each of the departments. a duty which they have discharged with singular fidelity and wisdom. It seems to me that the efficiency of this board might be still further increased by appointing to it an additional member directly representing the taxable property, particularly the real estate, of the City;" and

Whereas, This board fully agrees with the views expressed by his Honor the Mayor, and is clearly of opinion that the efficiency of the Board of Estimate and Apportionment would be thereby increased, and at the same time a direct representation would be given therein to the interest most particularly concerned in its proceedings, be it therefore

Resolved, That the Counsel to the Corporation be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to prepare a memorial on behalf of the Mayor, Aldermen, and Commonalty of the City of New-York, and cause the same to be presented to the Legislature of this State, now in session, praying for the passage of an act providing for the appointment by the Mayor of a competent person, who shall be a tax-payer, to represent the taxable property of this City in the Board of Estimate and Apportionment, such appointee to serve without compensation.

The resolution was referred without debate to the Committee on Law, which consists of Messrs. Lewis, Howland, and Huler.

A communication was received from the Commissioner of Public Works in answer to the resolution of Alderman Morris requesting him to give his views in relation to having the man-holes to the sewers opened for the purpose of having ice and snow emptied therein. The Commissioner in reply states that the unauthorized use of the sewers and receiving basins for this purpose has been a source of much trouble and expense whenever it occurred. He says:

"As an instance, I will mention that the man-holes of the sewer in Broadway, between Washington place and Fourth street, were opened and filled with snow and ice by men of the street-cleaning force in March, 1875, completely stopping up the sewer and causing the flooding of the adjacent cellars. The solid deposit thus formed had to be taken out by hand at great expense. The number and capacity of the sewer man-holes are very small in comparison with the quantity of snow and ice which accumulates in the streets. Many of the old sewers in the lower part of the City were built without man-holes, and those that were recently put in to facilitate examinations and repairs are few, and only large enough to give access to the sewer. Of the small quantity of snow and ice that could thus be put in the man-holes, only a small proportion would be melted, as the temperature in the sewers would soon be reduced below the melting point, and the ice, remaining, would soon stop all drainage. The most effectual way in which the sewers can be made to contribute to the removal of snow and ice from the streets is by keeping the gutters, culverts, and mouths of receiving basins unobstructed. The attention of the Police Department was recently called to this fact, and they promptly responded by approving the suggestions made. From the foregoing, it is very clear that the emptying of snow and ice into the sewer man-holes is altogether unadvisable and should not be permitted." The communication was ordered to be printed.

A petition from a number of property-owners and residents of the Seventh Ward requesting that the dumping board at the foot of Market street be removed, was referred to the Committee on Police and Health.

The board then adjourned.

THE LOSS OF THE CIRCASSIAN.

FINDING OF THE BRITISH NAVAL COURT—THE DANGER OF RELYING ON SPIRIT COMPASSES.

The British Naval Court in this City, composed of the British Consul, Mr. E. M. Archibald, Capt. Samuel Brooks, of the steam-ship City of Richmond, and Capt. J. A. Robbins, of the bark Milo, of Yarmouth, Nova Scotia, yesterday sent to the Pilot Commissioners their finding in the case of the ship Circassian, which was stranded off Bridgehampton, Long Island, on the 11th of December. Taking into consideration all the facts, they are of the opinion that the pilot was mistaken in his calculation of the position of the ship, and that the standard compass, which there had been no opportunity of testing, may have indicated less than the allowed variation. The pilot is said not to have been in charge of the ship when she stranded, and had been below for about two hours before this. It is evident, however, that the master relied on the confident assertion of the pilot as to the locality of the soundings at 8 P. M., ignoring the similar soundings near Montauk, of which the pilot, also, appears to have been forgetful. But, however confident the master may have been of his position at 8 P. M., still, considering the state of the weather, and the recent change of the standard compass, he committed a grave error in not having sounded at 9, or at latest, 10 P. M., whereby the fatal calamity which befell the ship would doubtless have been averted. The court thinks it proper to call attention to the hazard of mistaking the soundings near Montauk for those of similar depth further to the south-west, when approaching the coast in thick weather, after having had no correct observation during several previous days. They also call attention to the fact of a so-called spirit compass being rendered worse than useless by the action of frost, whereby ships approaching the coast at night, and during intensely cold weather, may be stranded before the condition of the compass is perceptible.

MONEY ORDER BUSINESS.

REPORT OF THE SUPERINTENDENT OF THE DEPARTMENT FOR THE PAST YEAR.

The report of Mr. William Plimley, Superintendent of the Money Order Department of the New-York Post Office, for the year ending Dec. 31, 1876, recently submitted to Postmaster James, presents some interesting features. As it is necessary for international orders from the smaller cities of the United States to pass through the New-York office, the work at this point is of a more complicated character than elsewhere, the greatest care being expended in calculating the difference between United States currency and the moneys of foreign countries. Should a clerk make a mistake in converting United States money into the shillings and pence of England, the marks and pfennings of Germany, the francs and centimes of France and Switzerland, &c., he would have to make it good when the list was returned to the Auditor at Washington. There has been a great saving to the Government in the Money Order Department, the cumbersome registers formerly used having been dispensed with and press copies taken in copyable ink. Clerk hire has also been reduced at the same time. The domestic business is greatly on the increase, 3,000 orders during the past and present month having been paid between the hours of 10 A. M. and 3 P. M. Following is a summary of the business for the year 1876:

	Items, No.	Amount.

NATIONAL BANKS IN NEW-YORK.

CURIOUS STATISTICS OF THE DISTRIBUTION OF OWNERS.

The whole number of shares of national bank stock issued to banks located in the State of New-York was 1,482,746, of which number 1,216,478 were held by residents of the State, and 266,268 by non-residents. The number of shareholders in the state was 26,339; the number of non-resident shareholders, 7,742. The number of shareholders owning 10 shares or less, 12,784; over 10 and not more than 20, 6,936; over 20 and not more than 30, 3,610; over 30 and not more than 40, 2,233; over 40 and not more than 50, 2,233; over 50 and not more than 100, 3,573; over 100 and not more than 500, 2,491; over 500, 205.

The number of shares of New-York national bank stock held in the Eastern States was 193,659; Middle States, 40,293; Southern States, 4,907; Western States, 11,947; Pacific States, 545.

The number of shares held in foreign countries was 14,884, of which 3,025 were held in Great Britain; 2,214, in France; 130, in Germany; 1,488, in Spain; 3,992, in the Dominion of Canada; 866, in Mexico; 726, in the West Indies; 73, in Bermuda; 97, in South America; 20, in Prussia; 20, in Bavaria; 849, in Holland; 16, in Russia; 1,960, in Switzerland; 280, in Italy; 54, in Turkey; 19, in Corsica; 340, in Europe not specified; 20, in India; 40, in Egypt, and 30, in Africa not specified. These shares are unfully divided into amounts of $100 each.

GENERAL TELEGRAPH NEWS

THE LOUISIANA INVESTIGATION.

THE SENATE COMMITTEE NEARLY THROUGH WITH ITS LABORS.

NEW-ORLEANS, Jan. 18.—The Senate committee is actively engaged in closing its labors, and will leave to-morrow night for Washington. A large amount of testimony has been taken, principally in relation to the election in Northern Louisiana. There is no change in the situation here, and none is probable until the reports of the two committees have been made and acted upon.

The committee continued to-day their examination of the election in the Parish of Richland. H. F. Vickers and John A. Hemler testified that the election was fair and free; they knew of no intimidation; that the former said he had heard one colored man say he had been told he must vote the Democratic ticket; the witness had told his colored hands that any one who voted the Republican ticket need not expect employment after their contracts expired, as he claimed the right of an American citizen to employ whom he chose; the latter [Hemler] said he would give him preference in employing hands to men of his own party.

William R. Hardy, District Attorney, testified that Capt. Farmer advised him not to attempt to make a canvass in Richland Parish, but to confine himself to Ouachita.

Alexander B. George, holding over Senator from the Eleventh Parish of Webster, testified as to the peaceful election, and that the avowed policy of the Democrats was to give no pretext for Republicans to claim intimidation.

Henry Blair, colored, testified to general and specific intimidation in Morehouse Parish; that the Republicans were not allowed to make a canvass; that he had been threatened with death by his employer, Dr. Larkin, and others, for being a Republican; that George Boyd, colored school teacher, and himself were driven from the parish.

Mrs. Ann Mitchell, widow of "Ike" Mitchell, detailed the particulars of the killing of her husband by eight whites, who came to her house with masks on; they said they would teach him that a radical hole. She said that after "Ike" was beaten by Charles Barrows, James Downing, and Robert Wilson, with their pistols, they took him outside and shot him to death; Barrow's mask was torn off in the scuffle.

Dr. McCrindell, Coroner of the parish, testified to holding an inquest on Gilbert Carter, and that he was unable to get more than two witnesses; the verdict was, "Killed by persons unknown;" in the case of "Ike" Mitchell he was unable to get any witnesses; the whites there raised money to pay his widow's expenses from New-Orleans in order that she might testify at the inquest, as they were anxious to have the murder investigated, but she refused to come back.

Ephraim Smith, colored, testified to the intimidation of colored Democrats by colored Republicans.

Charles G. Fisher, attorney, testified that there were between 900 and 1,000 colored members of Democratic clubs in the parish.

The Senate sub-committee resumed their examination of the election in West Feliciana. Henry Brookhart and John Haley, colored, testified to voting the Democratic ticket, and that there was no intimidation. J. B. Sims, Dr. H. R. Ryland, and W. S. Hamilton testified that there was no political intimidation; but that owing to the lawlessness, pillaging and killing of stock, a club had been formed to punish the offenders; it was called the Union Conservative Club, and the members visited the houses of suspected persons and administered chastisement; Mr. Sims said two or three colored men had been hanged and ten or twelve shot or killed, but none of these acts had any connection with politics; Henry Temple, he said, left the parish because he had once led a colored company to Bayou Sara, and was afraid of the consequences.

SITTING BULL'S RECENT DEFEAT.

COL. MILES' OFFICIAL REPORT—FIVE SIOUX CHIEFS KILLED—A CAMP CAPTURED AND DESTROYED—SEVERITY OF THE WEATHER.

CHICAGO, Jan. 18.—The following is an extract from Col. Miles' official report of the recent battle with Sitting Bull's band:

Sitting Bull's band was again defeated at the head of the Red Water, Dec. 18, by three companies of the 5th Infantry, under command of Lieut. Frank D. Baldwin. The Indian trail was obscured by a severe snow storm when north of the Missouri, and as the reports were conflicting I divided my force, taking three companies through the Muscle Shell and Dry Forks country, and sending three down the north side of the Missouri. Four companies under Capt. Snyder being there on the Dry Forks. Sitting Bull had crossed near Wolf Point, but retreated back again at the head of his camp of 122 lodges. He was driven south of the Yellowstone, and his camp captured with many lodges stanching. Together with 60 horses, mules, and ponies. Everything was burned. The Indian village was burned. The Indians escaped with very little besides what they had on their backs. Lieut. Baldwin and the officers and troops with him are entitled to great credit. The command has marched over 500 miles—walking 73 in 48 hours—and enduring the severity of a Montana Winter with great fortitude. Five prominent chiefs of the Sioux nation were killed by their old enemies, the Crow scouts, at this point, on the 17th of December, while coming in bearing a flag of truce. Of 39 men, 30 or 40 others. The guilty Crows escaped by flight. This affair was most unfortunate, as their coming in would have secured the surrender of at least 1,000 fighting men. The thermometer now registers 40° below zero.

CHEYENNE, Jan. 18.—News was received here to-day from Chugwater Station, 50 miles north of this city, that a party of Indians made a raid on the ranches near there last night and drove off 50 horses. The ranchmen followed the Indians for several miles, but the latter succeeded in getting away with the stock.

THE DOMINION BOARD OF TRADE.

OTTAWA, Jan. 18.—At the morning session of the Dominion Board of Trade, Hon. Mr. Starnes, of Halifax, addressed the board on the sugar question, stating that the consumption of sugar in Canada was 100,000,000 pounds per annum. He also dwelt strongly on the importance of opening up more extended trade relations with the West Indies. He moved the adoption of a resolution to the effect that the Government be memorialized for a readjustment of the duties on sugar. Mr. Howland moved an amendment that a duty of 50 cents be imposed on all coal imported into this country. Mr. Patterson, of Montreal, moved an amendment to the amendment, that in view of the distressed state of all the important interests of the country, arising to a great extent from differential duties and drawbacks in force in the United States, this board favors the adoption by Canada of a national policy calculated to maintain and develop the trade and domestic manufact

CHADWICK'S POEMS.

A BOOK OF POEMS. By JOHN W. CHADWICK. Boston: ROBERTS BROTHERS.

William Morris is at present almost the only living poet who sings an epic song. Our poets take short flights. Their verses are more personal and introspective than they used to be. They speak their words in song, but the song ends with the description of the mood of the moment. The short lyric poem, which embodies the thought or feeling which is here today and is gone to-morrow, is the almost unvarying type of the best poetry of the period, and it may be that these swift and hurrying days in which we live are unfavorable either to the production or appreciation of anything else. It is certain that only genius like Milton's can win people back to the slow stages of the epic, and even that epic slowly made its way into public favor during the poet's life.

Among these poets of lyric song and of the inward life John W. Chadwick now takes a place with his fugitive poems which has been fairly won, and which is destined to be higher as he gains the more thorough mastery of the poetic art and a wider experience of life. The immediate popularity of these poems—the third edition has been called for within a month from their publication—shows that they are readable and within the range of the public taste. But they are more. Without the slightest effort to take up ambitious subjects, they deal so familiarly and sweetly with the topics of home and nature and the silent experiences of the soul, and touch the commonplaces of life with such poetic insight, that the reader is held by the book until the author has won his heart. Mr. Chadwick has evidently written because he could not help it, and his verses are genuine poetry. The poems are remarkably even in their character; nearly every one has some delicate thought, some expressive line, some comparison, some hint at the deeper meaning of life, which justifies its existence. The author has taken counsel with his own mind and heart; his verse is sincere and truthful, and its melody is perfect. It is very seldom that a first volume is so good or so even; more seldom still that a poet bravely speaks his inmost thoughts to the world. Mr. Chadwick has not held back his own individuality, and in expressing what seems truth to the poet's eye he has spoken the best convictions and unshaped thoughts of others, and spoken precisely what bright people look for in lyric poetry. His poems are original in their conception and expression. If you fancy that you hear the echoes of Tennyson or Longfellow or Clough, you speedily discover that Mr. Chadwick's method and thought are his own, and that his poetry is the reflection of various moments and moods in his own life.

Among the minor poets, if those are minor who are only younger than others, Mr. Chadwick must take high rank for the originality, purity, and sincerity of his poems, and for their religious purpose. There are many writers of verses who have done equally good work, and their fugitive pieces in the numerous collections of poetry show what rare visitations come to single minds and hearts. The late Dr. E. H. Sears, William C. Gannett, Harriet McEwen Kimball, Dr. H. N. Powers, "H. H.," Mrs. S. M. B. Piatt, and Thomas Bailey Aldrich are conspicuous examples of what individuals have accomplished in lyric and subjective poetry among the new school of poets, but Mr. Chadwick surpasses them all in the purity, melody, and ethical quality of his verses. They have just enough personality to awaken your sympathy, and go far enough in speaking your own thoughts to gain your confidence. Dr. Powers almost equals him in the simplicity and beauty of his domestic poems, but when the two attempt a landscape or essay to interpret nature, Mr. Chadwick surpasses him in the insight and richness of his conceptions and in the absence of any affectation. He is a native of the old fishing town of Marblehead, near Boston, and his poetry is the language of his boyhood upon the sea and of his constant communion with its bold cliffs and striking scenery. Its excellence is that it connects nature, whether by sea or land, with the experiences of life and with the higher convictions of the soul. This ethical quality becomes more marked as he comes to deal with incidents of actual life. "Real and Ideal," "Tête-à-Tête," "The Heart of it," "Water and the Spirit," "Gift in Sleep" are instances in point. The incidents on which the verses are founded are so treated that the poems end in each case with such suggestions that the verses become the language of certain emotions forevermore. The religious poems in the volume are not always his best, and in some respects they are inferior to Dr. Powers', with whom Mr. Chadwick has many points of likeness and contact, but these which bring in religious thoughts incidentally are always his best. "The One True Christ," however, is an exception. It is one of the best pieces which he has written, and is as beautiful for its thought as for its expression. Perhaps the finest thing in the volume is the dedicatory poem. Men's hearts have gone into the dedication of their books, and Mr. Chadwick's has certainly gone into these lines, which are wonderful for the sympathy and love which he has crowded into the simplest words. Another poem which shows his powers at their best is "Auld Lang Syne," the last piece in the volume.

It would not be difficult, if we felt so disposed, to find fault with these poems; they exist, and can be easily detected, but the book has such exceptional goodness, and shows so unmistakably the advent of a new poet, and has so few of the weaknesses of those who publish their first volumes, that we prefer gladly to recognize in Mr. Chadwick the poetical talent, if not genius, which he so clearly displays, and to welcome him, not excepting even the author of Deirdrè, as having produced, on the whole, the most notable, and perhaps the best volume of original American poetry during the past year. His latest poems are his best, and, if he cultivates this fine gift according to his privilege, his next volume will be a very substantial addition to our literature.

THE LEVANT. By CHARLES DUDLEY WARNER. Author of "My Summer in a Garden," "Saunterings," "My Winter on the Nile," &c. Boston: JAMES R. OSGOOD & Co., 1877, pp. 374.

In a certain sense this delightful little volume is a sequel to Mr. Warner's book Mummies and Moslems otherwise known as My Winter on the Nile. It is not so leisurely and languid as the story of the journey up the Nile. But it is quite as picturesque and more immediately of interest. Incidentally, the author throws some light on the much-vexed Eastern question, or at least, on the condition of affairs in Turkey, which enters so largely into that problem. Mr. Warner begins his journey at Jaffa and Jerusalem. He closes it at Brindisi, having passed through the Holy Land, Turkey in Europe, Athens, the Egean Sea, Constantinople, and the contiguous waters.

The style of the author is well-known as one which is agreeable, fluent, and graceful, without being offensively strong or rugged. Mr. Warner's fun is very light and airy; sometimes his humor is so very thin that dull people become impatient and demand something more satisfying. Nevertheless, he does make a most readable book. In the volume under review he has shown a happy faculty for skipping the things which the average reader does not care to hear about, and touching only those which have some charm of novelty. Perhaps it is Mr. Warner's nice touch after all, that gives these venerable subjects an air of freshness. He does not much concern himself about the politics, the philosophy, or what may be called "the great questions," which the world fancies are dominant topics in the Levant. He shows us their houses, shops, street life, and the every-day concerns of the people. And he tells his story so brightly that one needs must read. Mr. Warner happened upon Cyprus just after Gen. di Cesnola's latest discoveries at Curium. Now that the treasures there unearthed are to be deposited in New-York, this brief extract will have interest to local readers:

"Gen. L. P. di Cesnola, the explorer of Cyprus, is of a noble Piedmontese family; he received a military and classical education at Turin; identified with the party of Italian unity, his sympathies were naturally excited by the contest in America; he offered his sword to our Government, and served with distinction in the war for the Union. At its close he was appointed Consul at Cyprus, a position of no pecuniary attraction, but I presume that the new Consul had in view the explorations which have given his name such honorable celebrity in both hemispheres. The difficulties of his undertaking were many. He had to encounter at every step the jealousy of the Turkish Government and the fanaticism and superstition of the occupants of the soil. Archæological researches are not easy in the East under the most favorable circumstances, and in places where the traces of ancient habitations are visible above ground, the ancient sites are unknown; but in Cyprus no ruins exist in sight to aid the explorer, and, with the exception of one or two localities, no names of ancient places are known to the present generation. But the Consul was convinced that the great powers which had from age to age held Cyprus must have left some traces of their occupation, and that intelligent search would discover the ruins of prosperous cities described by Strabo and mentioned by the geographer Ptolemy. Without other guides than the descriptions of these and other ancient writers, the Consul began his search in 1867, and up to 1875 he had ascertained the exact sites of 11 ancient cities mentioned by Strabo and Ptolemy, most of which had ceased to exist before the Christian era, and none of which had left vestiges above the soil. We spent the afternoon in examining the new collection of Gen. di Cesnola, not so large as that in the Metropolitan Museum, but perhaps richer in some respects, particularly in iridescent glass.

"In the autumn of 1875, however, the labors of the indefatigable explorer were crowned with a discovery of riches which cast into the shade the real or pretended treasures of the 'House of Priam' a discovery not certainly of more value to art than those that preceded it, but well calculated to excite popular wonder. The finding of the subterranean hoard reads like an adventure of Aladdin. In pursuing his researches at Curium, on the south-western side of the island, Gen. di Cesnola came upon the site of an ancient temple, and uncovered its broken mosaic pavement. Beneath this, and at the depth of 25 feet, he broke into a subterranean passage cut in the rock. This passage led to a room; no genie sat by it, but it was securely closed by a stone slab. When this was removed, a suite of four rooms was disclosed, but they were not immediately accessible; earth sifting through the roofs for ages had filled them, and it required the labor of 8 months to clear out the chambers. Imagine the feverish enthusiasm of the explorer as he slowly penetrated this treasure-house, where every stroke of the pick disclosed the gleam of buried treasure! In the first room were found only gold objects; in the second only silver and silver-gilt ornaments and utensils; in the third, alabasters, terra-cottas, vases, and groups of figures; in the fourth, bronzes and nothing else. It is the opinion of the discoverer that these four rooms were the depositories where the crafty priests and priestesses of the old temple used to hide their treasures during the times of war, or at sudden invasions. I cannot but think that the mysterious subterranean passages and chambers in the ancient temples of Egypt served a similar purpose. The treasure found scattered in these rooms did not appear to be the whole belonging to the temple, but only a part, left perhaps in the confusion of a hasty flight. Among the articles found in the first room, cumped in a heap in the middle (as if they had been suddenly, in a panic, stripped from the altar in the temple, and cast into a place of concealment,) were a gold cup, covered with Egyptian embossed work and two bracelets of pure gold, weighing over three pounds, inscribed with the name of 'Etevander, King of Paphos.' This King lived in 635 B. C., and in 620 B. C. paid tribute to the Assyrian monarch Assurbanapal, (Sardanapalus,) as is recorded on an Assyrian tablet now in the British Museum. There were also many gold necklaces, bracelets, earrings, finger-rings, brooches, seals, armlets, &c.—in all 480 gold articles. In the silver room, arranged on the shelves in the museum, were vases, bottles, cups, bowls, bracelets, finger-rings, ear-rings, seals, &c. One of the most curious and valuable objects is a silver-gilt bowl, having upon it very fine embossed Egyptian work, and evidently of high antiquity. In the third room—of vases and terra-cottas—were some 900 more or less interesting specimens. The bronze-room yielded several high candelabra, lamp-holders, lamps, statuettes, bulls' heads, bowls, vases, jugs, patera, fibulæ, rings, bracelets, mirrors, &c. Nearly all the objects in the four rooms seem to have been 'votive offerings,' and testify a pagan devotion to the gods not excelled by Christian zeal, nearly to the limit of human jealousy, in modern worship. The inscriptions beteken the votive character of these treasures; that upon the heavy gold armlets is in the genitive case, and would be literally translated Etevandri Regis Paphi, the words 'offering of' being understood to precede it.

LITERARY NOTES.

—Mr. Dutton Cook's Book of the Play has already reached a second edition.

—Fraser's Magazine for January contains the genuine autobiography of a modern Icelander, entitled "Jón Jónsson's Saga."

—The January number of the British Quarterly Review has an exhaustive paper on "Herbert Spencer's Sociology, its Ground, Motive, and Sphere."

—The survey of Continental literature for 1876 in the Athenæum for Dec. 30, by the leading literary men in each country, is worthy of special attention from all students of literature.

—The English Clergyman's Magazine, to be obtained of T. Whittaker, No. 2 Bible House, has an article in the January number, by Dr. B. W. Richardson, author of "Diseases of Modern Life," on "The Inner Relationship of Clerical and Medical Functions," which clergymen ought to find both important and useful.

—Lippincott's Magazine for February contains the first chapters of Berthold Auerbach's "Young Aloys, or the Gawk from America," translated by Charles T. Brooks, an excellent critical article on "The Second Part of Goethe's Faust," by William Henry Goodyear, and Gail Hamilton's characteristic "Railroad Reflections."

—Prof. Alexander Bain, of Aberdeen, whose death has been announced, will have a posthumous article in the Popular Science Monthly for February and March. The title will be "Education as a Science." We are informed that Prof. Bain spent his life in studies on the mutual relations to each other of body and mind, and some of the conclusions to which he attained will probably appear in the coming essay. This was to form the first installment of a volume for the International Scientific Series, published by the Messrs. Appleton, to which Prof. Youmans had asked him to contribute.

—The January Contemporary Review contains a notable list of articles: "Modern Atheism—its Attitude toward Morality," by W. H. Mallock; "The History, Functions, and Prospects of Friendly Societies," by Rev. W. Walter Edwards; "Imperfect Genius—William Blake," by H. G. Hewlet; "An Inner View of the Vatican Council," by Dr. R. F. Littledale; "The Buddhist Doctrine of Nirvana," by T. W. Rhys Davids; "Weimar under Schiller and Goethe," by H. Schütz Wilson; "The Ethics of Belief," by Prof. Clifford, and "Economic Fallacies—Free Trade vs. Protection," by Sir Anthony Musgrave.

—The January Fortnightly Review hardly yields to the Contemporary in the importance and ability of its articles. "Public House Reform" is by Right Hon. Robert Lowe; "Charles Kingsley" by G. A. Simcox; "English Landownership" by G. Shaw Lefevre, M. P.; "Free Schools" by J. Chamberlain, M. P.; "Geographical Aspects of the Eastern Question" by E. A. Freeman; "Three New Novels" by A. Lang; "Growth of Indian Clans and Castes" by A. C. Lyall; "Constantinople and our Road to India" by Sir H. Havelock, M. P., and the usual criticism of "Home and Foreign Affairs" by the editor, John Morley.

—Prof. Hjalmar Hjarth Boyesen, the Norwegian who has become an author in the English language and is now settled at Cornell University, will have a paper in the International Review for March treating of a subject which ought to be a familiar one. It will discuss the literary and social ideals of the age to which the Norse Sagas belong, using these Sagas as a text, and speaking more particularly from the translations of that class of literature by Prof. Anderson, of Wisconsin University. We are informed that Profs. Fiske and Boyesen, of Cornell, have between them the only complete library of Saga literature in the United States. The article will be called "Saga Civilization."

MONITOR TO BE COMPLETED.

The double-turreted monitor Amphitrite, which has been in course of construction for the past two years at the Marine & Railway Works, Chester, Pa., will be completed at an early day by order of the Government. Her construction was contracted for in parts, and the final contract was awarded last week.

LAW REPORTS.

A MILLIONAIRE'S PROPERTY.

TWO GRANDDAUGHTERS OF EUGENE SUE SUING FOR THEIR SHARES IN THEIR FATHER'S ESTATE—THE WILL OF NATHANIEL NILES, THE ELDER, AND THE ALLEGED CONDUCT OF NATHANIEL NILES, THE YOUNGER.

A very interesting suit was brought up and argued before Judge Donohue in Supreme Court, Chambers, yesterday. The action grows out of the disposition of the estate of the late Nathaniel Niles, a well known lawyer of this City, who died in 1869, leaving property valued in round numbers at $1,000,000. By his will, which was duly admitted to probate by the Surrogate of this County, his two daughters were appointed Executrices, and his nephew, Nathaniel Niles, and his son-in-law, Martin Van Buren Wilcoxson, were appointed Executors of the estate. The daughters are twins, and are the granddaughters of Eugene Sue, the French novelist, who, it is said, took from them his portraitures of his heroines in the Wandering Jew. Nathaniel Niles, the Executor, it is said, has had the principal control of the estate of the testator. In the latter's will, after giving life annuities of $10,000 to the husbands of his two daughters, he gave these daughters the whole of the estate. It is provided in the will that in case both daughters die without lawful issue, the estate is to go to Marsten Niles, a brother of the younger Nathaniel Niles. One of the testator's daughters was unmarried at the time of his death and the other was married to Martin Van Buren Wilcoxson. Soon after the testator's death Mr. and Mrs. Wilcoxson went abroad and traveled in England and on the Continent. A child, afterward christened Martin Emanuel Niles Wilcoxson, was born to them at Florence, Italy, in 1870. This child is still living. Mr. Wilcoxson himself died at Brentford, England, in 1874. In the Spring of 1875 an accounting of the estate of Nathaniel Niles, deceased, was had, under an order of the Surrogate, between the Executor, Nathaniel Niles, and Pascal W. Turney, a lawyer now deceased, but who was at the time the nuncupative guardian of the child of Mr. and Mrs. Wilcoxson. A short time afterward the second daughter of the testator was married to Gen. Adam Badeau, the United States Consul-General in London, England. This marriage was solemnized with great eclat at the Gramercy Park Hotel in this City, and was noteworthy, aside from the great number of prominent guests who were present, as being the second marriage ceremony performed by Cardinal McCloskey. The married couple went to London accompanied by Mrs. Wilcoxson, then a widow. While the party was on a tour to Brussels, Belgium, Mrs. Wilcoxson made the acquaintance of one Amedee Wilbaux, who shortly afterward proposed marriage to her and was accepted. The twain were duly made one, and Mr. and Mrs. Badeau, accompanied by Mr. and Mrs. Wilbaux, subsequently returned to this City and are now residing at the Gramercy Park Hotel. Mrs. Badeau and Mrs. Wilbaux, the two daughters of Nathaniel Niles, are now suing their cousin Nathaniel Niles, the Executor of their father's estate, to make him account with them for the money and property which he has received during his alleged sole management of the estate. Marsten Niles, the contingent remainder man, Gen. Badeau, M. Wilbaux, and the child of Mrs. Wilbaux by her former marriage, are made defendants in the suit, so that all the parties may be before the court and have their rights adjudicated on. In their complaint the plaintiffs charge that while immense revenues should have been, and, in fact, were derived from the estate of their father, their cousin, Nathaniel Niles, the Executor, has doled out to them a wretched pittance wholly insufficient to enable them to live either in a style of comfort or in the style in which they lived during the lifetime of their father, and this, notwithstanding that the latter's will gives to them all of the rents, issues, and profits of the estate. The case was brought up before Judge Donohue yesterday on a motion for the appointment of a Receiver of the estate during the pendency of the suit. The affidavits of the plaintiffs disclosed that they are in the receipt of only $125 each per month from Nathaniel Niles. They charge the latter with also allowing the annual taxes upon the whole estate to remain due and unpaid for several years; with permitting the sale of a portion of the estate for unpaid taxes; and with persistently refusing during the past few years to sell any part of the unimproved real estate, which embraces about 75 lots on the Boulevard and 30 acres of land in that portion of Westchester County recently annexed to this City. When the motion was called in court yesterday, Messrs. Niles & Bigley, who appeared for Nathaniel Niles, and Marston Niles, who appeared in person, asked for an adjournment for one week. This was strongly contested by Richard Busteed & Son, representing Mrs. Badeau; by Crosby & Hoffman, who appear for Mrs. Wilbaux, and by William Allen Butler, who is the guardian ad litem of Mrs. Wilbaux's child. The defendants, in answer, state that the plaintiffs are bound by the accounting up to March, 1875, when it was had, and Nathaniel Niles denies that he is guilty of any improper administration as Executor of the estate. In opposition to this Mr. Busteed stated in court yesterday that the only advantage ever derived from the accounting referred to was derived by the lawyers, the guardian Turney being allowed $1,500, his partner, Mr. Harrison $500, and Messrs. Niles & Bagley $2,000 of the moneys of the estate. He claimed that the plaintiffs had not been cited to appear and in fact did not appear, either personally or by counsel, at the accounting, and were therefore not bound by it; and that, as far as they were concerned, the payments made to Turney & Harrison and Niles & Bagley were illegal. The case was adjourned for further amendment at 11 A. M. to-day.

THE FERRY TICKET CONSPIRACY.

COUNSEL FOR THE PROSECUTION CONCLUDES HIS SUMMING UP—THE CASE GIVEN TO THE JURY.

At the opening of Part II. of the Court of General Sessions, yesterday, Mr. Charles W. Brooke, counsel for the Pennsylvania Railroad Company, resumed his summing up in the case of Jacob A. Van Voickenberg and George W. West, employes of the company at the Cortlandt Street Ferry, charged with conspiracy to defraud. Counsel reviewed and commented at length on the evidence adduced by the prosecution, and argued that the evidence of Plattner had been corroborated at every point, leaving no doubt of the guilt of the accused. The defense had in their desperation, charged the prosecution with having procured perjured testimony. What earthly object could the company have in persecuting these two employes if they were innocent? Mr. Gwinner, the Auditor of the company, who had gone on the witness stand in the discharge of his duty, had been fiercely assailed and subjected to the coarsest vituperation by the defense, yet nobody regretted the unpleasant duty of prosecuting these men more than Mr. Gwinner did. He was a respected official of the Pennsylvania Railroad Company, and was honored with the high trust of guarding and accounting for the revenues of that corporation, which went to the benefit of stockholders and the support of widows and orphans. Could he allow these dishonest men to filch from the treasury of the company between $60,000 and $70,000 per year in ferry tickets, and was it not his high duty to the stockholders and the public to punish them? He had never come in contact with these men, was not personally acquainted with them, and could have had no personal hostility to them; yet the moment he felt sinful officer, in the discharge of his duty, began to investigate the frauds which he knew to exist, for the purpose of protecting the stockholders, he was made the subject of the bitterest abuse and condemnation by the counsel whom these dishonest men had employed to defend them. In concluding his able argument of five hours' duration, Mr. Brooke said if the accused were guilty, as the evidence of the prosecution had shown them to be, it was the solemn duty of the jury, under their oaths, to vindicate the law and protect the public by returning a verdict of guilty. If, on the other hand, they could, upon the evidence, find the prisoners not guilty, the prosecution would rest entirely satisfied with the result. Judge Sutherland then delivered a brief but comprehensive charge, and at 2 P. M. the jury retired. At 8 P. M. they had not agreed upon a verdict, and were locked up for the night.

BURGLARY AND FELONIOUS ASSAULT.

On the night of the 8th inst., James Farrell, aged 18, of No. 321 Ninth avenue, broke into the liquor store of Bernard Courtney, at No. 315 Seventh avenue, and stole 1,500 cigars. Officer John McDowell, of the Twenty-ninth Precinct, saw the burglar carrying off his plunder, and seized him. The latter resisted forcibly, and drawing a revolver, shot the officer in the head, inflicting a serious wound. The policeman, nevertheless, retained his grasp of the burglar, and succeeded in taking him to the station-house. When the case was called by Assistant District Attorney Rollins yesterday in Part I. of the Court of General Sessions, the prisoner pleaded guilty to two indictments—one for burglary, and one for felonious assault. Judge Gildersleeve sentenced the desperado to five years' imprisonment on each indictment, ten years in all.

THE "PIQUE" LITIGATION.

The case of Augustin Daly against Norman L. Munro was brought to trial before Judge Speir in the Special Term of the Superior Court yesterday. The action is brought to restrain the publication by the defendant of a story entitled "Married Through Pique," which Mr. Daly claims is a colorable imitation or adaptation of his play of "Pique." Mr. Daly also claims damages for the publication. The plaintiff was put on the stand as a witness yesterday, and submitted on cross-examination that he had taken portions of the plot of "Pique" from Florence Marryat's novel Her Lord and Master. J. Abarbanell, the writer of the story in the defendant's publication, testified that he had used the plot of the play, but had added very much new matter in the story. He had written the story, he said, from his impressions of the play, but not from his recollection of the words of the latter. Judge Speir took the papers, reserving his decision. Olin, Rives & Montgomery appeared for the plaintiff and B. S. Newcombe for the defendant.

A BROOKLYN DIVORCE SUIT.

ONE OF THE WITNESSES COMMITTED FOR PERJURY BY DIRECTION OF JUDGE M'CUE.

In the City Court of Brooklyn, before Judge McCue, the divorce suit of Oswald Miller against his wife Margaret was on trial yesterday. Both are Germans and quite young. They were married in 1871, and have two children, one a girl about 4 years old, and a boy of some 2 years. The husband is a tinsmith and works for his father, who is said to be a man well off in this world's goods. The charge is made by the husband that his wife has been guilty of infidelity with a number of persons during the past six months. He claims to have discovered her wrong-doings in August last, and since that time has not lived with her. A number of acts of infidelity are charged as having occurred after the separation. The evidence given at the trial yesterday was contradictory, and in the main unfit for publication. Among the witnesses for the defense was Dr. McManus, who last August made an affidavit that as far as he knew the defendant was a perfectly virtuous woman. McManus was one of the persons with whom it was charged that Mrs. Miller had been criminally intimate. When asked for his reasons for making such a statement he declined ever been criminally intimate with the plaintiff McManus at first refused to answer, and when pressed said that he had at various times before the 16th of August last, the date of his affidavit referred to above. Judge McCue directed McManus to leave the witness stand, and committed him to Raymond Street Jail on a charge of perjury. The case will go on to-day.

AN OLD CONFIDENCE GAME.

HOW A COUNTRYMAN WAS SWINDLED BY TWO SHARPERS.

John Cochrane, alias Slip Cochrane, alias Walter Roberts, of No. 79 Chatham street, and William Fitzgerald, alias Foster, of No. 339 Spring street, two notorious confidence operators, were called up for trial by Assistant District Attorney Rollins yesterday in Part I. of the Court of General Sessions. The tactics adopted by the prisoners in carrying out their schemes were the old threadbare ones, which have become so familiar to the public. On Dec. 24, Mr. James Henry, of Savannah, Wayne County, N. Y., who had engaged passage to Liverpool on the steam-ship Baltic, arrived in this City, and put up at the Foshay House, corner of Charlton and Varick streets. While in the office Cochrane, who sneedily struck up an acquaintance, and said that he, too, was going to Liverpool in the Baltic to sell a number of sewing-machines. Cochrane invited the countryman to accompany him on several excursions through the City, which the latter did, on one of them changing his money for 25 English sovereigns. This Cochrane said he had been swindled, whereupon he made a complaint and had the prisoner arrested. Cochrane and Fitzgerald both pleaded guilty, and Judge Gildersleeve sentenced them to two years each in the State Prison.

UNITED STATES SUPREME COURT.

WASHINGTON, Jan. 18.—The following cases were argued in the United States Supreme Court yesterday:

No. 73.—Lameling vs. United States Freehold and Emigration Company.—Error to the Supreme Court of Colorado Territory.—This was an action of ejectment brought by the company against Lameling to recover a quarter-section of land in Costilla County. The question involved was whether the act of Congress of June, 1864, confirmed what is known as the "Sangre de Christo Grant" to the extent of allowing the full boundaries claimed, including about 1,000,000 acres, and if so what was the effect upon the present claim for a portion of it. The court below found that it did, and that the claim of Lameling was valid as being a portion of it. It is here insisted that the act did not do this, because it was not intended to make new grants; and it would in that case have to be so construed to render this claim valid, because it was not a valid claim under the Mexican laws. If not valid, the grant is void. It could not be confirmed, and the consequence would be that a new grant must be made to make it valid. J. A. Wills for plaintiff in error; M. H. Carpenter for defendant.

No. 164.—West Wisconsin Railroad Company and Baldwin vs. Foley et al., and No. 165.—Same vs. Same.—Error to the Circuit Court for the Western District of Wisconsin.—These were actions brought on bills of exchange drawn and accepted by the company and indorsed by Baldwin. The defense was that Foley, acting as agent of the company in Baltimore for the payment of the interest on certain of its bonds, negotiated them, and they were made and indorsed on the express understanding that they should be paid by the railway company and no one else; that it was agreed that Foley should upon payment of the interest turn the coupons over to the company, but that he has failed to do so, and now holds them as a subsisting indebtedness against the company. It is also said the bills were delivered to the defendant in error, Foley, and not to the defendants in error jointly, and that the company is not informed whether the other defendants have any interest. To this answer demurrer was sustained, the court holding that it was not a defense, and judgment was for the holder of the bills. The judgment is assigned as error, but the plaintiffs here do not offer to prosecute their writ. Argued for defendants in error by W. F. Vilas.

A MUCH LITIGATED CASE.

The case of John S. Dickerson and others against Charles Wason and others, which was brought to trial before Judge Barrett and a jury, in Part III. of the Supreme Court, yesterday, is, in some respects, a rather remarkable one. The present is the fourth trial of the action. It has been three times before the Supreme Court, General Term, and twice before the Court of Appeals. The amount originally involved in the case was $310 18, but interest and costs have greatly increased the amount. The suit is brought on a note placed for collection by the plaintiffs in the hands of Von Saun & Son in July, 1863. The note having been made by a Cleveland firm, it was forwarded by Von Saun & Son to the defendants, who compose the Cleveland firm of Wason, Everett & Co. The defendants collected the amount of the note. They had, however, on the receipt of the note, forwarded to Von Saun & Son $306 36, which left due to the latter only $5 82 on the amount of the note. Von Saun & Son failed before the amount of the note was collected. The plaintiffs sued to recover the whole amount of the note from the defendants. The latter offered to pay the plaintiffs the $5 82, which they said was all that was due. The plaintiffs refused to accept the whole amount, on the ground that the defendants had no rights in the note, except to collect it and send the amount through their agent, Von Saun & Son, to the plaintiffs. The defendants said they had an arrangement with Von Saun & Son whereby they were to advance money to Von Saun & Son on the faith and pledge of the notes which the latter sent them for collection. Judge Barrett charged the jury that if the moneys transmitted by the defendants to Von Sann & Son were a mere advance as a courtesy or for any other reason to the latter, then the defendants, obtaining no rights in the notes, were liable to the plaintiffs. If, on the other hand, there was an agreement not necessarily as to the particular note in suit, but as to all notes sent by Von Saun & Son to the defendants—that the latter should advance money on the notes, then the defendants obtained a lien on the note in question, and judgment must be given in their favor for all excepting the $5 82. The jury rendered a verdict of $613 64 in favor of the plaintiffs.

BURGLARY AND FELONIOUS ASSAULT.

On the night of the 8th inst., James Farrell, aged 18, of No. 321 Ninth avenue, broke into the liquor store of Bernard Courtney, at No. 315 Seventh avenue, and stole 1,500 cigars. Officer John McDowell, of the Twenty-ninth Precinct, saw the burglar carrying off his plunder, and seized him. The latter resisted forcibly, and drawing a revolver, shot the officer in the head, inflicting a serious wound. The policeman, nevertheless, retained his grasp of the burglar, and succeeded in taking him to the station-house. When the case was called by Assistant District Attorney Rollins yesterday in Part I. of the Court of General Sessions, the prisoner pleaded guilty to two indictments—one for burglary, and one for felonious assault. Judge Gildersleeve sentenced the desperado to five years' imprisonment on each indictment, ten years in all.

A SALE OF WHEAT.

The case of Thomas E. Porter and Abram B. Wetmore against Thomas R. Gordon was brought to trial before Judge Van Brunt and a jury in Part II. of the Supreme Court yesterday. The pleadings in the case are similar to those customary in replevin suits. The plaintiffs allege that the defendant took from them 2,870 bushels of wheat, valued at $4,799 11. The plaintiffs, after beginning their action, took under their replevin order 670 barrels of flour and 76 bushels of wheat from the defendant's possession. The defendant in his answer denies the plaintiff's title to the property; alleges that the flour and wheat seized by the plaintiff were worth $5,799, and asks a return of the property and $1,000 damages. On the trial yesterday the plaintiffs attempted to show that the defendant had obtained possession of the wheat through their broker. They alleged that they would not sell any goods to Gordon, and that the latter had obtained them through the broker, while they were ignorant of the fact that the defendant was the purchaser; at any rate their contract was for the sale of the wheat for cash. The wheat was taken by the defendant under cover of the contract, but they obtained no cash. Upon discovering where the goods had been taken the plaintiffs said that they sent notice immediately to Gordon either to pay the money or return the goods. Gordon that very afternoon offered his check for the amount, but they refused to receive it. The plaintiffs then began the present action. The wheat had meanwhile been changed into flour, and the plaintiffs therefore seized the flour. The defendant claimed that credit was given on the sale of the wheat, and endeavored to prove, on the trial yesterday, the damage done to his business by the seizure of the goods outside of the value of the property. This was, however, excluded. The case was given to the jury yesterday afternoon with instructions to bring in a sealed verdict this morning.

COURT NOTES.

Judge Gildersleeve and Assistant District Attorney Rollins obtained 20 convictions yesterday in Part I. of the Court of General Sessions.

In the suit of Peck and Martin against Von Keller, reported in THE TIMES, the jury, in Part II. of the Supreme Court, gave a verdict for the defendant yesterday. The action was for a balance on advances made on notes.

John Brooks, who stole $40 from Charles Hudson, with whom he occupied a room at No. 9 Battery place, was convicted, yesterday, in Part I. of the Court of General Sessions. Judge Gildersleeve sent him to State Prison for four years.

The taking of testimony was concluded yesterday in the suit of John Patten against the New-York Elevated Railroad Company, before Judge Joseph F. Daly, in the Special Term of the Court of Common Pleas. The counsel will begin their summing up on Monday.

August Schulte, of No. 113 Stanton street, and Frank Reiser, of No. 345 Madison street, two of the milk dealers indicted for selling adulterated milk, pleaded guilty yesterday in Part I. of the Court of General Sessions. Judge Gildersleeve fined Schulte $50 and Reiser $25.

The suit of the Mutual Life Insurance Company against James Smith and others was brought to trial before Judge Barrett, in Part III. of the Supreme Court, yesterday. The action is for the foreclosure of a mortgage of $25,000, and involves the construction of the will of Smith's deceased father.

Judge Donohue, in Supreme Court, Chambers, yesterday granted an order of publication of the summons in the case of Charlotte M. Lambert against Charles Lambert. The wife sues for an absolute divorce, on the ground of the defendant's alleged adultery, and it is asserted that the latter cannot be found within this State.

Judge Speir, in the Superior Court, Special Term, yesterday denied a motion to open a default taken by the plaintiff in the suit of Hiram D. Barras against David Bidwell. The suit was to recover royalty on representations of the "Black Crook," and the plaintiff obtained judgment for $3,330 55, by reason of the defendant's non-appearance when the case was called for trial.

Augustus Miller, who was dismissed from his position as a Sergeant of Police by the Commissioners, but whose dismissal was afterward adjudged unwarranted, made application to Judge Donohue, in Supreme Court, Chambers, yesterday, for a mandamus to compel the payment of his salary during the period of two years in which he was engaged in the litigation of his case. He avers that no one was appointed in his stead, and that therefore the City will not be obliged to pay for services already compensated.

The case of Alonzo Dutch against Paul E. Dorsey was tried before Judge Sedgwick and a jury in Part I. of the Superior Court yesterday. In this action the plaintiff claimed $5,000 for false imprisonment. It appeared that he had been arrested on Nov. 10, 1874, on the complaint of the defendant, who charged him with grand larceny. He was locked up over night, but was acquitted of the charge by Police Justice Smith on the following day. The defendant made a general denial. The jury rendered a verdict of $500 in favor of the plaintiff. D. M. Porter appeared for the latter, and S. Sultan for the defendant.

HIGHWAY ROBBERS SENTENCED.

In Part I. of the Court of General Sessions, yesterday, Assistant District Attorney Rollins called up for trial William Dailey, a sailor from Bangor, Me., and James Adams, a waiter from Brooklyn, both of whom were charged with highway robbery. It appeared that as William H. Howard, of New-Haven, Conn., was passing through Water street on the night of the 14th inst. he was attacked by Dailey and Adams, who pushed him against the wall and robbed him of his pocket-book containing $25. Howard raised an alarm and Officer Conlin, of the Fourth Precinct, arrested the youthful highway robbers as they were going off. On being arraigned the prisoners pleaded guilty, and offered no defense of their crime. Judge Gildersleeve said that he had conversed with the complainant in the case, and found that the prisoners had used very little violence and carried no weapons. In fact the offense was little more than larceny from the person, and in view of the extenuating circumstances he would not impose the full penalty. His Honor then sentenced the prisoners to 12 years each in the State Prison.

John Woods, of No. 424 East Eleventh street, a desperado, who, on the night of New Year's Day, brutally assaulted Andrew Smolinski, of No. 203 Avenue A, as he was passing through East Eleventh street, and robbed him of his gold watch and chain and a silk handkerchief, was convicted of highway robbery, and sentenced by Judge Gildersleeve to 15 years in the State Prison.

James Hayes, a youthful vagrant, who induced Frederick Umbelkant, of No. 30 Rivington street, a child of 8 years, to accompany him a distance from home, and then robbed him of his coat, pleaded guilty to larceny from the person. Judge Gildersleeve sentenced the thief to four years in the State Prison at hard labor.

AN EXCHANGE NOT COMPLETED.

Henry Yutte owned a country seat at Hempstead, Long Island, and made an agreement to exchange the same for property in this City owned by one Christian Rank. When the time came for making the trade Rank failed to put in an appearance. Yutte then discovered that Rank had deeded his property to one Edward G. O'Brien, who had in turn deeded it to Dora Rank, the wife of Christian Rank. Yutte then brought a suit in the Superior Court, charging that the transfers of property by Rank and O'Brien were not in good faith. He asked that the transfers be set aside, and that Rank's property be exchanged for his Hempstead property. Rank demurred to this, but Judge Speir yesterday overruled the demurrer as frivolous, and gave judgment for the plaintiff.

Some amusement as well as instruction may be extracted from the views expressed by members of Congress in regard to the counting plan of the Joint Committee. Men differing very widely on the merits of the bill agree in the assumption that the House of Representatives has parted with some of its powers to the new tribunal which has been proposed, and that the main objections to the plan must relate to the defensibility of any such delegation of authority. It does not seem to have occurred to these gentlemen, that the powers which the majority of the House claim to exercise over the choice of the States find no warrant in the Constitution, and that the framers of that instrument took every precaution to guard against any interference by Congress with the legally-declared verdict of the Electoral Colleges. Nor do they appear to have grasped the fact that the only powers delegated by the plan are those of the Vice President of the United States, and that the only fatal objections which can be urged against it are that it places the functions of that officer in the hands of a commission whose origin is as unconstitutional as its composition is unwise.

So far as can be judged, a majority of the Senate will be found to favor the plan. There is a curious division of opinion among Democrats as to its merits, one set being prepared to support it warmly, while another denounces it most energetically. Unless among the Senators who are responsible for the joint authorship of the bill, the prevailing Republican sentiment in the Senate appears to be that it ought to be accepted as the readiest way out of existing difficulties, rather than a satisfactory embodiment of principle or constitutional precedent. The vicious assumption underlying the measure seems to receive as little attention in the Senate as it does from members of the House, though here and there we find from both houses expressions which show a perception of the fact that the stability of the Constitution is not a thing to be sacrificed at any call of partisan expediency, however urgent. After a little reflection, it will probably be discovered that a tribunal constituted on a strict party basis can only reach a decision either by the aid of the chance selection of a fifth Judge of the Supreme Court or by what will be called the treachery of some of the Senators or Representatives composing the court. In any case, the next President must owe his election under the proposed plan, to influences which will be strongly tainted by personal caprice or self-interest, and will, by the disappointed party, probably be associated with corrupt intrigue The gross folly of exposing Judges of the Supreme Court to any such imputations will not certainly be redeemed by any temporary lull which the bill will interpose to the strife of opposing factions.

We publish, by permission, a letter addressed a week ago by ex-Gov. DIX to Mr. JOHN A. KASSON, Representative from Iowa, on the question of counting the Electoral vote. It will be observed that Gen. DIX devotes special attention to the changes of phraseology relating to this subject which were introduced in the Federal Convention, and deduces from them a strong argument in favor of the power of the President of the Senate to count the votes and declare the result. To this point allusion has already been made in these columns, but it may derive additional clearness from the explanatory comments of Gen. DIX. The proposal that to the House of Representatives should be conceded the power of overturning the action of the Electoral bodies is, very properly, characterized as "the boldest assumption of power ever attempted under our Government." Amid all the Democratic twaddle about the dangers of centralization and the waning significance of State rights, none of the "statesmen" of that party seem to have stopped to consider the peril of what Gen. DIX characterizes as "a virtual transfer of the election of President from the States to one branch of the legislative body—an assumption subversive of the sovereignty of the States, and leading directly to anarchy and violence."

The recent amendment to the State Constitution leaves a good deal of discretion to the Legislature in defining the powers of the new Superintendent of Public Works. It is to be hoped that this discretion will be wisely exercised, and that no jealous restrictions will be placed upon a highly important and responsible set of functions on the ground that in Democratic hands they might be susceptible of abuse. The purpose of the amendment was to substitute a central authority for a divided and highly indefinite one—to place a responsible official in a position where gross abuses of trust had hitherto passed unpunished, but where they should in future be made to carry their appropriate penalty. It must be assumed that the Governor is ready to appoint a Superintendent of Public Works who can be trusted with all the powers contemplated in the constitutional amendment, and it is obvious that the necessary confirmation by a Republican Senate affords a fresh guarantee that the appointing power will not be abused. No mere partisan or wire-puller in the politics of the State will be considered eligible for such a position. It needs and must command a man of decided executive capacity and of large experience in the administration of affairs—not a mere engineer, but one who will have the ability to devise and the capacity to carry out a thorough reformation in all the methods of canal management.

THE COMPROMISE.

Senator EDMUNDS protests that the understanding jointly arrived at by the committees appointed to provide for the count of the Electoral votes cannot be called a compromise. We fear that the word is inappropriate, because it expresses only in part the real nature of the proposed arrangement. That, so far as the Republicans are concerned, is more than a compromise; it is an abandonment of the position they were entitled to hold—a surrender of the method sanctioned by usage, and which protects the right of the States to determine the regularity of their respective votes. It is, moreover, a surrender which, instead of quietly settling the points in dispute, lays the foundation of much bitterness and discontent, and drags into the mire of partisanship the Judges of the Supreme Court at a time when they, of all men, should be protected from the taint. Mr. EDMUNDS' satisfaction is intelligible, for this perversion of the judicial function was in effect suggested by himself at the opening of the session. Of the two great parties whose interests are involved, the Democrats alone have reason to rejoice. They have succeeded in exacting terms which give up ground that might have been held. The world will now believe, and on the authority of select committees, that the Federal Constitution cannot endure the strain of a closely-contested Presidential election, and that to meet an emergency which adherence to the letter of the instrument might readily have overcome, it is considered necessary to construct a rickety piece of machinery, which will neither harmonize with other parts of the system, nor contribute to the faith of the people in the sagacity of their rulers.

The worst feature of the plan is that which constitutes five of the Supreme Court Judges arbiters between the two branches of Congress. A readoption of the twenty-second joint rule would, as a matter of policy, have been preferable. It might have been a more direct concession to the demands of the House, since it would probably have prevented a declaration of the result of the election by the President of the Senate. In that case, however, no pretense of patriotic impartiality could have disguised the fact of surrender, or shielded from popular indignation the legislators responsible for it. Trust in the sufficiency of the Constitution would have remained unimpaired. The highest judicial tribunal in the land would have retained untarnished its title to the confidence on which its dignity and usefulness depend.

As the case stands, the odium of pronouncing a judgment which one-half of the country will object to as partisan will rest upon the Supreme Court. Who among the Judges will make up the five members of the projected commission whose decision is to be binding, matters not. Under no possible circumstances can they reach a conclusion that will be acceptable to both parties. We may assume that they will be required to take into consideration the returns from South Carolina, Louisiana, and Florida. Oregon, also, will probably be included in the category. From each of these States there are, first, the regularly authenticated return, and second, what purports to be a return. Under the Constitution and the law, as they now are, the duty of determining which of these should be received devolves upon the President of the Senate, whose position is as good a guaranty of fidelity as that of any occupant of the Supreme Bench. Under the law as it will be when this scheme goes through Congress, this delicate task will be transferred to one of the Judges, the selection of whom will be intrusted to four other Judges, two being regarded as the nominees of the Democratic Party and two of the Republican. How they are to choose the fifth Judge, who will be the controlling member of the commission, we can only guess. Judges are, at best, but mortals, and, at least, one of the four indicated by the joint committees is reported to be a partisan of no very scrupulous sort. How, then, are four Judges, known to be evenly divided in their political sympathies, to agree in regard to the selection of the fifth? The most likely supposition is that the lottery principle will be used to overcome the difficulty. A bit of paper drawn blindfolded from a hat will mark the Judge whose mod is to determine whether HAYES or TILDEN shall be the President. Will any candid man say that such a mode of counting the votes of three States, and of settling a dispute respecting a vote of another State, will commend itself to the States concerned or to the country at large? A reference of the legal points involved to the Supreme Court in its entirety, inexpedient though it might be, would at least have some claim upon our respect. There could then be no suspicion of trickery or undue influence in singling out particular Judges, and the opinion finally expressed by the court would carry certain weight. But to pick out arbitrarily four of the nine Judges, and to allow the four to pick out a fifth by lot, and to constitute him the maker of the next President, is to bring the Supreme Court into contempt, to destroy faith in the future of the Judges mixed up in the transaction, and to awaken in one or the other of the political parties a feeling that its rights have been violated and its interests betrayed.

It is folly to imagine that there is magic in the phrase, "a judicial decision," when the matter passed upon verges upon partisanship. The decision irritates and disgusts more than it pleases, and the moral authority of the court is for the time weakened. Chief Justice TANEY'S treatment of the Dred Scott case was hailed by the Democrats of that day as a source of immense strength to the slave-power. Its real effect was to impart directness and force to the sentiment against the extension of slave territory, and to bring down upon the Supreme Court the indignation of the greater part of the nation. No man who desires to preserve for the court the essential conditions of usefulness in the sphere marked out by the Constitution, will look with indifference upon the present proposal to bring certain of its Judges into the partisan arena, with the vain expectation of adjusting acceptably to all the points at issue between the Republican and Democratic Parties. The Judges themselves will be suspected, and one of the inevitable results of their action will be to engender in the aggrieved party a feeling vastly more dangerous than any that could arise under the ordinary process of counting the Electoral votes. Trouble there might be even then, but none that would not quickly yield to the patriotic instincts and the common sense of the country. The means of ending controversy devised by the joint cowardice and folly of the associated committees will, in truth, widen its range, and bring in elements of danger and difficulty in comparison with which any that now exist are trifles. The plan would be objectionable if all that could be said against it were that it seeks outside of the Constitution what the Constitution itself provides. Add to this objection the damage done to the Supreme Court and the discontent and distrust that will follow the ultimate decision, and the impolicy of the pending measure will be too apparent to be denied.

IMPENDING WAR IN THE EAST.

After nearly a year of diplomatic manœuvring, the conference on the Eastern question has ended in failure. Turkey by its Council has finally and formally rejected the ultimatum of the allied powers. Precisely what was the last proposition of the conference we are not informed. It is enough to know, however, that it was such a modification of the so-called ultimatum as to be scarcely recognizable. Originally, the great powers demanded a reorganization of the Governments of the provinces. New political divisions were to be formed, and existing territorial boundaries were to be radically changed. Certain reforms in the civil administration were to be introduced, and in order that these reforms should be carried out in good faith, the civil Governors were to be appointed only with the advice and consent of the great powers. Furthermore, it was proposed, that the Governors should not be crippled by any denial of means to enforce their orders, that a small force of gendarmerie should be recruited from European States outside of Turkey and maintained by the Government of the Porte, and subject only to the orders of the provincial Governors. All this seemed radical enough. But the arrangement was to last only five years. At the end of that time there was every reason to suppose that the condition of the country would be pretty much the same as it is now, so far as the status of Christian subjects is concerned.

Gradually these demands have been softened. Without any abrupt and peremptory refusal—such as even the weakest Western Government would have made—Turkey manifested her intense repugnance to considering any proposals which contemplated an abdication of the sovereignty of the Sublime Porte in the disaffected provinces. It was claimed that the promulgation of the new Constitution—which was a late invention—was sufficient to cure all ills. It was pointed out that the reforms asked for were amply guaranteed in this pretentious instrument. Further than this the Sultan declared, he could not go. He might as well abdicate at once. The Government of Turkey, in which term we include all that dominant influence which shapes the policy of the Porte, was evidently convinced that any radical concessions to the great powers would be the signal for an uprising of the long-repressed subjects of the Commander of the Faithful. They had endured many insults. To permit an invasion of the sovereignty of the successor of OTHMAN would be equivalent to his abdication. It were better for the Sultan to die fighting for the ancient independence of the Osmanli than to fall a victim to the just rage of the followers of Islam.

Now that the Sublime Porte has finally rejected the modified demands of the powers, it would be only natural if the high and mighty plenipotentiaries should regret that they have conceded so much. It is as though a man had apologized profusely and humbly, and had been obliged to fight after all. He might better afford to fight on the original naked issue. From the first, it has been clear that Turkey would not permit any appearance of an invasion of sovereignty. When Turkey rejected the demands of the conference, and these were repeatedly softened, it seemed to those who did not look below the surface that Turkey would at last come off with all the prestige of a diplomatic victory; that the great powers would be stultified, and that Europe would be defeated by the stubborn craft of Turkey. It was even urged that Russia was not ready to fight, and that the semi-defiant attitude of Turkey was due to her knowledge of that fact. It was incredible that Russia, who has nothing to gain in such a contest unless it leads to arms, should have engaged in a wordy war which was sure to end as such.

The sequel has showed that Russia understood the Oriental character; that she knew precisely what the final decision would be. At no time has there been any failure on the part of the powers to press the point which, however modified, was sure to be highly obnoxious to Turkey. On the surface of things, Turkey will, however, be responsible for having provoked a war in which she must be without allies. England, so long the guardian and upholder of the power of Turkey in Europe, was the last to declare that the latest propositions of the conference must be final; that if these were rejected Turkey must be abandoned to her fate. Whatever may be the feelings of other nations, now that Turkey has refused the ultimatum, it does not seem probable that there will be any surprise on the part of Russia. As for the unreadiness of Russia to engage in war, there may be two opinions. It is impossible to conceal the fact that Russian funds are low. But the condition of the Russian Army is a jealously guarded secret. No man outside of Russia knows the details of the military movements which now concentrate troops on the Vistula and the Pruth. The Russian hand has been visible in this latest agitation of the Eastern question, from first to last. It is impossible that the sinuous and wily diplomacy of the Muscovite Court should have been, after all, exercised so long for nothing.

THE HOUSE AND THE GALLERIES.

The House of Representatives has been discussing the galleries. For time out of mind the members have been in the habit of talking for the galleries. By way of change they have been talking to the galleries, and with some acerbity of temper. The occasion was a sharp question put to Mr. GARFIELD by a gentleman on the other side of the House. The query was so very sharp that the spectators in the galleries applauded vigorously, and nearly drowned the voice of the genial member from Ohio, who complained of "the clatter" of the people up stairs. This led to a long debate on the propriety of applause in the galleries or on the floor of the House. Mr. HOAR said that the custom was new in Washington. Mr. MILLS, of Texas, said that the galleries had changed their opinions within a few years. Mr. HOAR was wrong, as he subsequently admitted. Mr. MILLS was also wrong, unless he means that the galleries have changed their occupants. Precisely when the custom of applauding the speakers grew up in the galleries, nobody can tell. It is certain, however, that it was common during the war, when men's passions were well aroused, and when there were many exciting occasions in the House. In the Senate, where the decorum is almost funereal, and where the speakers talk against time, applause in the galleries would be like thunder out of a clear sky. Mr. SUMNER, who used to roll his fine eyes upward when he rounded his most ornate periods, sometimes evoked a muffled rumble above, as of four dozen heavy brogans throbbing on a Brussels carpet. And those humorsome Senators, HALE, NYE, and NESMITH often provoked from the grave and reverend seigniors about them an involuntary laugh, which was deferentially echoed in the galleries. But a single blow of the Vice President's ivory gavel restored chilly and respectful silence.

The House has always been more free and easy in its ways. It is, no doubt, galling to a member to be the target for the witticisms of the opposition, and to hear the gallery gods applaud his own discomfiture. But, on the other hand, the applause of a good hit or an eloquent speech is very dear to the heart of him who makes either. Many a man who has gone into the House with a great reputation as a stump orator has utterly failed there, because he missed the spontaneous roar of the people which used to inspire him. OWEN LOVEJOY complained that the attitude of the House was to him as unresponsive as a cabbage-garden. Nevertheless, the floor and the galleries would break out occasionally at some of LOVEJOY'S good things. In those days, too, HENRY WINTER DAVIS often roused the galleries with his sudden, but not unstudied, bursts of eloquence. He did not seem to need the applause. His manner was as cold as star-light. THAD. STEVENS' grim retorts and S. S. COX'S funny speeches "brought down the House" many a time and oft; and once or twice the fiery utterances of such men as VOORHEES, VALLANDIGHAM, and HARRIS, of Maryland, wakened hisses among the people up stairs, which enraged the Democrats and moved them to demand that the galleries be cleared. On one occasion, an aged copperhead, who seemed to have the whole of the north gallery to himself, as the debate was dull, threw himself back in his seat in disgust at the remarks of a famous "Union-shrieker," and bawled, "Oh, Gawd!" There was no occasion to move that the galleries be cleared; before the horror-struck House could collect its wits, two stalwart patriots had hustled the objector into the outer darkness.

If, as the gentleman from Texas says, the galleries have changed their opinions, it is because the people who sit there are not the same as those who used to frequent them. During the period to which we have just alluded, two clouds seemed to have settled in the spaces which occupied about two-thirds of the upper tier. One was blue and one was black. When the soldiers passed through Washington, Congress was the great sight to be seen. When the blacks poured into the city, the gallery of the House was almost the only place where they found free shelter and warmth. The boys in blue never failed to applaud a patriotic utterance—and there were many—if the floor gave the slightest hint of license. And one of these visitors once silently shook his fist at the venerable WICKLIFFE, of Kentucky, when he was making one of his bitter copperhead speeches. In those days the Democrats were continually clamoring for a clearing of the galleries.

As Mr. MILLS has observed, the times have changed. The soldiers have melted away, and the colored people have gradually found more profitable employment than that of listening to speeches which they could not understand. Mr. WATTERSON'S one hundred thousand (unarmed) Democrats have begun to arrive in Washington. Kentucky took possession of the galleries when the present House was organized. The 9,500 who got no places therein have sat and watched their 500 successful comrades with growing aversion. They are waiting for the 14th of February, when they expect to see the way clear to fat offices. So, when Mr. DAVIS, of North Carolina, worries Mr. GARFIELD, of Ohio, they feel like rattling their brogans and crying out "Hit him again!" It is human nature, and neither Mr. GARFIELD nor Mr. HOAR should be surprised. The members have an unseemly fashion of encouraging a speaker of their own party by giving him an occasional round of applause. It is contrary to the rules of the House, contrary to rules of legislative etiquette, and consequently disorderly. It is idle to quote in justification the practice of the British House of Commons. There is a great deal of British usage which is brutal and which we may well avoid imitating. The House must set the galleries an example of decorous behavior. It is useless to expect, however, that any Congressman will forego the privilege of speaking to the galleries.

THE CASE OF THE "SECURITY" LIFE

The report of the examination of the Security Life Insurance Company by the Deputy Superintendent of Insurance has been made public, and the following is a comparison of it with the sworn statement of the officers a year ago:

ASSETS.

	Sworn Statement, Jan. 1, 1876.	Examiners' Report on Jan. 15, 1877.
Real estate unincumbered, cost value	$460,875	$86,241
Mortgages	30,682	99,683
Loans on collateral	950	....
Stocks and bonds	592,197	207,950
Cash	205,703	2,163
Accrued interest and other cash items	140,646
Premium notes and loans	1,636,032	1,441,412
Premiums deferred and uncollected	616,096	138,510
Total assets	$3,683,186	$1,975,959
LIABILITIES.
Reinsurance reserve	$3,063,679	$3,794,211
Unpaid dividends	8,381	....
Unpaid salaries and other items	2,677	1,607
Unpaid death claims and endowments	93,415	258,965
Capital stock	110,000	110,000
Total liabilities	$3,278,152	$4,164,783
Net surplus	405,034
Deficiency		2,188,824

On the face of this showing, the assets are good for 48 cents on the dollar of all liabilities, excluding stock, provided all share alike, as they ought to do. If the matured claims are allowed to take precedence and be paid in full—which would be contrary to custom and equity—there will remain 45 cents on the dollar on the "reserve," which always forms the great bulk of liabilities in life insurance. The cash part of the assets, comprising all items except the last two, is equal to about 10½ cents on the dollar of the reserve, and 13 cents on the dollar of all the cash claims, about one-half the policies being cash ones. The matured claims, if allowed to do so, would absorb two-thirds the cash assets, and those assets are but $396,037, against $4,164,783 of liabilities. The deficiency, even turning out capital stock, is $2,078,824.

Yet this statement is too favorable, having made no allowance for legal expenses and for shrinkage of assets under closing processes, and the mortgage and real estate items, trivial as they now are, may be expected, after what has already been discovered, to prove even less than now given. The premium notes are equal in every respect to cash in settling claims, (each man's notes upon the same man's policy,) and in this case they are perfectly good, both for the Receiver to pay and for the respective policy-holders to receive, as far as they go. There is little left except notes and unpaid premiums, but the failure of the Security and Continental must not be charged to the credit system, for that had nothing to do with it. Policy-holders in those companies who have given notes are now more fortunate than the rest by just the amount of the notes.

Of the Security's insurance—reported a year ago at $20,617,679—a large part of what is not already extinct will be allowed to "lapse;" but, it is to be feared that when the concern is closed up, the policy-holders will get nothing whatever in cash. The wreck is complete, and there is no remainder. The case is the worst known, and yet we shall not be surprised if that of the Continental, when uncovered, proves worse still. It is as useless to mince phrases as it is needless to employ bitter ones; the affair characterizes itself, and we have laid bare this analysis of it in order that it may do so before the eyes of business men. The capital stock is the only item with which no tricks have been played. The plea of shrinkage, stretched to the utmost, does not account for the evasiveness of every item of assets save one; and on the other side of the account, the reserve has either been miscalculated or misstated; the premium notes were evidently misstated, probably by including notes on policies no longer in force; the deferred and uncollected premiums were probably swollen in the like manner, while on the other side of the account a large line of the policies to which these premiums referred were temporarily marked off as not in existence.

We are informed on good authority that the policy-registers were found by the department examiners in such a chaotic condition that there was serious difficulty for a time in ascertaining what policies were and what were not actually in force. There has been deliberate perjury in swearing to deliberately falsified accounts, and we cannot be surprised if people who know nothing of life insurance lose faith in the practical efficacy of official supervision which does not discover such practices until too late either to prevent or to remedy them. There is one thing which may yet be done, partaking in nature both of remedy and prevention, namely, to punish them. Probably it is hopeless to try to fasten any responsibility upon Directors, for they never have much knowledge of what is done, and are always the most astonished persons when failure comes; but there are officers in this case who swore to false reports. Their case is earnestly commended to the attention of the Insurance Department, and particularly of Attorney General FAIRCHILD. If anybody is ever to be punished, why not begin?

SUPERFLUOUS SNAKES.

It may be safely asserted that there is no real need of any addition to our present supply of snakes. Any man who wishes to lay in a full stock of snakes, from the deadly rattlesnake to what may be delicately mentioned as the elastic-ligature snake, can do so at a very trifling expense. We have all the snakes which a free, intelligent, and Christian nation needs, without including the world of ideal snakes in which the consumer of Western whisky is accustomed to revel, and hence any attempt to inflate the volume of North American snakes shows a lack of judgment which deserves to be frankly and firmly rebuked.

It is now fully two years since an enterprising Western meteorologist by the name of TICE undertook to compete with the Signal Service Department in the weather business. Mr. TICE at first attracted a good deal of attention by the boldness and liberality of his promises. When the Weather Bureau would cautiously predict nothing more startling than an area of low barometer in the lake region, followed by clear or cloudy weather somewhere between Maine and California, Mr. TICE would predict a hurricane in New-England, extreme heat, together with frequent ice-gorges, in the Middle States, and an assortment of selected earthquakes in the region of the gulf. Of course, persons who preferred striking and sensational weather to familiar every-day weather, ceased to patronize the old established bureau, and gladly dealt with Mr. TICE. In turn, however, it was discovered that Mr. TICE promised more than he performed, and that his weather seldom justified his enthusiastic descriptions of it. Thus he earned the reputation of a busy, energetic, but not altogether trustworthy, person, and, of course, his business gradually decreased as his deceived patrons deserted him and transferred their custom to the old shop.

In these circumstances, Mr. TICE felt that bold and decisive measures must be adopted, unless he was prepared to retire from business altogether. It was just at this period in his career that the Western part of our Union was visited by those extraordinary showers of butcher's meat, frogs, and back hair, which inspired Western editors with the hope of becoming familiar with the taste of meat, and held out to boarding-house keepers the prospect of a substantial decline in the price of the materials for butter manufacture. It is not certainly known that these meteorological novelties were the work of the enterprising TICE; but it is very certain that the Weather Bureau had nothing to do with them. That TICE, however, should attempt some startling novelty in the line of weather was precisely what might have been expected by those who were familiar with his character and business habits, and there is certainly a strong probability that he was the real originator of the meat and hair showers.

It will be remembered that the hopes created by these remarkable showers were never realized. The meat was found to be little better than mere refuse, and was so obviously uneatable that even the local cats sniffed at it disdainfully. The back hair was also of a coarse and brittle nature, and was unfit either for toilet or butter purposes. Thus, Mr. TICE'S showers, although they drew public attention to him, were as worthless for all practical purposes as were his predictions of hurricanes and earthquakes. They possessed a certain gaudy and meretricious brilliancy, but they were really cheap and useless.

Another shower, possessing precisely these twin features of gaudiness and worthlessness, has just taken place at Memphis, Tenn. It was a shower of small snakes, of from six inches to a foot in length. At first it was the universal opinion of the male inhabitants of the town that the time for signing the total abstinence pledge had arrived, and the doctors' offices were thronged with haggard men, who begged for composing draughts, and swore henceforth to lead temperate and sober lives. The reality of the snakes was, however, thoroughly substantiated by hundreds of the women of Memphis, who rushed wildly through the streets, clutching their tightly-folded skirts, and occasionally dealing fierce blows at their surprised ankles. It was not long before the snakes wriggled out of sight, the frightened men returned to their accustomed beverage, and the excited women sought comfort and consolation in hysterics. A few snakes were thoughtfully captured and preserved in alcohol by fearless members of the Good Templar society, and these still remain to prove the truth of the unprecedented shower of snakes.

Now, if Mr. TICE is responsible for this last and most useless of all abnormal meteorological phenomena, he should be plainly dealt with. If we are to have showers of other materials than rain, snow, and hail, let us have something that is useful as well as novel. When the Israelites were hungry, they were refreshed with showers of good, wholesome manna, which, when nicely cooked and seasoned with a little Chutney or Worcestershire sauce, was extremely palatable. A shower of sausages, or pork chops, or shell-fish, would, perhaps, have been equally interesting to scientific Hebrews, but such showers would have been useless from a culinary point of view, while a shower of snakes would probably have driven the Hebrews back to Egypt—where undesirable showers of all sorts were accustomed to fall exclusively upon the Egyptians. If Mr. TICE wants to advertise his weather business, he should prepare a few inexpensive but useful showers of such materials as dried beef, pickles, or condensed milk. He would thus earn the gratitude of the public, and would completely undermine the popularity of the Washington Weather Bureau. Such a miserable trick as a shower of snakes is, however, utterly inexcusable, and if Mr. TICE ventures to repeat it, he should be prosecuted under the statute which forbids any one to deface natural scenery with business advertisements.

COUNTING THE VOTE.

LETTER FROM EX-GOV. JOHN A. DIX.

HISTORY OF THE CLAUSE RELATING TO THE COUNTING OF THE VOTE—ALL SCHEMES WHICH TAKE AWAT THE DUTY FROM THE PRESIDENT OF THE SENATE ARE REVOLUTIONARY.

The following letter from ex-Gov. John A. Dix, addressed to Hon. John A. Kasson, of Iowa, a few days since, is now for the first time made public:

NEW-YORK, Saturday, Jan. 13, 1877.

Hon. John A. Kasson:

MY DEAR SIR: Since our interchange of views in regard to the formality of counting the Electoral votes I have given some thought to the subject, and without much expectation of saying anything which is new to you, I desire, nevertheless, to state the result of my reflections—especially concerning the action of the Federal Convention in framing the Constitution:

On the 4th of September, 1787, the clause providing for opening the certificates and counting the votes was reported to the convention in this form:

"The President of the Senate shall in that house open the certificates, and the votes shall be then and there counted." (See page 1,486 3d vol., Madison Papers.)

On the 6th of the same month, (see page 1,509) the following passage occurs in the journal:

"On several motions, the words 'in presence of the Senate and House of Representatives' were inserted after the word 'counted,'" &c.

Turning to page 1,513 the clause is reported thus:

"The President of the Senate shall, in the presence of the Senate and House of Representatives, open all the certificates, and the votes shall then be counted."

This is the form in which it stood and still stands in the adopted Constitution. Why the words "in the presence of the Senate and House of Representatives" were inserted before and not after the word "counted," as required by the amendment, does not appear by the journal. If the clause had conformed to the amendment it would have read as follows:

"The President of the Senate shall open all the certificates, and the votes shall then be counted in the presence of the Senate and House of Representatives."

The first action of the framers of the Constitution in regard to this clause shows that it was not contemplated to open the certificates and count the votes in the presence of the House of Representatives, and that their final action was only designed to bring both branches of Congress together as spectators of the formality, according to the interpretation of the clause by Judge Kent, Judge Story, and other eminent public jurists, and not to confer on them any authority in regard to opening the certificates and counting the votes.

This interpretation of the Constitution is sustained by the action of the Government during the first forty years of our existence as a nation.

The Senate of the United States at the first session of Congress elected John Langdon as its President, "for the sole purpose of opening and counting the votes for President of the United States." The votes of the 10 States which took part in the election were counted by him, and it was announced that George Washington was unanimously elected.

Of the 38 delegates to the Federal Convention, 15 were members of the two houses in the first Congress. The names of 14 were subscribed to the Constitution, and six were present as members of the Senate when the certificates were opened and the votes counted by its President. Thus the conformity of the proceeding to the Constitution has not only the sanction of contemporaneous exposition, but a practical and authoritative interpretation of the meaning of that instrument by the framers themselves.

From that time until 1829, at each election of President a declaration was made by the Senate, at the close of the formality of opening the certificates and counting the votes, that "the President of the Senate did, in the presence of the Senate and House of Representatives, open all the certificates and count all the votes of the Electors for a President and Vice President." The only exception was in the election of 1821, in which the declaration does not appear in the journal, although it reappears in 1825.

The action of the Senate in the first Congress is thus sanctioned and confirmed by the practice of the Government during the first 40 years after the adoption of the Constitution. From this period the formality seems to have drifted imperceptibly into the practice on the part of the President of the Senate of opening the certificates and delivering them to tellers appointed by the two houses to examine and ascertain the number of votes, and report the result to him, to be declared in their presence. At subsequent periods Congress has in several instances assumed to decide that the votes of certain States should not be counted; but this interposition of authority had for its object to determine whether the States in question were lawfully in the Union when their votes were cast. It is nevertheless manifest that there has been a gradual encroachment by Congress on the power conferred by the Constitution on the President of the Senate. Although it has never been carried so far as to go behind the certificates for the purpose of calling in question the action of the States, there is enough to show the tendency under our system of government, as under every other of a representative character, on the part of the legislative body to overstep the boundary of its legitimate powers. Any interference with the rule established by the framers of the Constitution, and by the people through the adoption of that instrument, is not only a dangerous usurpation of authority but an unwarrantable invasion of the sovereignty of the States.

There is a praiseworthy solicitude on the part of sober-minded citizens of all parties that there should be a peaceable issue out of the unhappy complication in which we are involved; but we must take care that in our desire to accomplish this object we do not violate fundamental obligations. I can see only one safe way out of the existing perplexity; and that is to leave the President of the Senate to discharge, without interference, the duty enjoined on him. The requirements of the Constitution are to be sacredly observed, no matter how party aspirations or interests may be affected. All legislative devices, schemes, and plans, however unexceptionable their purpose, which derogate from the constitutional power of the President of the Senate, are unwarrantable and perilous to the perpetuity of the Government. It would be as great a wrong and as dangerous an invasion of the Constitution for the two houses of Congress to disregard, or set aside any of its requirements by compromise as it would be for either by separate action to set them at defiance. I have been amazed to observe that it has been proposed to reject every Electoral vote which is not approved by the House of Representatives. I have been still more amazed to observe that this proposal is supported (if he is correctly reported) by a Senator from this State. No Senator or Representative can be an Elector, and yet it is proposed to give to the House of Representatives the power of overruling the action of the Electoral bodies. It is the boldest assumption of power ever attempted under our Government. It would be a virtual transfer of the election of President from the States to one branch of the legislative body—an assumption subversive of the sovereignty of the States and leading directly to anarchy and violence. If by the fundamental compact too large a power has been conferred by its framers on the President of the Senate, let the error be corrected by a constitutional amendment; and in the meantime, let us submit like good citizens to the final judgment of the Federal Convention in regard to one of the most delicate questions it had to decide.

I have had no apprehension at any time that the existing complication would lead to deeds of violence. Public opinion, which overrules more effectually the popular movement of the country than any party devices, will not endure any other than a peaceable solution. Nothing can more clearly manifest the determination of the people that the public order shall be maintained than the recent abortive attempt to get up mass-meetings, the only effect of which would have been to inflame the passions in a crisis which every man having the good of the country at heart desires to see met in a spirit of conciliation and forbearance and in strict obedience to the requirements of the fundamental compact. I am, dear Sir, very truly yours, JOHN A. DIX.

DEMOCRATIC WAR-WHOOPS.

A MASS CONVENTION OF THE PARTY IN WISCONSIN—EXCITED SPEAKERS DECLARE FOR TILDEN OR WAR—THE CONVENTION SOLEMNLY INSISTS THAT TILDEN SHALL BE MADE PRESIDENT.

Special Dispatch to the New-York Times.

MILWAUKEE, Jan. 18.—Thirty counties, with 544 delegates, were represented in the Democratic Mass Convention to-day. No Republicans took seats in the hall. Gen. Edward Bragg, Congressman-elect from the Fifth District, was made temporary Chairman. On taking the chair he made a moderate speech, mainly on the question of counting the Electoral vote. He held that the question is not whether it is Hayes or Tilden, but who has a majority of the Electoral votes. It is conceded that Tilden has a popular majority, but that is not enough. He could not entertain the opinion that the Vice President had power to count the votes. That officer had always been regarded as a mere figure-head, and he now claims dictatorial powers. The people will hold the House of Representatives responsible for any violation of the Constitution. He approved of Gov. Grover's action looking at it from a legal point of view.

Mayor Butler, of Milwaukee, was made permanent Chairman, and spoke at length. He believed the Republican leaders had formed a conspiracy to count in Hayes. He did not think an appeal to arms would be necessary on behalf of the people, as the Republicans would not dare to carry it out in the face of the protests of the people; but if it became necessary, it was the duty of the people to arm.

A copy of the resolutions adopted by the caucus of the Democratic members of the Legislature was then read and adopted as a part of the proceedings of the convention. They recite that the election was closely contested as between Tilden and Hayes; that it is admitted Tilden has 184 Electoral votes that there is a dispute as to the vote of Florida, Oregon, and Louisiana, and that it is admitted by Gen. Barlow that Tilden Electors were chosen in Florida. It is therefore resolved that it is the duty of the people to see that the rights of the States should be observed, which can only be done by taking the power to count out of the hands of the President of the Senate, and that the House of Representatives must be sustained at all hazards.

J. P. C. Cottrell followed in a warm speech, favoring war if the Republicans insist on a high-handed course. He would not have the Democrats take advantage of Cronin's vote, but would insist with a closed fist on the Louisiana vote being thrown out.

Judge Harlow Orton, in introducing the resolutions, got very warm. He said nobody doubted Tilden's election, but he has been swindled out of the vote in Louisiana, and perhaps in Florida. The Radical Senate, President Grant and Cabinet, are in a conspiracy to inaugurate Hayes, believing that the Army and Navy and the Diplomatic Corps will recognize him; that all the States with Republican Legislatures and Governors will support the conspiracy, and that the business men of the country will submit rather than have their property destroyed and business ruined; that the people will submit because it is only for four years. But this is delusion. The people will arise in arms and the business men will see their bonds turn to ashes and the country filled with blood before they will submit to have Hayes counted in. He said there were still hopes for the lawful results through Republican fear. The resolutions are as follows:

The people of the State of Wisconsin, represented in this convention, do hereby resolve as follows:

First—That believing as we do, that Gov. Tilden, at the last Presidential election, received not only a very large popular majority, but also a clear and unquestionable majority of the Electoral votes for President of the United States, and is, therefore, justly and lawfully entitled to that office, we most solemnly insist and declare that he shall be, as in right he ought to be, peacefully inaugurated therein and invested with all the Constitutional powers of the Executive Department of the Government from and after the 4th of March.

Second—That the early assumption by the Republican leaders that the President of the Senate has the right to count the Electoral vote, contrary to the Constitution and the established usage on the foundation of the Government, is evidence of a conspiracy to secure by fraud a victory while conscious of defeat.

Third—That as the certificates of the Electoral votes must be opened by the President of the Senate in the presence of the Senate and House of Representatives, and then be counted, the duty and authority of counting the votes and deciding all questions arising thereon, including the qualifications of Electors and the manner of their appointment by necessary implication, devolve exclusively upon the Senate and House of Representatives, and this construction of the powers and duties of the two houses of Congress is sustained by an unbroken usage from the organization of the Government, and an abandonment of it at this time, or any attempted evasion of this high constitutional duty of Congress, will justly excite the condemnation and indignation of the candid and fair-minded men of all parties.

Fourth—That the proposed compromise between the committees of the two houses, whereby it shall require the concurrence of both houses to reject, instead of such concurrence to count a vote, is a cunning device to bind the people and subvert their rights.

Fifth—That it is provided by the Constitution that if no person has received a majority of the whole number of Electors appointed, the House of Representatives, voting by States, shall immediately choose a President, and the Senate a Vice President, and as the Constitution does not provide any mode of determining whether such a contingency has arisen, and as it is a principle of law that those who are required to perform a contingent duty must be the sole judges as to when a contingency arises, it properly devolves on each house of Congress to decide for itself when any contingency has arisen that requires its separate action under the Constitution, in the election of a President by the House of Representatives, and a Vice President by the Senate.

Sixth—That the constitutional action of the two houses of Congress, either concurrently or separately, in discharge of their duties, must be sustained, and all opposition to such action by force of arms would be treason and revolution.

Seventh—That a copy of the proceedings of this convention be sent by us to President Grant and Senators and Representatives in Congress, and that a copy of the same be sent to the President of the Senate and Speaker of the House of Representatives, with the request that the same be presented to their respective houses.

George B. Smith, who was present at the count in Louisiana, addressed the audience. He saw convincing proof that Grant would use his powers to subvert the Government. If the Democrats remained firm, the conspiracy of the Republicans would not be consummated. Then speaking of Louisiana he said: Grant issued two orders, pledging troops before there was a suspicion of trouble, having himself open to impeachment for treason. History does not tell of despotism so severe as Louisiana sustained under Kellogg. The people there are brave enough to overthrow the carpet-baggers, but the North has been taught that because they were rebels once they are rebels still, and they dare not. By patient waiting they have given us this boon of the election of Tilden, and, by the living God, you should stand by them. The Government of that State is the worst in the world. Kellogg has the power of appointing nearly all the officers, and they are rogues and thieves. If a Judge decided against Kellogg's will he was turned out. There has been no Legislature in the State for 10 years except those put in by Grant's bayonets. Every bill passed by the Legislature brings a share of money to the Governor, which has made Warmoth worth three millions, and Kellogg more. The intelligent people of the State are all Democrats, and the carpet-baggers and niggers are Republicans. He reviewed at length the action of the Returning Board, and said there could be no doubt of its corruption, and that the State was for Tilden fairly.

A DULL MEETING IN LOUISVILLE DESIGNED FOR INDIGNATION—BLUSTER AND BRAVADO FALLING ON UNSYMPATHETIC EARS.

Special Dispatch to the New-York Times.

LOUISVILLE, Jan. 18.—A large number of ex-Confederate Colonels and other officials and supporters of the "Lost Cause," met here today to be indignant over the fact that in spite of Kentucky's solid vote for Tilden, the United States had gone fairly for Hayes and Wheeler. There was a slight sprinkling of the more respectable and respected wing of the Democracy, but the mass of the convention was made up of the swaggering, blustering class. By means of the system of wholesale manufacture of delegates practiced in Ohio, allowing any and all who would pay their own expenses to be delegates, a fair sized convention, numbering perhaps 600, was got together.

In accordance with the precedent in the Ohio convention, the affair was given a respectable showing by putting to the front, as far as possible, well-known Union men, Hon. Cassius M. Clay being made President, and others of considerable note put on the list of speakers. The resolutions and speeches, although intended to be moderate in sentiment, were mostly composed of the usual bluster and bravado, but failed in their chief object of awakening any special enthusiasm on the crowd present. Speeches were made by Gen. Preston, Hon. Boyd Winchester, Gen. J. B. Houston, Gov. McCreary, and others, and the resolutions, which were not presented till evening, were finally adopted, without any special degree of enthusiasm or indications of indignation. The sentiment of the convention may be summed up in the statement that if the House of Representatives decides that Tilden and Hendricks are elected, the "sons of Kentucky" pledge their faith, their honor, their arms, and their lives to inaugurate them.

It is said that Watterson's suggestion of an army of 100,000 to be present at the counting of the votes is being acted upon, and thousands of Democrats in the rural districts are preparing to go to Washington on the appointed day.

THE DEMOCRATIC NATIONAL EXECUTIVE COMMITTEE.

WASHINGTON, Jan. 18.—The Democratic Executive Committee held a meeting to-night at the residence of its Chairman, Hon. A. S. Hewitt, and authorized the Chairman and Secretary to call a meeting of the Democratic National Committee at an early day, if they should deem it proper so to do, with reference to a resolution adopted by the Democratic Convention at Columbus, Ohio, on the 8th of January, requesting the National Democratic Committee to call a National Democratic Convention, to meet at Washington City on the 12th of February, 1877.

PRIVILEGES OF CONGRESS.

THE WESTERN UNION DIRECTORS DECIDE TO PRODUCE ALL THE DISPATCHES DEMANDED.

Special Dispatch to the New-York Times.

WASHINGTON, Jan. 18.—Ex-Gov. E. D. Morgan, Hon. William B. Orton, Richard Schell, and the other Managing Directors of the Western Union Telegraph Company, at a meeting held in this city to-day, decided to deliver up to the House and Senate committees the telegrams upon political matters which have been demanded by them. The Directors have resisted the demands of the committees, believing that in doing so they were simply protecting the rights and privileges or their customers, but they now find themselves in a position where further resistance would be useless. Most of the telegrams asked for by the committee are now in Washington. The others will be produced as soon as possible.

SECRETARY CHANDLER AGAIN BEFORE THE SPECIAL HOUSE COMMITTEE—QUESTIONS PROPOUNDED BY TWEED'S ATTORNEY.

WASHINGTON, Jan. 18.—The Special Committee on the Powers, Privileges, and Duties of the House in Counting the Electoral Vote met this morning and had before them Secretary Chandler, who was accompanied by his stenographer. Mr. Field asked him if he was now prepared to answer the question heretofore propounded, namely:

By whose authority he sent a telegram to Gov. Stearns promising troops.

Secretary Chandler said he was not prepared to answer.

He was further asked if any copy of the telegrams to Gov. Stearns was in existence—the telegram sent on the 8th or 9th of November, and answered, not that he was aware of. He kept no copy of it, and could not tell who wrote it. He thought, however, he sent it to Gov. Stearns. He stated he declined to answer because of the confidential character of the communications between the President and himself and other members of the Cabinet, and he was summoned to appear before the committee as the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. Barnard inquired whether he at the time was Secretary of the Interior, and Mr. Chandler answered he was.

Mr. Lawrence—Do you base your objection to answering solely on the ground of the confidential character of the communications between the President and yourself?

Mr. Chandler—I do; on that ground exclusively.

The Secretary went on to say that he had no more right to disclose what passed between himself and the President than a United States Senator has to disclose what is done in an executive session of the Senate.

Mr. Tucker asked Mr. Chandler whether the telegram to Gov. Stearns was sent as a member of the Cabinet?

Mr. Lawrence objected to the question, when the committee went into private consultation.

When the doors were reopened, Mr. Chandler was asked whether he sent the telegram to Gov. Stearns of his own volition or as Chairman of the National Republican Committee? A.—I do not suppose I signed my name as Chairman of the committee; I presume I did not.

Q.—Did you send the telegram at the request or suggestion of anybody else than yourself? A.—My impression is that I received a telegram from Gov. Stearns suggesting the necessity of sending troops.

The witness then referred to a telegram published in the New-York Tribune, dated Nov. 9, addressed to the Chairman of the National Republican Committee, charging Kuklux efforts to prevent a count. Gov. Stearns telegraphed from Tallahassee that there was no doubt of a Republican majority in Florida if an honest canvass of the vote could be secured; that the indications were that violence would be resorted to in the interior of the State, and that the Kuklux had prevented returns from being received, &c. The impression of the witness was that the telegram first suggested to him the necessity for troops. He did not know who furnished this telegram to the Tribune, and did not know whether the Governor or Legislature called for troops.

Q.—Did you send your telegram to Gov. Stearns on your volition, without the suggestion, instruction, or direction of anybody else? A.—Probably the suggestion came from the direction already mentioned.

Q.—And nobody else? A.—I decline to answer on the ground of official confidence between members of the Cabinet and the President.

Mr. Field—Were you informed of a telegram sent to Oregon mentioning money by or on behalf of the Democratic Party? A.—I only know of that from the newspapers and from conversation.

Q.—Did not Mr. Orton communicate to you a telegram to Oregon on that subject? A.—Not that I remember.

The witness was then discharged for the present, and the committee went into secret session.

THE LOUISIANA RETURNING BOARD IN CUSTODY.

WASHINGTON, Jan. 18.—Gen. Andersen and ex-Gov. Wells, of the Louisiana Returning Board, arrived at the Imperial Hotel this morning at 2 o'clock, and at daylight were arrested by the Sergeant at Arms of the House of Representatives. An officer of the House left last night for New-Orleans to bring Kenner and Casinave, the remaining members of the Board, to the bar of the House. Messrs. Anderson and Wells have been in the custody in the cash-room of the Sergeant at Arms all morning. It is understood they will be presented at the bar of the House at the expiration of the morning hour.

THE WEATHER IN CALIFORNIA.

SAN FRANCISCO, Jan. 18.—The weather throughout the State is unsettled. A south-west to south-east wind prevails. The rain-fall so far has been slight, but there are indications of more. It rained lightly at intervals in this city all day. There is a heavy snow in the mountains.

TURKEY DEFIANT.

THE PROPOSALS OF THE POWERS REJECTED.

AN ANIMATED DEBATE IN THE GRAND COUNCIL OF TURKEY ENDS WITH A UNANIMOUS REJECTION OF THE EUROPEAN PROPOSALS—THE POWERLESS CONDITION OF THE COUNTRY EXPOSED BY MIDHAT PASHA—"DEATH BEFORE DISHONOR," THE SENTIMENT OF THE COUNCIL.

LONDON, Jan. 18.—A dispatch from Constantinople to Reuter's Telegraph Company announces that the Grand Council to-day, after an animated debate, unanimously rejected the last proposals of the European powers as contrary to the dignity, integrity, and independence of the Empire. Several speeches were made, but perfect agreement prevailed.

Another dispatch from Constantinople to Reuter's Telegram Company says 60 Christians participated in the grand council. After the proposals of the European powers had been unanimously rejected Midhat Pasha asked whether the Porte might not nevertheless enter upon negotiations with the powers respecting the rejected points. The council answered no, and declared that the Turkish counter-proposals were the only subject upon which the discussions of the conference could be further carried on.

The French man-of-war Château Renaud will arrive on Friday, to take on board Count Chaudordy, the plenipotentiary of France.

A third dispatch to the Reuter Telegram Company from Constantinople, gives the following account of the proceedings of the Turkish Council: The Grand Council of the Empire met to-day. The first three hours of the sitting were occupied by the reading of a statement of the events which have occurred since the outbreak of the insurrection in Herzegovinia. Midhat Pasha then made a long speech, in the course of which he gave an account of the Turkish counter-proposals and the concessions which the Porte, in a spirit of conciliation, had made upon points where the Constitution would not thereby be infringed. He dwelt on the gravity of the situation. He spoke of the departure of the plenipotentiaries, the possibility of war, the horrors attending it, the injury it would do to the internal affairs of the country, the impossibility of procuring funds for a war, and the fact that Turkey could not rely upon any alliance. Several speeches followed, the most noteworthy being made by the Greek and Armenian Patriarchs. All the speakers repelled the idea of accepting the European proposals. Midhat Pasha again pointed out the gravity of the crisis and the distress which would result from a war. The Council, after hearing all the speakers, unanimously rejected the proposals amid shouts of "Death before dishonor."

The following dispatch from Berlin is on the street, but it originates from a source not usually trustworthy: "Prince Gortschakoff has issued a circular to the Russian representatives abroad expressing his belief that Turkey will reject the conference proposals and declaring that Russia cannot undertake a warlike policy, because Europe would not support her, and might form a coalition against her."

LONDON, Jan. 19.—The Vienna correspondent of the Standard telegraphs that advices have been received from Bucharest, that the Roumanian Government has resolved to declare that it will remain neutral in the event of a war between Russia and Turkey.

Special dispatches from Constantinople to the Daily News and Times state that Midhat Pasha, while holding up to view the evils of war, inveighed in strong terms against the interference of the European powers as unjustifiable and offensive to Turkish independence. In his recapitulation of the events leading to the present troubles, he dwelt upon the success of the Turkish arms everywhere against the rebels, and recalled to mind the Russian ultimatum sent at the moment when Turkey was on the point of crushing Servia as she had already crushed the Bulgarians. The correspondent of the News adds that Midhat Pasha, while alluding to the difficulties concerning funds, alliances, &c., which would hamper Turkey in the event of war, pointed out that the many millions of cartridges which the Turks would require must come from America at the risk of capture by hostile privateers, and he concluded by declaring that the situation was unfavorable for war. The Council replied with loud shouts of "War rather than foreign interference." The only dissenting voice was that of the Armenian Protestant Bishop, who suggested that the decision should be left to the discretion of the Government. He was shouted down, the Council being all of the opinion that the Government was not entitled to decide such a momentous question. The same correspondent remarks that it is rumored that Midhat was the principal obstacle to the acceptance of the proposals; the whole business was rehearsed beforehand to intimidate the Sultan, who really wished to yield.

A Berlin telegram to the Times says Russia is endeavoring to secure the neutrality of Austria in the event of war. It remains to be seen, however, whether these new negotiations are more than an attempt to impress Turkey with a sense of imminent danger.

The Times telegram from Belgrade says the Turkish prisoners there, numbering 100, have been exchanged, and will march for Nish immediately.

The Daily Telegraph's Pera correspondent reports that the Christians present at the Council were even more opposed to concession than the Turks. The dangers of the situation were fairly laid before the Council by the Sultan's brother-in-law, Ahmaud Damad, as well as by Midhat Pasha. Safvet Pasha dwelt upon the peril of braving Europe, and remarked that the Russian Squadron, now in the waters of the United States, might stop the transmission of arms and ammunition which had been ordered in that country for Turkey.

Two hundred and thirty-seven dignitaries and officials were present at the Council. A protocol of the proceedings was drawn up, to which all who took part in the Council affixed their signatures.

FOREIGN BUSINESS AFFAIRS.

PAPER MONEY TO BE ISSUED IN TURKEY—A STRIKE OF THE LANCASHIRE COTTON OPERATIVES EXPECTED—BUSINESS DEPRESSION IN RUSSIA.

CONSTANTINOPLE, Jan. 18—It is understood that 1,000,000 or 2,000,000 Turkish pounds, paper money, will be issued.

LONDON, Jan. 18—4 P. M.—Silver is quoted to-day at 58d. per ounce.

At a meeting of the Masters' and Operatives' Committees of the Lancashire Cotton Trade yesterday, the masters unconditionally rejected all the operatives' conditions because they would result in a general advance of wages. A meeting of operatives will be held. A rupture is expected.

The Times in its financial article says: "Private advices from Russia continue to afford strong evidence of the injury already done the mercantile community by the apprehensions of war. One firm of cotton spinners employing 10,000 hands, has lost so heavily since Russia assumed a warlike attitude that the establishment would have been compelled to close had not the firm obtained assistance, it is said, from the Government, which was unwilling to suffer such a catastrophe to involve so large a number of employes."

LONDON, Jan. 19.—The Times' correspondent at Paris, reports that the Austrian Government has concluded a loan of 70,000,000 florins, gold, with various, London, Vienna, and Paris banks. This loan is the balance of the 110,000,000 florins which the Reichsrath authorized the Minister of Finance to raise.

THE GLOUCESTER FISHING FLEET.

FOUR MORE VESSELS REPORTED LOST WITH ALL HANDS.

Special Dispatch to the New-York Times.

GLOUCESTER, Mass., Jan. 18.—In addition to the list of vessels reported lost on the fishing banks, which was telegraphed to THE TIMES a week ago, it is feared that four more are to be added. No tidings have been received of the whereabouts of these or the others, and no hopes are now entertained of their safety. The four which are now given up are the schooners Modena B. Jerrold, Howard Steele, Robert Emmet, and Wyoming. The Modena B. Jerrold left port Nov. 25, for La Have Bank, with a crew of 11 men, as follows: Charles P. Mitchell, Captain, who leaves a wife and two children; L. D. Martin, cook, who leaves a wife; Edward Haines, wife; Daniel Gardner, John C. Haines, Michael Keefe, wife; Freeman Snow, wife; William Snow, Edward Herney, wife, and three children; B. D. Joyce, Emanuel Rose, all of this city. The Modena B. Jerrold was owned by D. C. & H. Babson, was built in Essex in 1867, was 70 34-100 tons, and was valued at $5,300 with her outfit, on which there was an insurance of $3,900 in the Gloucester Mutual Marine Company. The wife of Capt. Mitchell has become insane because of the loss of her husband, and was taken to the insane asylum on Jan. 15.

The schooner Howard Steele sailed from this port on Nov. 25, 1876, with a crew of 11 men, as follows: Edward Murphy, Captain, who leaves a wife in Gloucester; Barnard S. Conlon, cook, of Rockport; Edward Walsh, Daniel Curtis, Thomas Ready, Peter Collins, James McQuillan, Parrick Costello, married; George Malloy, Peter Stapleton, and William Silvey, who leaves a wife and three children. The Howard Steele was owned by George Steele, and was built in Essex in 1872, and was 60 87-100 tons and valued at the Gloucester Mutual Fishing Insurance office at $5,150 on, which there is an insurance ot $4,625 in said office, and $600 on the outfit. There has been nothing heard from her since the day before the gales of Dec. 10 and 11, and in all probability she was lost then.

The Robert Emmet, owned by Charles Parkhurst, sailed from there Nov. 25, and from Eastport, Me., after getting her bait, on Dec. 8, two days before the gale, since which time nothing has been heard from her, and it is not probable that she will ever return, although her owner has not given up all hopes as yet. The Robert Emmet was built in Gloucester in 1868, and was of 45.25 tons, and was valued at $3,500, including outfit. Her crew consisted of nine men, as follows: Joseph Gray, Captain, who leaves a wife and two children in Gloucester; John E. Saunders, wife and seven children, three of them under age; he was a native of Gloucester; Alexander Boyd, cook; Edward Dodge, Samuel Spinney, Argyle, C. V. G. & S. Colby, of Gloucester, wife and three children; Samuel Tyng, William Michael, Thomas Yanco.

The Wyoming sailed from Gloucester on a fishing cruise to La Have Bank on Nov. 15, 1876, with a crew of 10 men, including the Captain, since which time nothing has been heard from her, and there is not much doubt that she is lost, although her owners have not given up all hopes of her yet. Her Captain was Henry Nass; the names of her crew could not be ascertained. The Wyoming was owned by McKenzie, Hardy & Co., was built at Essex, and was of 55.25 tons, and was valued at the Gloucester Mutual Marine Insurance Company at $5,500, in which they had an insurance of $4,332, and $400 on her outfit.

THE TRUTH ABOUT THE DUEL.

MR. MAY'S SECOND DECLARES THAT MAY WAS NOT TOUCHED NOR HIS CLOTHING GRAZED—ONE SHOT EXCHANGED AND BENNETT SATISFIED.

To the Editor of the New-York Times:

Certain reports have been widely and industriously circulated for the past 10 days, in the newspapers, which I have every reason to believe have in a great measure been caused by parties in this City, who, knowing the truth, yet desired to conceal it for the purpose of creating the impression that the late meeting between Messrs. May and Bennett was stopped on account of bloodshed. It has been daily published that the former was wounded; at one time it was stated slightly, at another severely, again mortally, and it has been said that he had died of his wound.

I now take this method to silence these falsehoods, and to inform the friends of Mr. May, on the authority of a letter from his second, that neither he, nor any part of his clothing, was hit, scratched, grazed, or in any way touched by the one and only shot which, at the distance of 12 paces, was exchanged by the parties; and that the affair then terminated by the party seeking satisfaction declaring himself satisfied.

If there is any person who has been concerned directly or indirectly in circulating the falsehoods to which I have alluded, or if there is any one else disposed to question or contradict the facts as stated by me, and is not afraid to assume responsibility in so doing, under his true signature, he will be promptly met by my real name, and not by the fictitious one of VERITAS.

FRED. MAY IN WASHINGTON.

WASHINGTON, Jan. 18.—Mr. Fred May is in this city. He arrived here last Tuesday, and is unhurt. Mr. May does not seem to be taking any pains to avoid his friends, several of whom have seen and conversed with him.

END OF THE PHELPS CONTEMPT CASE.

Dr. Charles Phelps, accompanied by his counsel, Mr. John A. Foley, was present at the opening of Part I. of the Court of General Sessions yesterday. After taking his seat, Judge Gildersleeve, addressing Dr. Phelps, said:

"Doctor, I shall now dispose of your case. There can be no doubt about the right of a witness, when summoned before the Grand Jury, to decline to answer questions that, in his judgment, will criminate him. The law will not compel a man to condemn himself. In some cases, however, the manifest of immunity is thrown over a witness by the statute, and in such cases the witness may be compelled to answer the questions. The case before me does not appear to be one of those. I do not think the 71st section of the Code of Criminal Procedure applies to any offense except those created by the first two sections, and since the inquiries by the Grand Jury seem to be directed toward the offense under the first two sections, I think the witness is clearly entitled to decline to answer the question, when he places his declination, as I now understand he does, upon the ground of self-criminality. I therefore order that you be discharged from custody."

After hearing the Judge's decision, Dr. Phelps bowed politely and left the court-room with his counsel. The Grand Jury have abandoned their inquiry into the alleged duel, having failed to obtain any information on the subject.

THE WESTERN RIVERS.

REPORTS OF THE STATE OF THE RIVERS FROM THE SIGNAL OFFICE—THE ICE AT CAIRO.

WASHINGTON, Jan. 18.—The Chief Signal Officer reports that during the last 24 hours the Missouri and Upper Mississippi Rivers have remained unchanged, no movement of ice having occurred. The Mississippi has fallen slightly at St. Louis, and risen five feet one inch at Cairo, 10 inches at Memphis, and seven inches at Vicksburg, and remains stationary at New-Orleans. The Red River has risen 10 inches at Shreveport; the Cumberland has risen two feet and one inch at Nashville, the Ohio fallen seven feet and six inches at Pittsburg, and has risen three feet and ten inches at Cincinnati, and three feet and four inches at Louisville, being two feet and seven inches above the danger level at the former place and one foot and six inches above it at the latter, and is still rising at both places. The tributaries of the Upper Ohio are falling. The Potomac continues rising slowly, at Harper's Ferry, and the ice is moving out slowly there and at this point. The Chief Signal Officer has stationed observers at various points along the river, with instructions to report hourly by telegraph any change that may occur in its condition.

CAIRO, Jan. 18.—There was very heavy ice in the Ohio River, extending from shore to shore, and swept along by the current at a rate of over six miles an hour this morning. A ferry-boat, several flat-boats, apparently unconnected, and many skiffs passed here this forenoon. No damage has been reported here.

BALLOTING FOR SENATORS.

MR. HOAR GAINING STRENGTH.

HIS ELECTION TO-DAY CONFIDENTLY PREDICTED—TWO BALLOTS TAKEN YESTERDAY ON WHICH MR. HOAR GAINED.

Special Dispatch to the New-York Times.

BOSTON, Jan. 18.—Two ballots only were taken in the convention to-day for United States Senator, but these resulted in such a decided lead for Hoar that his friends and workers are to-night very jubilant, and are predicting his election to-morrow, expecting to get on the first ballot 115 votes. But the opposition have not given up the fight. The Boutwell men admit his defeat, though they do not mean to desert him until after one more trial. They will have another caucus to-morrow at 11, and the leaders will then exert their utmost influence to hold his forces together. Meanwhile they are considering with more care than heretofore the merits of the compromise candidates who have been mentioned. Some of them talk Rice, but not so strongly as they did, and others appear to believe that if Seelye or Devens is taken, a combination with the Democrats may be effected, and so Hear defeated. The Democrats, in their caucus, also discussed these three compromise candidates, dropping for the moment Bullock. The caucus was secret, but it is known that one member had the temerity to propose that the Democratic strength be thrown for Hoar, and that was calmly discussed. Others advocated with a good deal of spirit, taking up Devens, and on a proposition to join on Rice a vote was taken, showing only seven in favor. It was finally decided to hold together through two more ballots and vote solid for Abbott, and not to break without orders. Rice's only strong workers now appear to be the Boston members. Their very argument that he would represent Boston and the mercantile and commercial interests, influences the country members against him. Some are urging the Suffolk County men, who have been voting for Hoar, to drop him and go for Rice on condition that the Boutwell men will also. The ballots of to-day were as follows:

	First Ballot.	Second Ballot.
Necessary for a choice	138	138
George F. Hoar	100	104
Boutwell	88	84
Abbott	62	62
Rice	17	17
Seelye	3	4
Bullock	4	4

During to-day a good many dispatches have been received from Washington urging Boutwell's election, and declaring his defeat a rebuke of the party leaders. The most extraordinary is the following to Gen. Butler:

"Lamar and his friends are greatly rejoiced over the prospect of Boutwell's defeat, he being the lion in the path of the rebels who have trampled out the free ballot in Mississippi, and blazon their crimes to the world by sending Chalmers, the hero of the Fort Pillow massacre, to the House. Has Massachusetts forgotten her records of the past?"

This is signed "H. H. Painter, a Western newspaper correspondent." Secretary Morrill has also sent dispatches indorsing Boutwell. On the other hand some of the strongest Republicans at the capital have sent congratulatory dispatches to the Hoar managers.

Dispatch to the Associated Press.

BOSTON, Jan. 18.—The latest phase of the Senatorial contest to-night is the determination of the Boutwell men to vote for Rice to-morrow, as a compromise candidate, which, it is thought, will narrow the fight to Hoar and Rice, with the chances in favor of the latter.

THE DEAD-LOCK IN ILLINOIS.

SIX MORE BALLOTS TAKEN—LOGAN ONLY THREE VOTES SHORT—PALMER ADMITS THAT HE CANNOT BE ELECTED.

Special Dispatch to the New-York Times.

SPRINGFIELD, Jan. 18.—Six ballots were taken to-day, with no changes of any importance. The Republicans voted solidly for Logan, the Democrats for Palmer, the Senate independents for Anderson, and the House independents for Davis. Logan was three votes short, and the situation is unchanged since yesterday. There is a dead-lock, which will continue to-morrow and perhaps on Saturday. The Republicans have decided to adhere to Logan and the Democrats to Palmer. The Senate and House independents met together this evening to hear from Samuel Cary, who arrived from Cincinnati and has been closeted with them. He is understood to insist that they must vote for a green-back man and for no one else. It would not be surprising if Davis were dropped and Anderson voted for by all the independents. Palmer virtually admits that he cannot be elected, but boasts that he has killed Logan. Logan is a very lively corpse to-night, and his chances have rather increased than diminished. Still, there is nothing certain as to the final result.

One hundred and two votes will now elect a Senator, Mr. Barthow, of Kankakee, a Republican, having been called home by the news that his wife was dying, and his colleague, Mr. Buzy, a Democrat, having paired off with him.

	Seventh Ballot.	Eighth ballot.	Ninth ballot.
Logan	99	99	99
Palmer	88	86	86
Anderson	7	7	7
Davis	6	8	7
Hanes	1	1	2
Parish	1	1	1

The tenth and eleventh ballots were the same as the ninth.

THE CHOICE OF NEBRASKA.

EX-GOV. ALVIN SAUNDERS ELECTED—HE RECEIVES THE FULL REPUBLICAN AND INDEPENDENT VOTE.

OMAHA, Jan. 18.—Alvin Saunders was to-day elected United States Senator on the third joint ballot, receiving 83 votes—the full Republican and Independent vote. Gov. Saunders was the last Territorial Governor of Nebraska.

THE CONTEST IN TENNESSEE.

SEVENTY-ONE BALLOTS THUS FAR TAKEN AND NO CHOICE.

NASHVILLE, Jan. 18.—After four ballots, without result, for United States Senator to succeed the late Andrew Johnson, the Legislature adjourned until to-morrow. D. M. Key has been nominated; also W. C. Whitthorne. The last ballot, the 71st, stood: Key, 45; Bailey, 34; Whitthorne, 9; Bate, 8; necessary to a choice, 50. The Republicans voted for Key.

DEFALCATION OF A BANK PRESIDENT.

BALTIMORE, Jan. 18.—A special from Annapolis to an evening paper of this city says: "For the past few days there have been rumors circulated affecting Hon. George Wells, one of our most highly-respected citizens, and to-day the allegation is made that Mr. Wells, who has been President of the Farmers' and Planters' Bank of this city for 30 years, is a defaulter to the bank in the sum of $65,000. Mr. Wells very unexpectedly resigned his position on Monday last. At a meeting of the stockholders, held subsequently, it was disclosed that he is a defaulter in the sum named. His resignation was accepted, and Hon. Alexander Randall was elected President in his stead."

A NEW RAILROAD COMPANY.

PHILADELPHIA, Jan. 18.—At a meeting to-day of the persons on whose account the Wilmington and Reading Railroad was recently purchased, a new corporation to operate the road was organized. The name of the road was changed to the Wilmington and Northern Railroad. Robert Fraser was elected President of the new company.

FAILURE OF A CHICAGO FIRM.

CHICAGO, Jan. 18.—Shoenfield Bros., dry goods merchants of North Clark street, have filed a voluntary petition in bankruptcy. Their liabilities are stated at $107,000, and their assets at $58,000, together with a policy of insurance for $53,000. The firm have done a large business ever since the fire, in which they lost their entire property.

FUNERAL OF ASSEMBLYMAN DURLAND.

MIDDLETOWN, Jan. 18.—The funeral of Assemblyman Stewart D. Durland, who died here last evening, will take place at 11 A. M. on Sunday next from his late residence in the town of Minisink. A dispatch from his associates from this county, Hon. James G. Graham, announces that a Legislative committee will attend the funeral.

A RECEPTION BY THE OLD GUARD.

THE ACADEMY OF MUSIC FILLED TO OVERFLOWING—A DISTINGUISHED COMPANY PRESENT—VARIOUS MILITARY ORGANIZATIONS IN ATTENDANCE—ORDER OF DANCING—OCCUPANTS OF THE BOXES.

The reception of the Old Guard at the Academy of Music last evening was a grand success, far surpassing the expectations of the corps, and fully testing the ample preparations that had been made. Not only was the spacious dancing floor of the Academy filled to overflowing, but the parquet, boxes, gallery, lobbies, and ante-rooms were thronged with guests. Among the visiting organizations represented were the Washington Artillery, from Charleston; the Palmetto Guards and Carolina Club, of the same city; the Republican Blues, of Savannah; the United Train Artillery, of Providence, R. I.; the Boston Lancers and Independent Cadets, and several other military corps from neighboring States and cities. In addition to these, there were present the military staffs of the Governors of Massachusetts, New-York, New-Jersey, and Connecticut, the officers of the United States man-of-war Swatara, 12 in number, and almost all the officers on duty at the different forts and posts in the vicinity of the Metropolis. The Grand Duke Alexis and the officers of the Russian fleet in Hampton Roads, who had been expected to be present but were detained in Norfolk, telegraphed their regrets. The guests began to arrive before 9 o'clock, and from that time until nearly midnight, a continuous stream of carriages filed past the Academy entrance, each depositing its quota of guests in the most rapid manner possible. Within the building all was gayety and animation. A thousand different hues of silks, satins, military uniforms, gold lace, and costly fabrics of all descriptions glittered upon the broad expanse of the floor, while the different tiers of boxes exhibited a repetition of the same brilliant spectacle. Around the outer edge of the floor were ranged vases of rich flowers—camellias, lilacs, moss roses, and rare exotics imbedded in fragrant beds of pinks, hyacinths, and lilies of the valley. The proscenium boxes were elegantly draped with the national colors arranged in tasteful folds, and surmounted with banners bearing the coats of arms of the Old Guard and the City of New-York. Over the right proscenium box was suspended the beautiful Palmetto flag presented to the Guard by the ladies of Charleston. Among the distinguished guests present were Major Gen. Slocum, Major Gen. Heath, Capt. W. A. Courtney, of Charleston; Collector Worthington, of the same city; George Tyler Bigelow, of Boston; Major Gaver, of Charleston; Capt. David Fallon, of Boston; Capt. Robert Fairgant, of Savannah; the Brazilian Minister, the Turkish Minister, the members of the American Rifle Team, the Consul General of Holland, the Consul General of Greece, Col. Wilder, of Boston; Gen. W. G. Ward, C. H. Loutrel, George W. Quintard, Major Gilchrist, of Charleston; Gen. Alexander Shaler, Major Gen. James W. Husted, George W. Wingate, Gen. J. H. Hobart Ward, Col. Wilcox and staff of the Ninth Regiment, Gen. Vilmer and staff, Ambrose Kingsland, H. J. Montague, Lester Wallack, Major George W. McLean, Capt. Alexander Henriquez, Charles G. Child, and many others. Music was furnished by Grafulla's Promenade Band and Downing's orchestra. The order of dancing was as follows:

THE GREAT FORGERY.

LATEST DEVELOPMENTS IN THE CASE

ALL THE FACTS NOT YET MADE PUBLIC—

A STRANGE STORY ABOUT HORACE E. BROWN—IS HE THE INSTRUMENT OF AN ORGANIZED BAND OF FORGERS?—THE PRISONER ARRAIGNED AT THE TOMBS POLICE COURT, AND THE EXAMINATION SET DOWN FOR TO-DAY.

The interest in the great forgery that first came to the knowledge of the public on Wednesday had not subsided yesterday, and the impression prevailed that the work of the Police would not properly end with the arrest of Horace E. Brown, who was apprehended, as announced yesterday in THE TIMES, on Wednesday evening. A good deal of astonishment continued to be expressed that the forgery was not sooner discovered. There was yesterday no disposition on the part of the officers of the Union Trust Company to communicate on the subject, it being said that all the information to be given to the public had already been published. During the morning Mr. King, the President, held a consultation with a number of the stockholders of the company, but it was understood that the consultation was held for the purpose of considering a plan for clearing up the whole matter of the forgery. Mr. S. L. Blood, in a conversation with a reporter of THE TIMES, said yesterday that he had been misrepresented by many of the statements made concerning the forgery. He said he had known Mr. Maxwell for several years, and had purchased the office No. 16 New street from him, allowing him to retain desk room as a notary for a consideration. He knew that Brown had done business about "the street" for several years, but he had only known him about three weeks. He had been in the office, but Mr. Blood said he would not previously have recognized him. Mr. Maxwell introduced him on Tuesday afternoon, Jan. 2, when Brown produced the $64,000 check, and Maxwell said, "This is from a good up-town customer." "He wanted me to purchase a quantity of gold for him," said Mr. Blood, "and seeing that the check was properly certified and appeared to be perfectly regular, I placed it with other papers in the safe, where it remained over night. On the 3d of January I purchased $50,000, and in the latter part of the week $9,000 more, the larger installment of which was delivered to Maxwell and by him to Brown." Mr. Blood said that when he first heard that the check was a forgery he lost no time in informing Mr. W. T. Hatch, and requested that payment of the $9,500 check be stopped, which was a part of the proceeds of the $64,000 check.

The most interesting statement yet made in connection with this clever piece of rascality was obtained yesterday afternoon by a reporter of THE TIMES from Mr. A. W. Greenleaf, of the firm of Greenleaf, Norris & Co., corner of Exchange place and New street. Mr. Greenleaf said that he first met Brown a year ago, when he was brought to him for introduction, and was represented to be a responsible business man. He had not known Brown before, but understood that he had been in business on "the street." He came to Mr. Greenleaf to propose that he should enter into an agreement to purchase some bonds that he knew were to be offered for sale at a great advantage to a ready purchaser. Brown, he said, represented that these desirable bonds—Governments, railroad securities, and other investments—were in the hands of a Deputy Sheriff, and were ordered to be sold by a court, pending the trial of forgers in whose possession they had been found. They were not forged bonds, it was explained, but were to be disposed of according to order. The forgers were said to be in prison. Mr. Greenleaf said that Brown mentioned several of the bonds to be sold, and among them were two which he very much desired to have, but he hesitated to accept the proposition in consequence of the connection of the forgers with the business. Mr. Brown made his statement in a straightforward manner, and Mr. Greenleaf at the time had no suspicion that he had not heard the truth. He did not buy the bonds. Mr. Brown afterward told him that the sale was advertised in the obscure corner of a paper, and that the sale was to take place in Chatham street. The next time he saw Brown that person came to him to say that the sale had taken place; that it had not been held in Chatham street, as announced by newspaper advertisement, because no one had been present, but that the bonds were sold in front of the Court-house, and that the Union Trust Company had bought them. He said he was sure the Trust Company had bought the bonds, because he had but just come from the office on Broadway, and had seen the very bonds in Mr. King's hands. He also said that there were more of the bonds, and that another sale was to be held, and read a list of those he had reported were sold, giving their prices, and a list of the bonds to be offered at the sale which he said was to take place. Mr. Greenleaf then thought the circumstances very curious, but as nothing more had been said to him about buying, he had forgotten about it until he had been reminded forcibly of Brown's proposition by the announcement of the forgery. He had since heard that Brown had made similar propositions to other brokers, telling them that there were excellent bargains to be obtained in the sales advertised.

At the office of the Union Trust Company one of the officers said he had just heard the remarkable story told of the reported sale of bonds, and pronounced the report that the company had purchased the bonds alluded to as entirely untrue. Horace E. Brown, the man under arrest in the case, is spoken of as a man who did business in Wall street, but who seldom had any other office except one "in his hat." He is described as a person of very plausible manners, who always appeared to be full of business, but further information concerning him was not obtainable. An old detective in "the street" said significantly that the story had not been half told yet. "It's not a fresh hand that stepped this business, nor was it the work of a hitherto square man. If it was we should believe the offender had fled. A 'cross' man, or an old hand at forgery, would stand still and take events quietly."

Mr. Wheeler H. Peckham, counsel of the Union Trust Company, held a protracted interview yesterday morning with Superintendent Walling and Detective Sampson, but Superintendent Walling declined to furnish any information concerning the subject of their consultation.

PROCEEDINGS IN THE TOMBS POLICE COURT.

Yesterday afternoon the prisoner Horace E. Brown was arraigned before Justice Duffy, at the Tombs Police Court. A number of witnesses in the case were also present in the court-room, among them Messrs. Morris Franklin and William H. Beers, President and Actuary respectively of the New-York Life Insurance Company; Mr. Edward King, President of the Union Trust Company; A. W. Dimock, of No. 7 Exchange court, and Detectives Sampson, Silleck, Doyle, and Elder. Mr. Wheeler H. Peckham appeared as counsel for the Union Trust Company, Assistant District Attorney Russell for the people, and Mr. William Wirt Hewitt for the prisoner. Brown was brought to court from the Police Headquarters, where he was locked up immediately after his arrest on Wednesday evening. He is a short, sturdy-looking man, with brown hair, streaked with gray, and a brown mustache and imperial. He was perfectly calm during his stay in the court-room. The proceedings before Justice Duffy were very brief. Mr. Franklin was first called upon, and made the following affidavit:

Morris Franklin, of No. 346 Broadway, being duly affirmed, deposes and says that he is the President of the New-York Life Insurance Company; that on the second day of January, 1877, at the City and County of New-York, deponent is informed and believes, the annexed check was presented to the Union Trust Company, and was by the officers of said company certified; that said check is false, forged, and counterfeit, and deponent's signature thereto is false, forged, and counterfeit, and a very good imitation of deponent's real signature, that deponent believes one Horace E. Brown is one of the persons concerned in making and uttering the forged check for the following reasons, viz: That, as deponent is informed, and believes, the said Horace E. Brown negotiated with one George W. Maxwell, to become the financial agent of the New-York Life Insurance Company, and purchase gold for, and on account of, the said New-York Life Insurance Company; that the said Brown had no authority to conduct said negotiations, and was in no way in the employ of said company; that said Brown said he made said negotiations under the direction of a man named Roberts, who was, or said he was, in the employ of said company; that said Brown also attempted negotiations with other brokers for the same purpose; that the said Maxwell having consented to undertake said business, the annexed check was brought to him, the said Maxwell, in the usual course of business certification by some person to deponent unknown; that before bringing said check the said person took to said Maxwell the letters hereto attached, dated Jan. 2, and purporting to be signed by William H. Beers; that said Maxwell received said check and bought gold with it, which he delivered to some unknown person; that said check was paid in the usual course of business by the Union Trust Company, and came to deponent's knowledge on the 16th inst., when said deponent, upon seeing it, declared the same to be a forgery; that there is no such person as Roberts in the employ of the New-York Life Insurance Company, nor was any person authorized to conduct such negotiation; such negotiation was only a cover for the convenient utterance of such forgery. MORRIS FRANKLIN.

Annexed to the affidavit of Mr. Franklin were the following letters, purporting to have been written by Mr. Beers, the Actuary of the New-York Life Insurance Company, and which were delivered by Mr. George L. Maxwell to Mr. King of the Union Trust Company, when the forgery was discovered on Tuesday last:

NEW-YORK LIFE INSURANCE COMPANY, Nos. 346 AND 348 BROADWAY, NEW-YORK, Jan. 2, 1877.

G. L. Maxwell, Esq.:

Being desirous to change our brokers we beg to inquire the rate you will charge on the purchase or sale of gold, Government and other securities. Respectfully, WILLIAM H. BEERS.

Please quote gold—say $50,000 or $60,000.

NEW-YORK LIFE INSURANCE COMPANY, Nos. 346 AND 348 BROADWAY, NEW-YORK, Jan. 3, 1877.

G. L. Maxwell, Esq.:

Please deliver to bearer, Mr. Oakley, the $60,000 gold purchased for account of this company. Respectfully, WILLIAM H. BEERS.

Mr. Anthony W. Dimock, a broker doing business at No. 7 Exchange court, made the following affidavit with regard to his knowledge of the operations of Brown, the prisoner, previous to the discovery of the forgery:

Anthony W. Dimock being duly sworn, says that on or about the 2d day of January, 1877, Horace E. Brown came to deponent, at deponent's office, No. 7 Exchange court, and stated that he could control the purchase of a large quantity of gold for an institution which was about to invest one or two millions in that way, and asked deponent what his commissions would be to make the purchases; I replied, one-sixteenth of 1 per cent., and that I would be pleased to make the purchase; he said the company was one of the largest institutions in the City, and that deponent would receive a letter from its President stating that they wished to change their broker, and asking my terms; he added, on my response that I would receive an order, accompanied by a check, for the purchase of a large amount of gold; he said I would be expected to purchase the gold and hold it subject to the order of the President; subsequently he said deponent must not go to the office of the company; the deponent then declined to undertake the business; he then told deponent there was a great deal more than the commission in the business that deponent could keep $45,000 out of every $100,000 purchased; then deponent replied, that for every amount of gold received and reshipped from deponent's office a corresponding amount must go out; deponent, suspecting the integrity of the transaction, at first arranged to undertake the business, so as to expose it, but, upon subsequent reflection and consultation with friends, determined to have nothing to do with it. A. W. DIMOCK.

F. G. DUFFY, Police Justice.

Mr. Edward King, President of the Union Trust Company, then swore as follows:

Edward King, being duly sworn, says he is President of the Union Trust Company of New-York; that the check hereto attached was certified on the 2d of January, and paid by the Union Trust Company on the 3d of January, inst., having come to deponent's said company through the Mechanics' Banking Company; that when the said check was returned to said Mechanics' Banking Company it was sent back as a forgery. EDWARD KING.

P. G. DUFFY, Police Justice.

The forged check was attached to Mr. King's affidavit. It is in form as follows:

No. 1,289. NEW-YORK, Jan. 2, 1877.

Union Trust Company of New-York:

Pay to the order of George L. Maxwell sixty-four thousand two hundred and twenty-five dollars.

WM. H. BEERS, MORRIS F. ANKLIN, Actuary. President.

The check bears the following indorsements:

"Pay S. L. Blood, or order. Geo. L. Maxwell. For deposit to credit of S. L. Blood, p. p. L. C. WIGHTMAN, Attorney."

Across its face, running diagonally between parallel lines, from the bottom toward the right-hand corner, is the certification of the Cashier of the Union Trust Company:

"Good. W. W. S."

The forged signatures of Messrs. Franklin and Beers, when compared with the real signatures, would, apparently, deceive the most expert judges of handwriting. The only thing that attracts the attention of a person comparing the bogus with a genuine check of the New-York Life Insurance Company is the faintness of the water-mark in the former. On a genuine check this mark stands out boldly; on the bogus one it is almost hidden by the imprint. The forger must evidently have had an intimate knowledge of the business of the life insurance company, for he was careful to give such a number to the bogus check as would prevent it from being immediately noted as at variance from the whole number of checks issued by the company. The number given the forged check is 1,229; the last check issued by the company up to yesterday was numbered 1,292.

After Brown's counsel were made Justice Duffy asked Brown if he was ready for examination. The prisoner's counsel, Mr. Hewitt, replied that he was not, and asked an adjournment for two days. Justice Duffy said he was unable, under the law, to remand the prisoner for more than a day. After some consultation between the Justice and counsel, Brown was remanded to Police Head-quarters, and his examination was set down for to-day at 3 o'clock P. M.

THE CHILDREN'S FOLD.

REV. EDWARD COWLEY, THE MANAGER, DENIES THE ALLEGED ILL-TREATMENT OF CHILDREN.

Rev. Edward Cowley, Manager of the Children's Fold, No. 157 East Sixtieth street, and President of the Board of Trustees of that institution, made a statement to a TIMES reporter yesterday in reference to the charges preferred against him before the State Board of Charities by Mr. Melville Brown. The statements which had been published in a morning paper in regard to the matter, he said, were wholly unauthorized, and for the most part incorrect. So far as he and his associates in the Board of Trustees were concerned, they were published entirely without their consent, and, as they had reason to believe, contrary to the wishes of the New-York Committee of the State Board. Mr. Cowley said he had received, yesterday, a communication from the State Board of Charities, through its Secretary, stating that any communication that he desired to make to the State Board might be made through Mr. Theodore Roosevelt, Chairman of the New-York Committee. For the satisfaction of the public, he would say that after serving it in this City for 14 years, he firmly believed that the rebuttal testimony, which he should take the earliest opportunity to offer, would entirely vindicate him from all charges in connection with the management of the Fold, and that the testimony would also be perfectly satisfactory to the citizens of New-York. It had never been his intention to remain in the personal management of the children in the Fold, and he had done so for a much longer time than he had ever calculated upon. Owing to the continuance of the effects of the late panic, the Trustees had been prevented from completing their plans. If, after examining all of the evidence that he had to present to the State Board, they should render an adverse decision upon the manner in which he had administered his trust, he would certainly sever his connection with the Fold. Mr. Cowley further said that everything was going on quietly and smoothly at the present time in the institution; the house was full, having 53 inmates—all it could at any time accommodate—and many of the children had been there more than 10 years. All of these children would be submitted to examination and cross-examination as to their statement in the Fold before the committee of the State Board. Since the publication of the charges, Mr. Cowley said that many of the friends of the children had called at the Fold and satisfied themselves by a personal examination that there was no cause for alarm, and no children had been removed in consequence.

Mr. James Pott, one of the Trustees of the Children's Fold, informed a TIMES reporter that Mr. Cowley would not continue as manager of that institution after Feb. 1, but further than that he could say nothing in reference to the matter.

THE FORSYTH STREET TRAGEDY.

Nicholas Krick, an old German, who on Saturday night last was shot at and rendered insensible by blows from an axe at the hands of his son, George Krick, aged 20, was in such a precarious condition yesterday that Coroner Woltman was requested to take the wounded man's ante-mortem statement at Bellevue Hospital. The following is the substance of Krick's statement:

"I have on several occasions for some years back had quarrels with my wife, owing to her allowing women of bad character to come to the house; on the 6th of November, my son George threatened to shoot me and kicked me in the abdomen; the trouble was then about his mother, my wife; on Saturday, Jan. 13, at 6 o'clock P. M., there was a woman in the house who had been there for several days; she was lying on the lounge; I had a dispute with her, telling her to go somewhere else, and not to come to the house and disturb the peace of the family; my wife interfered, and said to me that if I did not like it I could move on Monday; I pushed her, and she staggered against the door; just then my son George came in; no words passed between us, but he shot at me four times, and I fell senseless to the floor; I had been drinking that day, and do not know what happened after, until I found myself in the hospital; I have been married 32 years, and have been in the country 15 years; I did not live happily with my wife in Germany."

Krick's description of the manner in which he received his wounds is incorrect, inasmuch as none of the shots fired by the son took effect. The wounds on his head were undoubtedly inflicted with the axe now in the hands of the Police of the Tenth Precinct.

FROM WEALTH TO POVERTY AND CRIME.

In the Court of Special Sessions yesterday Martin James, a respectable-looking young man, who said he resided last at No. 535 Third avenue, was sentenced to six months in the Penitentiary for the theft of a box of linen handkerchiefs from the store of Harding, Glendinning & Co. He had entered the store and asked permission of one of the firm to write a note, and his request was granted. Leaving the note on the desk, he then asked for a drink of water, and was told to go to the floor below. He had on an ulster, and as he left the store one of the clerks had his suspicions aroused, and telling an officer to follow him, it was found that he had concealed the handkerchiefs under his coat. On being arraigned James at once pleaded guilty, and acquitted a young man named Loring, who had accompanied him, of any participation in the crime. Six years ago James is said to have been worth $60,000.

A TALE OF TWO CITIES.

MYSTERIOUS DISAPPEARANCE OF A BROOKLYN DRUGGIST.

TRACES OF THE MISSING MAN FOUND BY THE POLICE NEAR THE EAST RIVER—SPOTS OF BLOOD, A LOCKET, CHAIN, AND LETTERS DISCOVERED—LAST SEEN BY HIS WIFE AND FRIENDS ON WEDNESDAY—THEORIES OF THE POLICE CONCERNING THE CASE.

Shortly before 8 o'clock yesterday morning, while Patrolman McClelland, of the Twenty-third Precinct, was passing the corner of Avenue B and Eightieth street, his attention was attracted by a shining object lying on the top of a snow-bank, under a tree at the place indicated. He proceeded to investigate the matter, and found that the object which had attracted his attention was a small gold locket, prettily enameled, to which was attached a small portion of a gold chain. Lying beside the locket was a gold vest-chain, formed of heavy square links, corresponding exactly with the small piece attached to the locket. Pursuing his investigations, the officer found scattered on the snow about the spot where the locket was found a number of letters and papers, and a large pocket-book, very much worn and dilapidated. About the place where the papers were found, traces of blood were discovered, and these, being followed, led over the steep bank to the river. On the edge of the river was found a high hat, nearly new. The fur was considerably ruffled, but the hat was not dented or injured. Among the papers were found the fragment of a weiss-beer bottle. There could be plainly discerned on the snow marks of a hand covered with blood which had been pressed on it. The bank of the river at this spot is very steep, and at the water's edge is a boat-house, erected on a float. Marks of bloody fingers were found on the wall of this boat-house, as though some person had, in falling, grasped the wall to save himself. Patrolman McClelland took the hat, jewelry, and papers to the station-house, where they were examined by Capt. Robbins. The name on the papers indicated that they belonged to Albert D. Jossnett, a German or French drug clerk, who resided with his wife at No. 860 Pacific street, Brooklyn. There was in the first place a letter signed by Theobold Frohmein, Secretary of the Board of Pharmacy, informing Jossnett that he had failed to pass a favorable examination as a pharmacist. The next document examined was a diploma dated Sept. 6, 1876, authorizing Jansett to practice pharmacy, signed by Dr. W. de F. Day, President, and Theobold Frohwein, Secretary of the Board of Pharmacy, and also a receipt for the examination fee. A number of cards bearing the address of Edward Landridge, No. 82 Park avenue, Brooklyn; Rev. A. Lechner, Cathedral, Savannah, Ga.; Henry Allen, drugs, No. 260 Pearl street, (on the back of which was "No. 1,616 Third avenue, ring fourth bell,") and Dr. Gooke, De Kalb avenue, Brooklyn, were found among the papers. There were also two photographs, one of a youth apparently 17 years of age, taken at Magdeburg, Germany, and the other that of a young man in zouave costume taken at Toulouse, France, by E. J. La Salle, No. 24 Rue de l'Etoile, and several physician's prescriptions. There were also documents signed by P. H. Kreizchman, of No. 182 Fulton street, Brooklyn; A. C. Diethetbuss, and Schmidt, Thirty-ninth street and Third avenue, recommending Jossett as a competent drug clerk. Among the papers was a letter written in French, dated at St. Pierre, in 1869, addressed to his "dear mother and brothers."

Superintendent Walling, on being informed of the discovery, ordered Capt. Robbins to make a searching investigation, and also notified Superintendent Campbell, of the Brooklyn force. From the inquiries made by the Brooklyn Police, it was learned that Jossett and his wife had lived for some time past at No. 860 Pacific street, Brooklyn. They appeared to have lived happily. Jossett was industrious and frugal, and temperate in his habits. On last Saturday night, it is said, Jossett came home drunk, and this occasioned surprise among the neighbors, as it was the first time he had been seen in that condition. He continued his debauch during Sunday, Monday, and Tuesday, being more or less intoxicated all the time. During this "spree" he continually talked about a contemplated duel with a man who, he said, had followed him from France to this country to kill him. He also said that he had fought a duel with this man six years ago, and had wounded him badly. On Wednesday he went and told his wife that he had determined to sail for France, his native country, and that he would leave enough money with her to support herself until he sent for her. He also told her to give up her present residence and to move all her furniture and effects to her brother's house, No. 115 Clinton street, in this City. He then left his home and came over to this City, where he sought out his brother-in-law, August Homan, a fresco painter, and went with him to the German Savings Bank, corner of Fourteenth street and Fourth avenue, where he drew out $72 which he had on deposit there. He inclosed $50 in a letter to his wife, which he intrusted to Homan to deliver to her. The pair then visited several lager beer saloons and parted at about 6 o'clock in the evening, Jossett saying that he would not be home until late. It is known that about 9 o'clock on Wednesday night, Jossett called at a drug store at the corner of Adelphi street and Fulton avenue, Brooklyn, and bid the clerk, who was an acquaintance, farewell, saying that he was about to sail for France. At 10 o'clock he called at No. 860 Pacific street, in the absence of his wife, who had gone to her brother's house in this City, and after destroying a number of papers left the place, bidding the landlady good-bye. As far as can be at present ascertained that is the last seen of Jossett.

In order to solve the mystery surrounding the disappearance of Jossett, Superintendent Walling last evening sent Detective Rielly, who is engaged in working up the case, in search of Homan, the fresco painter, who was supposed to be cognizant of the facts tending to throw some light on the affair. Homan was found at his residence in Clinton street, and was brought to Police Head-quarters. He stated that Jossett was a native of France and had served with distinction in the French Army during the Franco-Prussian war. At the close of the conflict Jossett left France for New-York, embarking at Southampton on a steamer bound for this port. During the voyage he became involved in a quarrel with a fellow passenger who was a German, and a duel was fought between them with pistols which resulted in the German being severely wounded. At least such was the version of the affair related by Jossett. Some time after his arrival in this country Jossett married his (Homan's) sister, and since that time they lived in Brooklyn. On Wednesday last, Jossett came to Homan and told him that the man with whom he had fought the duel on shipboard, had followed him to this country and had sworn to take his life. He would either have to fight a duel with this man or leave the country. He requested Homan to accompany him to the German Savings Bank, where Jossett drew out $72. He placed $50 in an envelope with a letter addressed to his wife, and gave it to him (Homan) to deliver. Jossett left him at a drug store in Delancey street and got on board of a railroad car going down town. He had not, he said, seen his brother-in-law since. When he reached his home he found Mrs. Jossett there, and gave her the letter from her husband. He saw her open it and read it. In the letter Jossett bade his wife farewell, and said that as he was going to fight a duel with his former adversary, she would not probably see him again. Detective Rielly having been informed that Mrs. Jossett had been married previous to her meeting Jossett, and that her former husband was still alive, questioned Haman in relation thereto. Homan, however, declined answering the questions, saying that he preferred that his sister should make whatever statement was necessary to be made in relation to her domestic affairs.

Mrs. Jossett says she has no idea what has become of her husband, whom she last saw on Wednesday. He left his home on that day to come to this City, and told her to go to her brother's house, in Clinton street, and meet him there. He also told her that if he was not late that night she should remain at her brother's house. At about 10 o'clock on Wednesday night, Homan, her brother, came in, and told her that he had just left her husband, and that he had given him a letter for her. Her brother handed the letter to her, and in his presence she opened and read it. Inclosed in the letter were five $10 bills. The letter, which was written in French, informed her that her husband was about to engage in a duel with a man with whom he had had a contest of a similar nature in Southampton six years ago, and that one of the combatants must die. If he came off the victor she would hear from him in a few days, but if he was killed she would learn the result of the combat from the papers. He desired her to give up their apartments in Brooklyn, and move all her furniture and effects to her brother's house in Clinton street, and remain there until she heard from him. In the letter Jossnett wrote that he inclosed $40 of the money drawn from the bank, retaining the rest for his own use, while in reality he dealt more liberally with her by sending $50. Mrs. Jossnett said that she had always lived happily with her husband, and that she was absolutely ignorant of any motive that would have prompted her husband to commit suicide. She believed that he had been waylaid and robbed.

It was learned last night that Jossnet had been employed in Kretzchman's drug store, at No. 189 Fulton street, and abandoned his employment there on Tuesday last. His former employer stated last night he had been informed that Jossnet had become involved in some trouble with a young woman whom it is alleged he had seduced, and who was at present an inmate of a lunatic asylum. He is of the impression that Jossnett committed suicide or had run away, and had left his hat and papers at the spot where they were found for the purpose of creating the impression that he had destroyed himself, or had been robbed and murdered. The spot selected by Jossnett is well adapted for that purpose. A more lonely place could not be found in the City. It is on the site of the old Bellevue Garden, and a continuation of Avenue B is being cut through the grounds of the abandoned pleasure resort. There is not a human habitation within several blocks. The ground at Avenue B shelves abruptly toward the river, and a steep declivity runs to the water's edge. The ground is covered with frozen snow, and a close examination of the hardened crust revealed the footprints of one man only. These footprints were traced from First avenue to the tree near which the papers and locket described above were found. Immediately around the tree there is no snow, and not the slightest trace of a struggle was observed. East of the tree the footprints could be again observed going toward the river, but they ceased at the summit of the bluff. Small drops of blood could be seen on the snow all the way from First avenue and down to the edge of the bluff. These blood stains had the appearance of having dropped from a bleeding finger. The Police officers and others who examined the ground believe that the man whose footprints are visible on the snow walked rapidly down Eightieth street from First avenue, stopped at the tree to deposit the basket and papers found there, and then slid down the bank to the water's edge, the blood stains on the bluff having the smeared appearance that would be produced by a bloody hand scraping along the ground.

Superintendent Walling said, late last night, that from all the facts in the case, and all the information he had been able to obtain, he was satisfied that Jossett had been murdered. He was under the impression that Jossnett was still alive, or if dead had committed suicide. All the indications point to the former theory, and the motive which prompted the man to keep out of the way and take such particular pains to create the impression that he had been robbed and murdered, though not yet apparent, will doubtless be revealed at some future time. The Superintendent has taken a great interest in the case, and remained at Police Head-quarters until a late hour last night receiving reports from the detectives engaged in endeavoring to elucidate the mystery surrounding the disappearance of Jossnett.

Mrs. Jossnett is at present domiciled at her brother's house in Clinton street, and will remain there until she hears definitely from her missing husband. She is about 24 years of age. Jossnettte is 27 years of age. The couple had been married but one year. Before going into the drug business he had been employed as a salesman by a liquor-dealer in Jersey City. It was learned last night that Jassnett had shaved off his mustache on Wednesday before leaving his home and gone round among his acquaintances bidding them good-bye, and telling them that he was going to France. Detective Rielly returned late last night from a protracted visit to Brooklyn, and says that from what he learned there he has no hesitation in pronouncing the whole thing a huge hoax. He is under the impression that Jossnett is alive and got up the sensational display at the river's edge to cover up his flight.

ACCIDENTAL POISONING.

DEATH OF DR. GEORGE THOMPSON FROM SWALLOWING A POISONOUS DRUG IN MISTAKE—MR. FRANCIS HART DIES FROM AN OVERDOSE OF LAUDANUM.

Coroner Richard Flanagan was privately requested on Wednesday to investigate the supposed accidental poisoning of two well-known gentlemen, one of the victims being Dr. George Thompson, of No. 41 East Tenth street, Surgeon of the Ninth Regiment, who died on Monday from the effects of a dose of acid nitrate of mercury, and the other, Mr. Francis A. Hart, for a number of years identified with the management of the New-York Hotel, who died on Wednesday morning from the effects of an overdose of laudanum. "In deference to the wishes of the families of the deceased," as Dr. D. B. Miller, Coroner Flanagan's Deputy, expressed it to a TIMES reporter yesterday, the facts in both cases were withheld from the public. The Coroner conducted the investigation as secretly as the law and circumstances would permit, and having hurriedly concluded it observed the unusual precaution of retaining the inquest papers in his possession, instead of surrendering them to the custody of the Clerk of the Board of Coroners. Notwithstanding these strenuous efforts for concealment, the following particulars concerning the sad death of Dr. Thompson and Mr. Hart were gleaned yesterday by a reporter of THE TIMES, through trustworthy sources, and they were reluctantly corroborated last evening by Dr. Miller.

On Wednesday, the 10th inst., Dr. Thompson, while suffering from a nervous attack, took from his medicine cabinet a bottle which he supposed contained diluted hydra chloric acid, but which in reality contained acid nitrate of mercury, a powerful drug. Ignorant of the true contents of the bottle, the unfortunate gentleman swallowed a portion of the liquid, and was immediately seized with the most agonizing pains. Several of his friends of the medical profession was called to his bedside, and every effort was made to alleviate his sufferings, and counteract the influence of the poison but to little purpose. He lingered, however, until Monday, when, surrounded by his grief stricken friends, he succumbed to the deleterious effects of the drug. The immediate cause of death was uræmia. There is no evidence whatever to warrant the supposition that Dr. Thompson meditated self destruction. He was in prosperous circumstances, and his domestic relations were eminently happy. His funeral took place yesterday from his late residence, No. 41 East Tenth street. It was attended by the officers and members of the Ninth Regiment, in citizens' attire, Mabel Lodge No. 69, F. and A. M., and a representation of the Medical Society of the County of New-York, of which Dr. Thompson was a prominent member.

The circumstances surrounding the death of Mr. Francis A. Hart, at his residence, No. 140 West Twenty-first street, on Wednesday morning, are nearly similar to those connected with the death of Dr. Thompson. As in the case of the latter, there are apparently no facts to support the theory of suicide. For some time immediately preceding his death Mr. Hart was subjected to attacks of nervousness. In taking laudanum on Monday as a sedative, he inadvertently swallowed an overdose of the drug, and was immediately prostrated. The family physician was summoned, and antidotes were prescribed. On Tuesday morning he was found in a comatose condition, in which he died soon after. The funeral services were held yesterday at the Church of the Holy Communion, Sixth avenue and Twentieth street. The body was afterward taken to Naugatuck, Conn., for interment.

A MAN BLOWN TO ATOMS.

A man was blown to atoms at Sing Sing yesterday by an explosion of nitro-glycerine. Two or three weeks ago Andrew Ludwig, a well-digger who was well known in the village, had a can of nitro-glycerine. He buried it in the rear of his garden, thinking it might become of use. At noon yesterday he concluded to dig it up, and procuring a pick he commenced the work. Suddenly the pick struck the can, and a fearful explosion occurred. Ludwig was torn into a thousand pieces; the houses in the neighborhood and washing that was on clothes-lines were spattered with pieces of his flesh and with his blood. Houses were shaken to their foundations, and windows in the vicinity were shattered, and a hole was torn into the ground five feet deep and 10 feet in diameter. After the explosion people procured pails and commenced collecting the pieces of flesh that were lying about, some of which were buried a quarter of a mile and looked as though they had passed through a sausage-mill. Hundreds of people flocked to the scene. So heavy was the concussion that the greatest alarm was manifested. The unfortunate man leaves a wife and two children.

MASONIC ELECTION.

The Grand Lodge of Free and Accepted Masons closed its annual convention at Trenton, N. J., yesterday. The following officers were appointed for the ensuing year: M. W. Grand Master, Marshall B. Smith; D. G. M., Nathan Haines; S. G. W., Hamilton Wallis; J. G. W., Joseph W. Martin; Grand Treasurer, Charles Bechtel; Grand Secretary, Joseph H. Hough; Deputy Grand Secretary, T. H. R. Redway; Grand Chaplain, Rev. N. Petti; Grand S. Deacon, George B. Edwards; Grand J. Deacon, M. M. Drohan; Grand Marshal, Charles Rue; Grand Senior Steward, Benjamin B. Averigg; Grand Junior Steward, William H. Bennett; Grand Instructor, Rebec Wells; Grand Sword Bearer, Samuel Butcher; Grand Pursuivant, James Vanderstein; Grand Tiler, Amos Howell. The District Deputy Grand Masters of last year were reappointed.

THE STAPLETON FERRY DOCK.

A decision has just been rendered by the Court of Appeals in the case of the People against the Staten Island Ferry Company, by which the Pilot Commissioners are authorized to carry out the contract made for the removal of the pier of the Staten Island Ferry Company at Stapleton. At the time the Commissioners made the first attempt, it will be remembered, there was a scene of great excitement, and the boats and men sent to effect the removal were driven off. The penalty for the interference is said to be $25 a day, and, calculated on this basis, it had reached up to the time of the decision the sum of $16,000.

PROPOSED CONFERENCE WITH THE MAYOR.

In response to an invitation from a number of prominent citizens, including Messrs. William C. Bryant, Jackson S. Schultz, and others, Mayor Ely will confer with them at his office on Tuesday next in regard to devising measures for reforming the City Government. The meeting promises to be an important one.

SEIZURE OF FINE CIGARS.

The steam-ship Columbus, which arrived on Monday from Havana, brought 20 boxes of cigars, bearing no mark, which were seized by Inspector Weed, at Pier No. 13 North River, and placed in the seizure-room at the Custom-house. The cigars are all of the finest quality, and were evidently imported for consumption, and will probably be claimed.

CITY AND SUBURBAN NEWS.

NEW-YORK.

John B. Worcester was appointed by Judge Donohue, yesterday, as the Receiver of the Paoli Belt Company.

Dr. Charles E. De Midiel will lecture this evening, at the Liberal Club, on "The Commensurational System Applied to Education."

District Attorney Bliss yesterday consented that the civil suit for $1,336,400 against Charles R. Lawrence, the silk smuggler, should be discontinued. Lawrence is now out on bail in the criminal suit against him.

Francis Reel, aged 54, a laborer, who resided at No. 44 Jackson street, was instantly killed yesterday by the falling of a part of a derrick at the wharf of the Delaware and Hudson Canal Company, Pier No. 46 East River.

The next lecture in the Cooper Union Free Course will be delivered to-morrow evening in the Great Hall, at 8 o'clock, by Prof. E. S. Morse, of Salem, Mass., on "Evolution," being the third of a series of four lectures on that subject.

The Feast of the Epiphany was celebrated yesterday at the Greek-Russian Church on Second avenue, Father Bjerring officiating. It was believed by many of the persons present that Grand Duke Alexis would attend the service, but he had not arrived in the City, and Father Bjerring knew nothing of his movements.

BROOKLYN.

Frederick Bachman, a shoemaker, 40 years of age, committed suicide yesterday morning at No. 260 Hudson avenue, by taking a dose of Paris green. Bachman had been out of employment for a long time.

Coroner Simms has been requested to reopen the inquiry into the circumstances attending the death of the victims of the Brooklyn Theatre fire. The request, it is said, is made by Mr. George, one of the jurors, as he wishes to hear further testimony. The day for reopening the inquest has not yet been fixed.

In the suit of James Binns against ex-Sheriff A. G. Williams to recover $1,000, the value of a quantity of gas machines seized by Williams in the office of a gas company against which he had an execution, a jury yesterday rendered a verdict for the defendant. A motion for a new trial was made, upon which the court reserved its decision.

Some time ago a woman brought a suit against Michael O'Grady for an insult offered to her. A verdict was given for the plaintiff. After the trial O'Grady followed Francis Brady, one of the jurors, out of the court and assaulted him violently. Brady brought an action against O'Grady for the assault, and yesterday recovered a verdict of $300 in the City Court.

Capt. Samuel Groves, who has just died in Saratoga while on a visit to some relatives, was the founder of the Eastern District Dispensary and Hospital, and at one time President of the Board of Trustees of Williamsburg City before its annexation to Brooklyn. The funeral services will take place this morning in the Bedford Avenue Reformed Church, of which deceased was a member.

NEW-JERSEY.

Joseph Guraglia, an Italian, complained to Justice Strong, in Hoboken, yesterday that he had been attacked by three highwaymen near the Pavonia Ferry, Jersey City, who attempted to rob him. The Police are looking for the offenders.

John Jones, who was sentenced to two years in State Prison for breaking into a Newark lamp-store, escaped from Deputy Sheriff Freeman at the Trenton depot while on the way to the prison on Wednesday. Jones, having small hands, slipped his handcuffs.

A wild steer, which broke from a herd being driven to the Jersey City Abattoir, ran toward the Hoboken flats, which were frozen over. There a battle took place between a police officer and the steer, in which the officer was victorious. The steer was shot.

Nineteen of the employes of the printing department of the Peters oil-cloth manufactory, Newark, quit work yesterday in consequence of their wages being cut down 12 per cent. A like reduction was made in the graining department, but no strike is threatened.

George Messner lived in one of the houses owned by Mrs. George Miller, No. 179 West street, Newark. Messner had been sick and out of work, and three of his children were down with the whooping cough. Last week Mrs. Miller, accompanied by her son and daughter, called on Mr. Messner, and because he would not pay the rent immediately removed the doors and windows, exposing Messner and his children to the severity of the weather and endangering their lives. Mrs. Miller was arrested, and has been held in $500 bail to keep the peace for six months. She has also been required by Justice Otto to put the doors and windows back in their places.

ANOTHER MISSING MAN.

Charles E. Goodrich, a commission merchant, who did business at No. 66 Dey street, has been mysteriously missing since Tuesday last. He left his office on that day, having about $2,000 and a valuable watch and chain, saying he would be back in 20 minutes. Mr. Goodrich resides at No. 80 Fleet street, Brooklyn. His friends yesterday notified Superintendent Walling of his disappearance, and a general alarm was immediately sent to all the Police stations to keep a lookout for him.

A SUIT CONCERNING STOCK.

The case of Anna M. Cushman against the Thayer Manufacturing Jewelry Company was brought to trial before Judge Joseph F. Daly in the Special Term of the Court of Common Pleas yesterday. It appears that the company was organized with $600,000 of capital stock for the manufacture of celluloid jewelry. The plaintiff's husband, Peter B. Cushman, owned 19,500 shares of its stock, whose par value was $195,000. The plaintiff claims her husband assigned to her these shares, and that the company refuses to make the transfer on its books. She asks that the defendant be directed to transfer the stock to her on its books and to issue a new certificate of stock to her. The company in answer alleges that Peter B. Cushman, before assigning to the plaintiff, had assigned the stock for a valuable consideration to one Le

Special Dispatch to the New-York Times.

WASHINGTON, Jan. 19.—The obstacles in the way of an agreement between the two committees of the House and Senate considering a method of counting the Electoral votes were, of course, numerous and great. There were on both committees some of the extreme men of each party, and it was everywhere regarded as impossible that any proposition upon which they might come together could be devised. The members of the committee at first decided that there could be no hope of any agreement if the proceedings of the committee were each day known and discussed, so that members would be placed under pressure from outside influences. The confidence of the committee was exceedingly well kept till the Senate committee had prepared a complete proposition. There were many suggestions made, and some were set aside without attracting discussion, while others were long and anxiously debated, being earnestly opposed and warmly supported. More than a week ago the Senate committee informed the House committee that they had matured a plan which commended itself to the judgment of a majority of the committee, and they asked the presence of the House committee for a further consultation upon their bill and any plan that the House committee might propose. The Senate bill embraced the leading features of the one which has been reported to the House, with this important exception, that the composition of the tribunal was to be determined by lot. This feature of the Senate bill met with strenuous opposition upon the part of House Democrats, especially Hewitt, Springer, and Hunton. So earnest was the opposition to this feature of the bill, and so persistently was it urged on the other side as being the best available means of obtaining the judicial portion of the commission, that all hope of agreement seemed to pale before this vexed question. The House Democrats were inexorable, they say, and after many propositions and counter-propositions, the plan and bill as reported, were agreed upon in the session of Wednesday afternoon.

Previous to the House members going into session with the other committee, they had prepared a bill which, while it was not formally adopted by the joint committee, met the views of a majority of the House Committee. This bill provided for a tribunal composed of the five Justices of the Supreme Court longest in commission, namely, Justices Clifford, Swayne, Miller, Davis, and Field. All the contested cases for Electors were to be referred to that commission, or tribunal, as it was called in the bill, and the commission was to report its findings to the joint meeting of the two houses; and unless it was approved by the concurrent action of both houses it should be of no effect whatever, and the tellers were authorized to proceed with the count, making their report to show what votes were certified by the tribunal and approved by the concurrent action of the two houses, and a tabular statement of votes, when completed in accordance with the act, was to be read and handed to the President of the Senate, who would announce the state of the vote. The objection urged against this measure was that it required concurrence of both houses to confirm the decision of the tribunal, and that it also undertook to define what should be the powers of the tribunal in relation to evidence which it might consider, and gave power to send for persons and papers; and further, that the tribunal proposed did not contain a representation of the two houses of Congress. This was deemed very essential to a full and proper understanding of all questions that might arise. The members of the House Committee insisted upon the right of either house to reject the findings of the tribunal, and this point was yielded by them with great reluctance, and only after it became apparent that no plan could be agreed upon except it recognized the concurrent action of both houses as necessary to reject the vote of a State when there was but one return, as well as to reject the decision of the tribunal.

After this point, the next question which vexed the minds of the committee was the composition of the judicial part of the tribunal. There was no difficulty in agreeing upon the representation of the two houses of Congress, and the manner of their appointment, but it seemed almost impossible to agree upon the manner of selecting the Justices of the Supreme Court. The Senate members insisted that the proposition of their bill to place the names of the six Justices oldest in commission in a box, and draw therefrom the names of five who should constitute the court part of the commission, was pressed by them as the fairest plan that could be agreed upon. While this subject was pending in the committee, the strictest secrecy being imposed upon all who are supposed to have any knowledge of the proposition before the committee, the fact became public through THE TIMES that this plan was under consideration and was likely to be adopted, and the criticism of the press was so severe and the opposition of the House on the committee so decided that it was formally abandoned.

It was known that Justices Clifford and Field were Democrats, and had supported Messrs. Tilden and Hendricks in the late election. It was also understood that Justices Swayne and Miller had supported Hayes and Wheeler. The political position of Justice Davis was the subject of much doubt. The Republicans generally regarded him as a Democrat, and the Democrats considered him an Independent Republican with Democratic proclivities, and it was urged against the proposition to select the five senior Justices that the commission would consist of Justices Clifford, Swayne, Miller, Davis, and Fields, and while this would be regarded as an eminently just tribunal, it would politically be against the Republicans. The subject was discussed in all its bearings. One proposition was that Justices Clifford and Swayne be chosen, and that they should choose two others, and that the four should select the fifth. This was discussed at some length, and out of it grew the method of selection finally chosen.

The composition of the tribunal having been agreed upon, nothing remained but to arrange some minor details. But, here came up another question that seemed likely to be very difficult of solution. That was as to what evidence should be considered by this commission in passing on the returns. The House Democrats were determined upon an explicit provision giving the commission power to go behind the returns and send for persons and papers; but the Senators were strongly opposed to it, and finally came to the agreement that the commission shall have the same powers, as to evidence, as is now possessed for that purpose by the two houses of Congress, acting separately or together. All questions relating to the powers of the commission as to the evidence, &c., were finally left for that body to determine as a part of the case before them.

A mistake occurred in the statement or transmission of Senator Morton's views on the Electoral Count bill, as printed in THE TIMES of to-day. He did not state that Congress is vested with the exclusive power to count the Electoral vote as reported. What he did say was, that if the power to count the votes is vested in the two houses, that power cannot be delegated to a commission. He said further that in the absence of legislation, the President of the Senate must count the vote.

REPUBLICAN OPPOSITION GROWING.

INDISPOSITION TO EXPRESS POSITIVE VIEWS —TIME FOR CONFERENCES AND CAUCUSING VERY DESIRABLE—PROSPECTS FOR AMENDMENTS, AND POSSIBLE DEFEAT IN CONSEQUENCE.

Special Dispatch to the New-York Times.

WASHINGTON, Jan. 19.—The Compromise bill from the Joint Committee will be taken up to-morrow in the Senate, probably, though, if objection should be made, a formal vote would be required. There was a motion made to-day to adjourn over till Monday, which was withdrawn because of the statement made by Senator Edmunds that he would endeavor to have the bill taken up to-morrow. The suggestion was made that final action would be speediest secured by devoting Saturday to private conference and caucuses. Mr. Edmunds was firm in pressing the bill upon the Senate, and no further effort at adjournment was made. It is therefore expected that Senator Edmunds will secure the consideration of the measure, and will make the opening speech in its behalf. He will be listened to with great attention, and will, no doubt, make a strong presentation of the advantages of the bill. The Senate Democrats will meet in caucus to-morrow morning. A Republican caucus of Senators has also been called to meet at 10:30. These caucuses, or rather conferences, for the interchange of views, are not at present to bind any of those participating to any line of action. The Republicans of the House will probably meet in caucus on Monday. Meanwhile, there have been several arrangements of smaller conferences, in which leading politicians participated.

There is less disposition on the part of members to define their positions than yesterday, but there is more opposition discovered on the Republican side than was supposed to exist. Mr. Danford, of Ohio, is very hostile, and will express his opposition by action against the measure. Senator Sherman is also inclined to active opposition, but to this time it cannot be said that any organized opposition has been arranged on either side, though such organization may result from a private conference held to-night at the house of a Senator. The situation seems unchanged. Very few like the measure, but it is felt to be assuming a great responsibility to defeat it, and there is, therefore, a desire to hear the popular sentiment. There would be, if the vote were taken to-morrow, a large number of votes for the bill which would be against it if those so voting thought it could be defeated. This shows how strong is the feeling that the bill will pass. But conferences and discussions may produce a change.

Telegrams have been received by members to-day urging the passage of the bill, and others, but fewer in number, against it. George William Curtis telegraphs to George F. Hoar approval and hearty congratulations. It is predicted by some that the debate will be brief, but this is improbable, as amendments will be offered and urgently pressed, and considerable time will be required to dispose of them.

The aim of the committee will be to secure the passage of the bill without amendment, and it is admitted that if a single amendment is made the whole measure will probably fall between the two houses.

WESTERN VIEWS.

ILLINOIS.

Special Dispatch to the New-York Times.

CHICAGO, Jan. 19. — The compromise scheme proposed in Congress for the settlement of the Electoral count has created considerable comment in this city on the part of prominent men, and as a matter of course opinions are at great variance as to the feasibility of the plan. The more thoughtful Republicans, while looking upon it as not a perfect scheme, deem it better than war, and acceptable not only as determining the Presidential election, but as settling threatened violence in Louisiana and South Carolina. The measure, they say, is not so much a compromise as it is the submission of conflicting opinions to as fair a tribunal as perhaps can be constituted at this time, and on the very eve of the day for counting the votes. By some it is said that it is not a question alone as to what shall be done at this election, but whether the precedent is a safe one; and on the other hand that no outside tribunal can be organized for the purpose of ascertaining and declaring the Electoral vote which will prove at all satisfactory. Said a leading Republican to your representative: "The whole matter rests with the Judges, and, in fact, I might correctly say with one of them, for the four are evenly divided, politically. The strain should be put where it belongs, on Congress, which is much better able to stand it, and not upon the Supreme Court, where it does not belong, and which cannot stand it. The creation of these outside tribunals, unknown to the Constitution or to the past history of the country, is always of questionable propriety and policy. In the present case the good to be attained is so conjectural, and the harm to be done is so certain and so serious, that it seems to me that this ingeniously-contrived scheme ought to be rejected." This gentleman added: "Congress has no power to compel the performance of any such duties by the Judges, and a proper regard for the dignity of their position would seem to lead them to refuse to act in such capacity." As against the foregoing, another prominent Republican lawyer holds that it is a good idea, because it recognizes the propriety of deciding all complications that might arise according to law, and presents a mode in which dangerous questions like the present may find a peaceful solution.

Among the business men there is, irrespective of political predilections, a pretty general feeling of satisfaction, all hailing with joy the possibility of a solution of the present disturbed state of affairs, which would give business a new impetus and inspire confidence in financial and commercial matters. They say, and it must be conceded that these men are important factors in the body politic, that they are ready to hail any scheme which will at once settle the difficulties amicably and give the country future peaceful prospects.

Among the press the Tribune looks upon it as perhaps the best plan at this juncture. The Inter-Ocean calls it a "hodge-podge" and unworthy of the eminent gentlemen who framed it. "It is," it says, "boys' way of settling a great question, not a way which can be commended as a precedent in future difficulties of this kind, and which will command the respect of our own or any other nation."

OHIO.

Special Dispatch to the New-York Times.

CLEVELAND, Jan. 19.—The measure proposed by the Joint Committee of Congress for a new plan of counting the Electoral vote finds more opponents than supporters among the Republicans of this section. At first there was a very general disposition to approve the plan as a measure of peace and good will, but the more it is examined in detail the stronger grows the opposition to it, even among conservative men. The exclusion of Chief Justice Waite from the commission indicates to the Ohio Republicans that there was an unwillingness on the part of the Joint Committee to make the tribunal above suspicion of partisan bias. Above all, however, is the consideration that the proposed measure is without authority in the Constitution or any existing law; that it demands of the Republican Party that it surrender a perfectly valid and tenable claim that the vote shall be counted as heretofore, while the Democrats only renounce their untenable claim that the House alone may reject the vote of a State, declare that no election has been held and proceed to elect. The bill is looked upon as giving Tilden, who has been defeated at the polls, a new chance for election which he does not now enjoy. It is putting in jeopardy the claims of Hayes which are now secure. This is the talk of leading Republicans throughout the city to-night. This conclusion has been hastened by the knowledge that Sherman, Morton, and Garfield are opposed to the compromise.

At Columbus the feeling is even more outspoken among members of the Legislature. Speaker Grosvenor considers it as one step toward centralization and an abrogation of the vote by the people. Lieut. Gov. Young stamps it as an abandonment of the position heretofore held by the Republican Party. Hon. W. P. Howland, of Ashtabula, says the Republicans, who have heretofore held the winning hand, have been outwitted, and that there is no law or precedent for such action. There is general suspicion of Conkling, and an impression that Thurman and Payne have overmatched Edmunds and Hoar. The Democrats are almost without exception jubilant and satisfied with the prospect, although very cautious about stating just why the compromise pleases them. The Republicans wait with intense interest to see what will be said in Congress in favor of the bill. If it is adopted, they will assent and hope for the best; but they will consider it a compromise in which their party has everything to risk, and the Democrats everything to gain.

Special Dispatch to the New-York Times.

COLUMBUS, Jan. 19—The compromise plan of counting the Electoral vote has been the prevailing topic of discussion to-day with all classes of people. There has been very grave apprehension among Republicans in regard to this movement from the beginning as a scheme that could have no other effect, it adopted, than to encourage the Democratic attempt to usurp the Presidency and thwart the Constitution in the name of compromise and conciliation. The Republicans have regarded their case as impregnable as it stands, and have looked upon all propositions to refer it to arbitration as a useless sacrifice of their constitutional rights. On the other hand the Democrats have regarded such propositions as so much gain for their side, and have fed their hopes almost exclusively upon the rumors of Republican weakening or defection in Congress. But for such rumors the majority of Democrats would, by this time, have abandoned Tilden's pretensions and accepted the peaceable inauguration of Hayes and Wheeler as a foregone conclusion; but their hopes have been greatly revived to-day by the publication of the joint committee's programme.

In the General Assembly they have exchanged congratulations upon the new aspect of affairs, and at no previous time have they manifested so much elation as during the past 24 hours. The Republicans, on the other hand, are not only disappointed, but exasperated, and condemn the compromise plan in the severest terms. They condemn it as wantonly jeopardizing a case not only well established, but which, as they believe, could easily be maintained at the bar of public opinion, and as yet they appear to be absolutely unanimous in this view.

One of the most prominent Republican lawyers of the State expressed the opinion this evening that the compromise scheme is directly at variance with the constitutional provision that no Senator or Representative shall, during the time for which he is elected, be appointed to any civil office under the authority of the United States, which shall have been created, or the emoluments whereof shall have been increased during such time. He also cited the provisions of the Constitution vesting the appointing power exclusively in the President, heads of departments, and in the courts of law, as directly against the scheme.

A leading Republican member of the Ohio Senate expressed the opinion this evening that the compromise plan was a gratuitous giving away of the Republican case. He declared the Republican Party was never more unanimous on any question than it is now in demanding a constitutional count by the President of the Senate, and he severely condemned the compromise scheme as placing the defeated candidate on equal terms with the elected one. These views fairly represent those of Republicans generally, and do not at all exaggerate the intensity of their feeling against the Congressional plan of arbitration.

Special Dispatch to the New-York Times.

CINCINNATI, Jan. 19.—The discussion of the compromise plan developes great diversity of opinion among leading lawyers and politicians in this vicinity. Judge Hoadley, who furnished the legal advice for the Oregon job, declares that the scheme should receive the support of all just-minded and peacefully disposed men. Alexander Long, who represents another wing of the Democracy, opposes it vigorously on the same grounds as the Cincinnati Enquirer. Hon. Rufus King is in favor of steering for any port in time of a storm. Gov. Noyes and Judge Stanley Matthews believe that Hayes has been elected, and are emphatic in the opinion that the vote should be counted and declared by the Vice President, as provided in the Constitution.

INDIANA.

Special Dispatch to the New-York Times.

INDIANAPOLIS, Jan. 19.—The Republican members of the General Assembly, in caucus to-night, passed the following resolutions:

Resolved, That we believe the interests of the country demands, first, a fair vote of the people without fear or favor; second, a fair count of the legal votes so cast, and, lastly, that a willing and prompt submission by all parties to the result so declared, by and through the legally-constituted authorities established for that purpose, is necessary to insure peace and prosperity to the country; and we denounce as revolutionary attempts of the leaders of the Democratic Party to intimidate the people of the nation by threats of anarchy and war unless the person of their choice shall be declared elected President. We believe that Rutherford B. Hayes has been elected President, and that William A. Wheeler has been elected Vice President of the United States, and that it only remains for the President of the Senate to declare the result according to the Constitution of the United States, and that when the result of the late elections shall be so declared, whether such result shall be in favor of the Republican or Democratic candidates, it is the duty of all good citizens to acquiesce in such decision. We would remind the Democratic Party of the past that it has been but a few short years since several States of the Union, all having Democratic Governments, were led into revolution and war by many of the leaders who are now at the head of that party, and we would respectfully submit that past experience in appealing from the ballot box to the cartridge-box has proved decidedly unprofitable.

The caucus also adopted a resolution indorsing Senator Morton for withholding his name from the report of the committee.

KENTUCKY.

LOUISVILLE, Jan. 18.—The following address, signed by prominent citizens and business men, including Gen. S. B. Buckner and ex-Secretary Bristow, will be sent to Washington:

LOUISVILLE, Ky., Jan. 18, 1877.

Hon. Henry Watterson and others, Representatives and Senators in Congress from Kentucky:

DEAR SIRS: The undersigned see with satisfaction the probable agreement between the two houses in the settlement of the vexed Presidential question. The plan, as agreed upon by the joint committee of the two houses, as we understand it, while not all we could desire as partisans, is patriotic and satisfactory under the circumstances, and we urge its immediate adoption as a means of settling the dangerous question, quieting excitement throughout the country, and hastening a return to that confidence so much needed by all the material interests of the land.

IOWA.

DES MOINES, Jan. 19.—The Democratic State Central Committee met this morning and indorsed the Compromise bill reported in Congress yesterday, and expressed the hope that all the people of Iowa would support the Joint Committee.

EASTERN VIEWS.

MASSACHUSETTS.

Special Dispatch to the New-York Times.

BOSTON, Jan. 19.—The feeling here to-day was strongly in favor of the new compromise, business men accepting it as a relief and means of escaping from the snarl which existed. Those who opposed it were strong partisans on both sides, while the more moderate men believed the Supreme Court ought not to be drawn into it at all. These are the views of men whose opinions reflect the sentiment of both parties. The Boston papers, except the Traveller, favor it, and until the New-York papers got here public opinion was very decided in its favor. The tone of the New-York papers will go some way toward changing the condition.

CONNECTICUT.

HARTFORD, Jan. 19.—The Senate, to-day, passed a resolution endorsing the plans proposed by the Congressional Committee for settling the Presidential question, and requesting Connecticut Senators and Representatives to support the plan in Congress. The House tabled the resolution, and made it the special order for Wednesday, Jan. 24.

THE MASSACHUSETTS SENATOR.

GEORGE F. HOAR ELECTED, ON THE FIFTH JOINT BALLOT—A GREAT SURPRISE TO ALL CONCERNED—DISPATCH FROM SENATOR BOUTWELL.

Special Dispatch to the New-York Times.

BOSTON, Jan. 19.—The United States Senatorial contest is ended in this State, and George F. Hoar is elected, receiving a very decided vote on the first ballot in the convention to-day. This result was a general surprise, not alone to the Boutwell and Rice men, but to the Hoar men themselves. Mr. Boutwell's men, at their caucus previous to the balloting, voted, after a lively debate, to transfer their strength to Rice, and it was not until the ballot was half through that the leaders found that they had no votes to deliver, many who had voted for Boutwell taking the bits in their teeth, so to speak, and deciding to vote for Hoar. The Democrats were expecting, with confidence, a second ballot, and it was their intention then to drop Abbott and go in for the compromise candidate who seemed to have the best chance, excepting Rice. The ballot was taken in the midst of great excitement, the galleries and lobbies being packed with people, and before it was announced there was much confusion. When it was found that Hoar had the victory, several members changed their votes before the declaration. The ballot as declared was as follows:

Whole number of votes cast	276
Necessary for a choice	139
Paul A. Chadbourne	1
Julius H. Seelye	1
Alexander H. Bullock	1
Alexander H. Rice	19
George S. Boutwell	47
Josiah G. Abbott	62
George F. Hoar	146

Congratulatory dispatches were immediately sent to Mr. Hoar at Washington. Senator Boutwell sent here the following dispatch this forenoon, which was read at the Boutwell caucus:

Nothing has occurred in my life more gratifying or more affecting than the support which I have received from my friends and fellow-citizens in this contest. I shall endeavor to show my gratitude to those to whom I am so much indebted.

GEORGE S. BOUTWELL.

The election of Mr. Hoar is regarded as a complete defeat of the Butler and Simmons factions. Boutwell, no doubt, had many supporters who were not Butler men, but the Butler and Custom-house interests were openly for him, and this fact, more than any other, led to his defeat.

THE DEAD-LOCK IN ILLINOIS.

SIX MORE BALLOTS TAKEN AND NO CHOICE MADE—JUDGE DAVIS DESERTED—LOGAN'S FRIENDS BEGINNING TO DOUBT.

Special Dispatch to the New-York Times.

SPRINGFIELD, Ill., Jan. 19.—Six more ballots taken to-day left the situation unchanged, except that the Davis men abandoned him and went over to Anderson. The Democrats decided to-night to adhere to Palmer to-morrow, and the Independents to Anderson, which will continue the dead-lock. The Democrats threaten that they will keep Palmer, and the Independents Anderson, in the field until Logan is out of the way. Logan's friends claim that he is the only Republican who can be elected; but 18 ballots, and no reinforcements to his ranks, have begun to make some of his friends doubt if even he can be elected unless there is an election to-morrow. It is intimated that there will be a break somewhere to-morrow night, and Monday's balloting will be decisive. One reason why Davis was dropped is that the Democrats think he will be of more service to them on the bench, if he should be chosen as one of the arbitration committee provided for in the bill introduced in Congress yesterday.

THE TENNESSEE SENATOR.

NASHVILLE, Jan. 19.—James E. Bailey was to-day elected United States Senator, for the short term, on the seventy-third ballot. The vote stood as follows: Bailey, 55; Key, 38; Bate, 7.

SUICIDE OF A PRISONER.

ELMIRA, Jan. 19.—Charles Hagadorn committed suicide in the jail here to-day by hanging himself to the iron door of his cell with two napkins tied together. He was in prison on the complaint of his wife for assault and battery. He was about 44 years of age and much addicted to drinking. His wife is a milliner here and an estimable woman.

CONGRESSIONAL TOPICS.

THE LOUISIANA DEBATE IN THE SENATE—MR. BOGY'S VIEW OF THE SOUTHERN TERROR—THE LEGISLATIVE APPROPRIATIONS—WOMEN TO PRACTICE IN THE SUPREME COURT—THE ELECTION OF MR. HOAR TO THE SENATE.

Special Dispatch to the New-York Times.

WASHINGTON, Jan. 19.—For two days past Mr. Bogy, of Missouri, has wasted the time of the Senate and exhausted the patience of even the inveterate habitués of the galleries, by making what he calls "a reply to Senator Sherman's" speech on the Louisiana case. In doing this Mr. Bogy, who is a very stout and short-winded man, has secured the services of a reading clerk in the person of Senator Cockerell. Together, and taking turns at the dismal task, the two gentlemen, with a courage and determination worthy of a better cause, have gone through nearly 500 pages of testimony, and proved to their own satisfaction, at least, that there was no intimidation or violence in Louisiana, and that in bloody Morehouse and Baton Rouge the Republican colored men did not vote because they were all warm admirers of Tilden and reform, and because they had come to the conclusion that their best friends were the White League ruffians who ride at midnight through the Red River country, for the purpose, as the would-be Gov. McEnery expressed it, "of amusing themselves and exercising their horses."

The Executive, Legislative, and Judicial Appropriation bill was reported to the House, and Mr. Holman will make an effort to have its consideration commenced to-morrow. The amount appropriated by the bill as reported is $14,336,000, which is more than $1,000,000 less than the amount appropriated for the same purposes last year.

The House Committee on the Judiciary have agreed to report a bill giving women the right to practice in the Supreme Court of the United States. Bella A. Lockwood lately appeared in the Supreme Court to try a cause, but was denied permission to plead because the laws exclude women from appearing in that tribunal as attorneys.

The election of Mr. George F. Hoar to the Senate, from Massachusetts, in place of Mr. Boutwell, was early known in the House this afternoon, and he held quite a reception at his seat, and received numerous hearty congratulations. The election is looked upon here, by those opposed to Mr. Boutwell, as a defeat of Butler rather than a defeat of Mr. Boutwell, and hence their rejoicing. Mr. Boutwell, on the other hand, has numerous friends, who warmly regret his retirement from the Senate.

MANAGEMENT OF THE CAMPAIGN.

THE TELEGRAPHIC DISPATCHES TO BE PRODUCED—EXAMINATION OF AGENTS OF THE WESTERN UNION TELEGRAPH COMPANY—THE DEMOCRATIC MEMBERS BECOMING ALARMED—THEIR ANXIETY TO SUPPRESS DISPATCHES.

Special Dispatch to the New-York Times.

WASHINGTON, Jan. 19.—This morning, before the Committee on the Privileges of the House, the counsel for the Western Union Telegraph Company stated that the Directors had decided to produce the political dispatches from and to Louisiana, Florida, Oregon, and other States, which had been demanded by the committees of the Senate and House. Ex-Gov. Morgan, Messrs. Orton, Schell, and their associates, were then discharged. Subsequently it was arranged that in all cases where the committees of both houses desired to examine the same telegrams, the originals should be furnished to the committee first making the application, and certified copies should be sent to the other committee. During the day subcommittees were appointed to carry out the details of this plan, and it was decided finally that Senators Sargent, Mitchell, and Cooper be constituted a sub-committee to examine the dispatches. They will commence their labors to-morrow. Now that the telegraph company has yielded to the demands of Mr. Proctor Knott and his colleagues, they do not seem nearly so anxious to see the dispatches to which reference has been made as they were when they thought they would be withheld. They are becoming not a little alarmed at the unexpected action of the Western Union Directors, and if possible they would gladly prevent the further progress of the investigation. The reason for their anxiety will become apparent when it is stated that most of the telegrams sent and received by Republicans, regarding Oregon and the Southern States, have already been published, and have been found to contain nothing which in any way injures the cause of the President-elect, or aids the supporters of Mr. Tilden. It is now definitely understood, too, that there are no telegrams in existence the publication of which would have that result. On the other hand, the Democrats who are in the confidence of Mr. Hewitt know that he sent a number of telegrams, particularly to Florida, which, if published, will display that eminent reformer and his party in a very questionable light. It is openly charged here that at least one telegram was sent to Tallahassee by the Chairman of the Democratic National Committee, in which he distinctly stated that Florida must be held and counted for Tilden at all hazards, and that any money which was necessary to secure that end would be furnished. Other dispatches of a like nature were, as it is charged, sent to ex-Gov. Walker, of Florida, S. Pasco, the Chairman of the Democratic Committee of that State, and C. E. Dyke, Jr., a low political jobber, who is regarded in Tallahassee very much as Jimmy Hayes, or Eddie Apgar, is in New-York. Drew, the Democratic candidate for Governor of Florida, was also in receipt of telegrams of the above character, and at the same time he read, according to his own statement made in Tallahassee late in November, every Republican dispatch that had been sent to or from Florida. He was the railway agent and telegraph operator at Elleville, a small station on the direct line of telegraphic communication with Tallahassee, and, while acting in that position, received and read all the messages that came by wire into the State. He boasted of this to Gen. Martin, the Chairman of the Republican State Committee. The Chairman of the National Democratic Committee, it is understood, requested Mr. Drew to furnish him with copies of these messages, but the latter very truthfully replied that it would be useless to do so, as they contained nothing which would injure the Republicans. Now, Messrs. Hewitt, Proctor Knott and company, are placed in the position of men who are "hoist by their own petard," and to-day they are as anxious to suppress the Florida dispatches as they were desirous of exposing what they called the midnight telegrams of the conspirator Chandler.

In the House this afternoon the Sergeant at Arms, created a sensation by appearing at the bar, having in custody J. Madison Wells and Thomas C. Anderson, of the Louisiana Returning Board. Amid an unusual silence the Speaker asked the witnesses what excuse they had to offer for not appearing before Mr. Morrison's committee in New-Orleans, and for refusing to produce certain books and papers relating to their canvass of the Louisiana vote. Gov. Wells, in the bold and somewhat boisterous style peculiar to him, replied that before answering he wished to consult with his associates on the committee, who were now en route from New-Orleans. Gen. Anderson made the same reply, and both witnesses were excused for the present. They remain in the custody of the Sergeant at Arms.

Dispatch to the Associated Press.

WASHINGTON, Jan. 19.—The Executive Committee of the Western Union Telegraph Company appeared before the Senate Committee on Privileges and Elections this morning, and after the reading of a statement by Mr. Orton, the President of the Company, a sub-committee, consisting of Senators Sargent, Mitchell, and Cooper, was appointed to confer with Mr. Orton as to the reception from him of the telegrams ready to be produced.

The Committee on the Powers, Privileges, and Duties of the House in Counting the Electoral Vote met this morning, when the members of the Executive Committee of the Western Union Telegraph Company appeared in answer to the subpœna of the House.

Mr. Lowrey, the counsel of the company, read the following papers:

Whereas, E. W. Barnes, Manager of the Western Union Telegraph Company at New-Orleans, was on the 13th day of December, 1876, served with a subpœna requiring him to produce before a special committee of the House of Representatives all messages sent or received by William Pitt Kellogg and seven other persons named, at New-Orleans between Aug. 15 and the date of service, said Barnes being at that date in possession of only a portion of the messages sent or received at that office from the general public, to wit, those between Aug. 15 and Nov. 1, and not knowing whether any messages such as are described in the subpœna to him were therein contained; and,

Whereas, William Orton, President of the company, was on the 19th day of December served with a subpœna requiring the production of the same messages before the same committee, together with all messages sent by Samuel Z. Chandler and twelve others from or at Washington, New-York City and New-Orleans, the said Orton not being, at that time, in any personal possession or control of such messages, if such existed, nor of any of the messages of the said company, and was also on the 19th and the 22d days of December, served with two subpœnas issued by the Committee on Privileges and Elections of the Senate calling for the production of all messages of J. N. H. Patrick and 10 others, received at or sent from Salem and Portland, Oregon, and all other messages, by whomsoever sent, at those and certain other offices of a political nature; and

Whereas, J. A. Brenner, District Superintendent of the company, residing at Augusta, Ga., was, on the 13th day of January, subpœnaed to bring before the Special Committee of the House of Representatives on the Privileges, Powers, and Duties of the House of Representatives in the counting of the vote for President and Vice President of the United States, all letters, or copies of letters, and all telegrams and copies within his power or control, sent or transmitted to or from any person or persons in any part of the State of Florida between the 8th day of November, and the 29th day of December, 1876, relative to the election held in said State on the 7th day of November, 1876, or any office to be filled thereat, or to any person who was a candidate for office to be filled at that election, or to the canvassing of votes or to the result of said election, and especially any letters, telegrams, or copies thereof purporting to be signed by Z. Chandler and three others, none of said messages, if they exist, or any messages of said company being at the time of such service in the power, possession, or control of said Brenner; and

Whereas, The individual members of the Executive Committee of this company were on the 16th day of January served with a subpœna by said Senate committee requiring the production in general of a great body of messages, being all those of a political character or having any reference to political matters sent to or from Washington, or cities and towns north of Washington, since Nov. 7, 1876, by or from any person or persons in the States of South Carolina, Florida, Louisiana, and Oregon; and

Whereas, On the 17th day of January all the members of this Executive Committee were served by a subpœna from the House of Representatives, requiring the production before said last mentioned committee of the House of all letters or telegrams within their power or control sent by the National Republican Committee or any member or officer thereof, to or from any person in the States of Florida, Louisiana, Oregon, South Carolina, and North Carolina, in relation to the election of President or Vice President, between Nov. 7 and Dec. 20, 1876; and,

Whereas, This company believes that it is in honor and in law bound to resist by all lawful means the exposure of the business and other communications of its customers; and it seeming to them that subpœnas of the general and sweeping character stated above, based on no proof that the few specific messages named have ever existed, and involving laborious and expensive searches through many tons of accumulated messages, to the interruption and detriment of the current telegraphic service of the country, were oppressive and unjust, did by the letter of its President to Hon. William R. Morrison, dated Dec. 15, decline to obey such subpœnas, "at least until after Congress shall have approved the subpœnas of the committees and directed that their demands be enforced," and did, by the counsel of the company, lay before the House of Representatives, in the case of E. W. Barnes, their views and respectful protest against the legality of such subpœnas; and

Whereas, The said House has now decided that the subpœna to said Barnes was in lawful and authorized form, and did not exceed the just powers of the House, and have ordered said Barnes into close custody for contempt in not producing the certain messages which may have been in his possession and described in said subpœna to him, in the general principles of which decision the Senate is understood to have concurred by its vote in the case of William M. Turner, manager at Jacksonville, Oregon. Now, therefore,

Resolved, That in the opinion of this committee it is not right or proper, nor has this company the power longer to postpone compliance with said subpœnas, however difficult or onerous such compliance may be; and the President is hereby requested to inform the respective committees of the House and Senate above-named, and also the Judiciary Committee of the House, that search will be made for all the messages called for as above stated, and if such be found they will, as soon as the same can be, gathered and selected from the files of the company in the various "towns, cities, and States named," and from time to time, as that is done, "be delivered in obedience to said subpœnas."

Resolved, That in view of the premises, it is the desire of the company, "as far as it is in their power to do so" in good faith, to comply with the subpœnas of the respective committees of both houses according to their terms, and as both houses have by their subpœnas called for the delivery of many of the same messages to each, therefore, be it further resolved that in case of failure on the part of the committees of both houses to agree as to the mode of complying with the conflicting requirements of each, it is the opinion of this committee that the messages called for by the several subpœnas should be delivered in the order in which said subpœnas respectively were served upon any person having at the time any actual or constructive control of the messages called for, either personally or as one of this Executive Committee, or as any officer of the company, and that it required by either of the committees whose subpœna is last in order, certified copies will be furnished as far as practicable to do so in place of the originals, which have been first demanded by any other committee.

NORVIN GREEN, HARRISON DURREE,
JOSEPH HARKER, AUGUSTUS SCHELL.

Mr. Lowrey remarked that many of the telegrams were now here, and others will soon be sent.

Mr. Knott, of Kentucky, said that as the Senate Committee on Privileges and Elections had appointed a sub-committee with reference to the receipt of telegrams, it would be proper for this committee to appoint a sub-committee for a like purpose, and to consult with the Senate Committee; this would obviate difficulties. A sub-committee was authorized, and Messrs. Field, Tucker and McDill were appointed such committee. The members of the Western Union Executive Committee were then released from the subpœna.

John Brenner, of Augusta, Ga., Superintendent of the Western Union Telegraph Office for the Third Southern Section, was sworn, and testified that the telegraph operator at Tallahassee was dismissed, he having been charged with having divulged the contents of messages sent by Gov. Stearns, and having delayed a message sent by Senator Conover to some parties in Washington; Brush (the operator) however, was restored, it having been ascertained the charges were untrue; the message of Mr. Conover was a denial of the report that he said the State of Florida had gone for Tilden.

Question by Mr. Field—Was any message sent between Florida and Washington or New-York, either way, between the 1st and 14th of November in which money or troops were mentioned? A.—Not that I am aware of.

The witness testified to 6 or 10 cipher messages having been sent by William E. Chandler to Gov. Chamberlain from Tallahassee. There were also cipher messages from Senator Patterson to Gov. Chamberlain; cipher messages were likewise sent by the Secretary of War and Gen. Sherman to the military authorities; messages to them were generally in cipher; all these messages had passed from his hands, and were therefore not now under his control.

By Mr. Lawrence—Was any dispatch sent to South Carolina advising the Democratic Electors to meet and cast their vote for Tilden? A.—I do not remember. In further answer he said that being a Superintendent, and not an operator, he did not see all the messages which passed through the office; he did not know that the use of money was promised to anybody in South Carolina, or the giving of any advice as to the Electoral vote; he remembered the publication of a message in the newspapers, saying that money and troops would be furnished for Florida, said to have been signed by Z. Chandler; the Democrats of Augusta talked among themselves about the message, and said they would give money to have the returns carefully watched; they telegraphed to different portions of Florida, requesting their friends there to use every exertion and vigilance to prevent returns from being tampered with, and alluded to the dispatch just mentioned promising money and troops to carry the State; he had seen messages from Abram S. Hewitt and William T. Pelton, and thought some of them were addressed to Manton Marble and John F. Coyle, who were then in Florida, but he could not give the purport of the dispatches.

H. A. Hutchins, a telegraph operator at Tallahassee, was next examined. He had the telegrams in his possession; a large number of cipher messages were received at that office, but he could not tell whether any of them were sent from or to New-York or Washington, nor had he any recollection of any telegram having been received promising money or troops.

The committee then adjourned till to-morrow morning.

Col. William T. Pelton, of New-York, testified before the Senate Committee on Privileges and Elections this morning that he did not recollect telegraphing to Senator Kelly on the 8th of November last, that Mr. Tilden must have one Electoral vote from Oregon, and that Mr. Kelly would be depended upon to see that he obtained the vote, while he [Pelton] would furnish the means necessary for securing the same.

Augustus Wheeler, Manager of the Western Union Telegraph Office at Salem, Oregon, has arrived here to give testimony relative to any telegrams which may have passed in connection with the Watts Electoral case.

THE FRAUDS IN CINCINNATI TO BE OVERHAULED BY THE REPUBLICAN MEMBERS OF THE HOUSE SPECIAL COMMITTEE.

Special Dispatch to the New-York Times.

CINCINNATI, Jan. 19.—The report that the Republican members of David Dudley Field's committee are to do a little investigating in the direction of Cincinnati creates considerable stir here. Subpœnas have been issued for the Cashiers of the banks here, for John R. McLean, editor of the

COUNTING THE VOTE.

HOW THE CONGRESSIONAL PLAN IS REGARDED IN NEW-YORK.

OPINIONS OF PROMINENT LAWYERS, BANKERS, AND MERCHANTS—THE BILL GENERALLY CONDEMNED AS AN INNOVATION ON ESTABLISHED USAGE—LITTLE TO BE SAID IN ITS FAVOR AND VERY MUCH AGAINST IT.

The proposition to determine who shall be the next President of the United States by means of an Electoral Commission does not meet with favor among merchants and lawyers of this City. Reporters of THE TIMES visited a large number of them yesterday, and obtained from them expressions of opinion upon the bill introduced in Congress on Thursday. The general tone of their opinions, stated with more or less emphasis, was that it would be an unnecessary and dangerous expedient to virtually abolish the Constitution and place the power already vested elsewhere in the hands of a specially appointed committee, no matter how respectable or wise its members might be. As will be seen by perusal of the opinions given, the precedent is considered to be a mischievous and inexcusable one. First, because the duty of reaching a decision in the way pointed out by the Constitution has not yet been attempted; and second, because the precedent proposed to be established, even if successful now in averting the collision that many fear, would at another time prove a dangerous one to the peace and permanency of the nation. The proposition was looked upon as premature, as an idle and unmanly shirking of a duty but half performed, and nearly all the persons applied to for their views upon the subject spoke of the bill as something prepared rather in a spirit of trifling than as an honest and spirited effort to meet the emergency in which the country finds itself placed.

Judge ENOCH L. FANCHER thought the proposition to settle the disputed election by a commission would only increase and deepen the Presidential muddle. He thought there could be no doubt about the meaning of the Constitution in declaring how the Electoral vote should be counted, and if there were, the Madison Papers had pretty clearly illumined the subject. There was no occasion, it seemed to him, for any excuse, for taking from Congress powers that were clearly vested in it by the Constitution. No attempt had yet been made to reach a conclusion by the ordinary method established by precedent, and until it had been found impossible to reach a concurrence by this method there could be no reason in establishing a new precedent. He thought that instead of making clear the subject, it would, if adopted, only create greater dissatisfaction than now existed, and he did not think it would recommend itself to the sober sense of the Senate and the House of Representatives.

Mr. THURLOW WEED said that he concurred with Gen. Dix in the views he had expressed. He felt exceeding embarrassment in expressing views in conflict with those entertained by distinguished political friends in Congress, but he was constrained to say that the question was one that ought to be determined by the Constitution and laws. He had read the provisions of the Constitution applicable to the question, and had refreshed his memory in regard to the words expressed by Mr. Pinckney, Mr. Clay, and Chancellor Kent, and was persuaded that if Congress brings its calmest and best judgment to the consideration of the question, a solution, just in itself and satisfactory to the people, may be reached. Either Gov. Hayes or Gov. Tilden has received a majority of the Electoral votes. With this "fixed fact," there was nothing left for "compromise." The country and the people are entitled to the services as President and Vice President of the candidates for whom the Electors gave a majority vote. He regards the question as of more vital importance than any other that has arisen since the establishment of the Government, and, believing as he does in the election of Gov. Hayes, he would prefer an adverse result reached under the Constitution rather than see a Presidential election settled by Congressional compromises.

Gen. JOHN A. DIX said that he had expressed his views very fully in his letter in THE TIMES of yesterday in regard to the proper method of counting the Electoral vote. The plan agreed upon by the Congressional Committee was, in his opinion, highly objectionable, and the whole proceeding in derogation of the authority conferred upon the President of the Senate, and, therefore, in direct violation of the Constitution.

Mr. ROGER A. PRYOR said the proposed commission would be a monstrous usurpation. He did not for a moment suppose that Congress would dare to pass the bill. It would be entirely unconstitutional to so decide the election. The Constitution plainly provides how the vote shall be counted, and for Congress to depart from the instruction of the Constitution would be to assume powers that are not accorded to it. Granted that this time the plan might work well in averting a collision, it might on another occasion provoke the very collision that may be now averted. Either Mr. Hayes or Mr. Tilden is elected. Shall this commission decide—against the return of the Electoral College—that Mr. Tilden is elected, and award the election to him? Or shall it say that Mr. Hayes is elected, when the Electoral votes may be plainly shown to belong to Mr. Tilden? He did not believe that such an absurd proposition would be entertained, and looked to see it promptly discouraged by Congress. There would be as much reason and justice in submitting the decision of this question to the Czar of Russia as to submit it to the commission of Senators, Representatives, and Justices of the Supreme Court.

Mr. ISAAC H. BAILEY had not had time to carefully read the bill providing for the settlement of the Presidential election by a commission, but he had formed the opinion that the necessary power to decide the disputes before the people rested with Congress already, and that there was no real necessity for resorting to any such novel plan for the purpose of bestowing a decision that would really be delayed rather than hurried. He did not think it was at all likely that the bill would be passed, or that the plan would be generally approved of by the people.

Mr. PETER B. OLNEY considered the proposition to relegate the powers of the Electoral College to a Congressional commission as entirely unnecessary and fraught with danger. He had full confidence in the ability and patriotism of the Senate and House of Representatives to reach a conclusion without resorting to such an unheard of method as that just proposed. He did not believe that either Congress or the people would approve of or sustain it. It would be a bad precedent to establish, and he relied upon the good judgment of Congress to see that it should not be made. If the two houses had been left free to discuss and consider disputed questions, he believed that they were patriotic enough, and would be sufficiently just to decide righteously, and to say truly, if they found Mr. Hayes to be elected, that he should be President, or that, if Mr. Tilden had been chosen, he should be awarded the office. The new plan was against all precedent, and would create not only present delay, but future mischief, threatening as it did not only the immediate peace, but the very life of the nation. He saw no reason for believing that the two houses would have failed to concur if they had proceeded in the ordinary way.

Mr. JACKSON S. SCHULTZ said he had not formed a positive opinion about the proposed Electoral commission. He had just read Gov. Dix's letter in the TIMES, and he thought that that just about covered the whole subject. It seemed to him unnecessary to prolong the decision, and the proposed plan would delay a decision at the same time that it would assume to reach a conclusion in an irregular way that had already been provided for by precedent and the Constitution. It seemed to him, as a mere layman, that a conclusion on disputed points ought to be reached by the Senate and House of Representatives themselves in the ordinary way; then, if it appeared that there was a nonconcurrence, and it was desirable to settle, for instance, the question of the legal right of the Returning Board in Louisiana to canvass the vote of the State, he would suggest that, as a way of reaching a final decision, the Supreme Court should be asked to decide the matter of legality, and he had no doubt that the people would be perfectly satisfied with their decision. He did not think that the recent plan of Congress threw any light on the subject.

Mr. JAMES M. BROWN did not know very much about the bill, as he had not read it carefully, but his impression was that the plan proposed was a good one.

Mr. MARSHALL O. ROBERTS stated that, while he considered the Electoral College the proper tribunal to decide the question in dispute, he was in favor of any measure that would tend to promote harmony. He said that he knew the gentlemen named to act on the committee, and he considered them to be men of the highest integrity, in whom the fullest confidence might be placed. He had not thoroughly examined the bill, and was not, therefore, prepared to express any decided opinion in relation to it, but from his knowledge of the gentlemen who had the matter in charge, he felt disposed to concur in their judgment. He believed it was the interest of all parties in the country, and especially of capitalists, property-owners, and the business community generally, that the question at issue should be speedily and amicably settled. Until this was accomplished he did not believe that the business prospects of the country could possibly improve.

District Attorney PHELPS said that the bill, as far as he had had time to consider it, was objectionable in many respects. He was inclined to believe that the Constitution had wisely devolved upon the President of the Senate the duty and responsibility of examining and declaring the Electoral vote, and that both houses of Congress were excluded from any participation in that duty, for a very manifest reason. In case of a failure to elect in the Electoral College, the House of Representatives was to choose the President, and the Senate the Vice President, and for that reason, if for no other, they were wisely prevented from taking any part in the proceedings. No Congressman, Senator, or other officer of the United States could be an Elector, and the idea has been to carefully exclude all Federal office-holders from disturbing or controlling the vote of the people in any way. The fact that the President of the Senate had no direct interest in the result pointed him out as a proper man for the performance of this duty. If Congress had no power it could not be delegated; if it had, the Constitution contemplated that it should be exercised by Congress itself. Nor could he see with what propriety the Judges of the Supreme Court could be asked, or the court be required, to assume functions in nowise connected with their office, and discharge duties not belonging to themselves.

Gen. JOSEPH C. JACKSON said that while he had not had time to examine the plan thoroughly, he was of opinion that it was not the proper sort of thing in either a legal or political point of view. He was opposed to taking from the people the power which had been conferred upon them by the Constitution, and he thought that the proposed commission, if carried out, would be also likely to infringe on the rights of the States in the Senate. By section 133 of the Revised Statutes, based on the law of Jan. 23, 1843, it was laid down that "each State may by law provide for the filling of any vacancies which may occur in its College of Electors when such college meets to give its Electoral vote." Congress, our public men, and the people had all recognized the power of the States in this matter, and it was contrary to all law and precedent to place the privilege of determining who was and who was not an Elector in the hands of a joint commission specially created for the purpose. If the Democratic Party occupied the position of their opponents in the present case, there would not be such a thing as a joint commission heard of, but the votes of the States would be determined and counted by the Vice President, just as they were in the election of Washington eighty odd years ago. The selection of Judges of the Supreme Court for the position of arbiters was premature, irregular, and improper. It was making the Supreme Court a political instead of a judicial department of the Government, and would be as irregular as to give the same power to the legislative or executive branch. Under the Constitution the people had accepted the designation of the President of the Senate as the proper person to count the vote. It had to be counted by some authority, and as the gravity of the subject demanded a person of dignity and consideration, the President of the Senate, as the second officer in the Government and the next in succession to the President himself, had been selected. In that capacity he [the President of the Senate] acted not for the Senate or the House of Representatives, but for the States and the people. Having himself been elected by the people, or their representatives, in footing up and announcing the Electoral vote he acts as the mouth-piece of the people, and at the same time preserves the continuity of their sovereignty. The idea that the Senate and the House had alone the power to determine the vote, could hardly be reconciled with the law strictly prohibiting any Representative or Senator from being a Presidential Elector. The only proper and right way to settle the question was by law, and the law rightly construed made the President of the Senate the arbiter in this matter, just as it did in the first election held under the Constitution.

Mr. FLETCHER HARPER, Jr., while somewhat unprepared to give his views on the subject, did not hesitate to say that so far as he was acquainted with the scope of the proposed measure, he was opposed to it. He thought that the power of counting the Electoral vote rightly rested with the President of the Senate, and that the proposed Congressional Commission was uncalled for. He was aware that the power of the President of the Senate was a "constructive" one, but to his mind such a construction seemed clearer and more straightforward than the idea that the founders of the Republic intended the Presidency to be made a subject of wrangling between the two houses of Congress. That the plan was considered an advantageous one by the Democrats was evident from the fact that so large a majority of them favored it.

Mr. GEORGE ODYKE said that on the whole he thought the plan was the best that could be had. He believed that the Constitution and the laws under it fully authorized the President of the Senate to count the vote and decide which were regular and legal and which were not, and that in so doing the only doubtful State, Louisiana, should be counted for Hayes, which would elect him. Yet if this had been done in view of the conflicting testimony given regarding the election in that State, and inasmuch as the face of the vote returned gave a majority to Tilden, there were very many fair-minded men who would think there was too much doubt in regard to it, and it would in the future perhaps hurt the Republican Party. Of the two courses which had been suggested—that of ordering a new election, and the plan now proposed by the joint committee—the latter, in his opinion, was the better of the two.

Ex-Gov. SALOMON said: "I am in favor of it. The country is in a precarious condition, and the measure is wisely adapted to extricate it from further peril."

Mr. CHARLES A. PEABODY said, in substance, that on the whole he was inclined to think well of it. It required some sacrifice on the part of the Republican Party, but not a greater sacrifice than any party ought to be willing to make for the purpose of composing and settling public feeling. There might be worse measures. The danger now was not of a war; that was out of the question. But a novel method of deciding a Presidential contest might have a tendency to impair the value of Government bonds. There were some features in the bill that might be improved, but taking it all together it was probably as acceptable as any that could now be drawn.

Mr. JOHN JACOB ASTOR said: "I think the question involves legal considerations which I do not profess to understand. I am certainly strongly in favor of some settlement of the Electoral question on a legal and just basis, and have done all that I could in that direction. If the adoption of this report will effect a settlement in a legal, just, and practical manner, it will be a providential thing."

Mr. SAMUEL SLOAN said that he believed that the compromise, made in good faith by the representative men of the nation with such singular unanimity, would be acquiesced in and approved by the people.

Gen. JAMES H. VAN ALEN said: "If the question can be properly settled on the basis of the Congressional report, I should be very glad to have it so. I have not a shadow of doubt that the President of the Senate has the right to count the Electoral vote in the manner claimed by the Republican Party, but the good feature of the plan proposed by the Congressional report is that the defeated party must necessarily acquiesce in the issue, as both parties, by entering into the compact, have so bound themselves."

Gen. DANIEL E. SICKLES said: "I have not bestowed the attention on the project which its importance demands. It seems to me magnanimous, to say the least, on the part of those who maintain the authority of the President of the Senate as the proper officer to count the votes, when they give up that position, sustained by great weight of authority, and adopt a plan such as has been reported by the Joint Committee. The best thing that can be said of the present scheme is that it has been agreed upon by a Joint Committee of the two houses, embracing many leading men of opposite opinions. The refusal of Senator Morton to sign the report weakens the authority of the document, as he has given more attention to the subject in past years than any other member of the Senate. In my judgment, the scheme is open to serious objections from a constitutional point of view. I dislike the manner in which particular Judges of the Supreme Court are selected with reference to their supposed partisan preferences to decide a great political question. It might be well to provide by law a method by which either Mr. Tilden or Mr. Hayes could bring before the Supreme Court of the United States the question of his right to office after the votes had been counted and the result declared according to precedent. This would at least take away any pretext for a resort to violence, and would render unnecessary the proposed march of 100,000 Democratic office-seekers to Washington to inaugurate Mr. Tilden. It seems to me, in a word, a matter of surprise that so able a committee, having agreed upon a scheme open to so many objections, could not have matured a plan more consistent with time-honored precedents and the opinions of the leading statesmen of all parties since the origin of the Government."

Gen. ANSON G. MCCOOK believes that Gov. Hayes has been legally and equitably elected President, and has never for a moment permitted himself to doubt the power of the President of the Senate to open and count the votes, and to that extent determine the question. He thinks that the framers of the Constitution never intended that Congress should exercise any power over the count, and personally can see no necessity for the appointment of the committee. He did not believe that any agreements could be reached, and had entire confidence that our Representatives in Congress would determine the question properly, and that their action would be approved by the country.

Col. RUSH C. HAWKINS said that he thought the new bill was not a very great effort of statesmanship, and the method of counting the vote, which had so long been followed, had better be adhered to. When the framers of the Constitution were alive, they were in Congress and in the Senate at the time of the election of the first President, and had witnessed the working of the provisions of their own Constitution. Its language was sufficiently plain to admit of an easy interpretation. The original intention of the Constitution had undoubtedly been that the President of the Senate should open and count the votes. If it now became necessary to go behind the results of the Electoral vote as certified to from each State, the facts in relation to the election in Mississippi, North Carolina, and Alabama ought to be investigated, as he had no doubt that if the negroes in those States had been allowed to vote without intimidation those States would have given a large majority for the Republican candidates. The proposed bill he considered undignified, and in no way equal to the occasion which had called it forth, and he believed that it should not become a law.

Mr. DORMAN B. EATON said it had been his opinion that the President of the Senate had the authority to open, count, and declare the vote for President. It was plain enough that the Constitution did not provide distinctly who should count the vote. As a Judge, Mr. Eaton said he should hold that a counting and declaration of the present vote, by the President of the Senate, would be valid and binding. He could not, however, think that the matter was so free from doubt as to warrant the liberty of wholly rejecting the argument on the other side, and to disregard the great considerations of policy involved in the present crisis. Besides, under the power given in the Constitution to Congress to legislate for carrying into effect all the powers conferred upon any constitutional officer, it was not easy to say to what extent that body might regulate the manner of the exercise of the authority for counting. Besides the questions of constitutional construction which were involved, there were grave matters of expediency which no party could afford to overlook. The depression of business, the heat of passion, the disorganized condition of several of the Southern States, and the intense longing of the people for repose and prosperity which they thought political complications alone prevented, should admonish any party not to urge legal technicalities or express any authority which a large body of honest public sentiment was likely to challenge. That a count by the President of the Senate alone would be so challenged, if it did not bring the Republican Party into serious peril for the future, he had no doubt.

LETTERS ON THE SUBJECT.

To the Editor of the New-York Times:

In the current discussion of the Electoral law I have seen no due recognition of the wisdom of the fathers in trusting the result to the custody of a single high and responsible public functionary, rather than to the irresponsible majority of either or both houses of Congress. I have not overlooked your own able editorial, in which the point was taken as succinctly and forcibly as could be desired. But I beg leave to invoke emphasis and iteration for this important political principle, in view of the assumption that seems to pass of course with most of the organs of public opinion, that the intention of the framers of the Constitution to vest this important function in the Presidents of the Senate is doubtful, or more than doubtful, in spite of their language, from the imagined absurdity of such a choice, and that if they really intended and did such a thing, they made a mistake not to be sufficiently deplored or too speedily remedied.

It is indeed amazing that with our recent history, filled with usurpations and malfeasances of various kinds and grades of enormity, to which the privilege and impersonality of a legislative body have encouraged its members, our people should not have been reminded forcibly of the political virtue that lies in distinct personal responsibility (for prescribed acts) imposed on a single individual, and unshared with so much as a single colleague. It is a recognized axiom in every branch of human affairs, as old as human experience in each of them, that if entire responsibility thus fastened on one competent man cannot get a given duty done honestly, then there is no way upon earth to get it done.

Again, an illustration from the other side has recently impressed me very strongly. I refer to the extreme test just made of the integrity of the members of the Electoral College. I confess that my chief and very serious fear had been that among 185 Electors, many of them comparatively obscure, (and rather lightly selected, as the ineligibility of certain of them bears witness,) one or two might be found accessible to inducements to exercise a constitutional right, in disregard of the intention of their constituents, by voting for Tilden. There were not wanting either advisers or arguments of very high moral pretension for any such recreant to fall back on, in addition to the handsome fortune notoriously open to any one of the Hayes Electors who would cast a vote for Tilden. But it was impossible for any such Elector to perform the act without taking the undivided responsibility in the face and eyes of mankind, and no one could be found at once bad and bold, or weak and stupid, enough to place himself in such a position.

But how weak is the pressure of responsibility on an Elector (and that against an act which he would have a perfect legal right to perform) in comparison with that laid on the President of the Senate in ascertaining and declaring the Electoral vote this whole theory is completely lost sight of. The usurpation of the supremacy over the whole matter by the Legislative Department is tamely acquiesced in without a word of protest. Confiding the power of counting the votes to the President of the United States, a single individual, we can so made responsible, is entirely in accordance with the fundamental theory of our Government. As the Legislative is naturally the strongest of the three departments, its tendencies to encroach upon the functions of the other two ought to be steadily and firmly resisted. I, for one, therefore, hope that the views for which THE TIMES so eminently contends will prevail.

To the Editor of the New-York Times:

The Democratic Party of the present day should drop its name, and assume the name of the "Mexican Party," as more consistent with its principles and claims. The Chairman of the "mass convention" in Milwaukee, as reported in your columns to-day, said: "He believed the Republican leaders had formed a conspiracy to count in Hayes. He did not think an appeal to arms would be necessary on behalf of the people, as the Republicans would not dare to carry it out in the face of the protests of the people; but, if it became necessary, it was the duty of the people to arm."

This is true Mexican doctrine. It has been followed for many years there, and the Democrats seem to be so in love with that "God-forsaken" Republic that they want to place our Government upon the same basis. If their party is defeated by the people, what then? Why, intimidate and "bull-doze" the whole country; issue their pronunciamentoes and "appeal to arms." This is the Mexican style.

Let the Republican Party stand firm by the old, well-established constitutional mode of counting the Electoral vote, yielding nothing and compromising nothing to pacify lawless "bull-dozers," whether of high or low degree, and all will be well.

NEW-YORK, Friday, Jan. 19, 1877. A.

To the Editor of the New-York Times:

I am much interested in the counting of the Electoral vote, and there is one view of it which appears a vital one to me, and that is, as the Vice President is chosen under the Constitution by the people, and as his duty under that is to preside over the Senate and count the Electoral vote, can the House and Senate make a compromise that is binding on him? Can he not count the vote in spite of them, and say or tell them that it is his right, and that they must first change the Constitution before they can make their game work, and let the Supreme Court decide if that is not sound doctrine? Please give us your views. I think we will hear looking at. Only think, 100 years to choose a President, and now just discovered not right. What a long time to find it out!

MRS. S. HEATH.
BROOKLYN, Friday, Jan. 19, 1877.

To the Editor of the New-York Times:

Let me call your attention to the following extract from Congressional Debates, vol. 9, page 359:

"In Senate, Wednesday, Feb. 6, 1833.

Mr. Grundy, from the joint committee appointed to ascertain and report the mode of examining the votes for President and Vice President of the United States, reported a resolution, fixing on Wednesday next as the day for counting the votes, when the Senate will attend the House for the purpose of witnessing the examination of the votes. The hour appointed for the proceedings is 1 o'clock. The resolution was agreed to."

IMPRISONMENT FOR LIFE.

RONDOUT, Jan. 19.—The trial of William J. Conroy, for arson, which lasted four days, and has been very exciting, ended last evening, when the case went to the jury, which this afternoon rendered a verdict of guilty. Judge Westbrook sentenced Conroy to the Clinton Prison for life. There is an indictment for murder pending against Conroy and Silas Keyser, who was accessory in both cases. Keyser's trial will begin at once.

GLEANINGS FROM THE MAILS

THE EMPRESS OF INDIA.

THE DELHI ASSEMBLAGE—STATE ENTRY OF THE VICEROY—THE CHIEF HERALD—THE FLOWER OF THE NATIVE CAVALRY—ELEPHANTS GLITTERING WITH GOLD AND SILVER TRAPPINGS—AN INTERESTING INCIDENT.

Correspondence of the London Times.

The imperial assemblage began yesterday with the State entry of the Viceroy. Two o'clock was the time fixed for his arrival, but from early morning the roads were crowded with troops. The native chiefs and their followings were hastening to take up the positions allotted to them along the line of procession, and the spectators were trying to reach some point which gave a good view of the line of march. The route for the procession was from the railway station along the Queen's Road, the Lothian Road, the road from the Jumna Musjid, through Doriba and Chandnee Rowk street, then leaving the city to proceed by the Grand Trunk Road to the Ridge, and along the Ridge to the Flagstaff Tower, thence to the Camp. The greater Chiefs, with their retinues and elephants, lined the Ridge road. The Princes of Rajpootana were drawn up near the railway station. The view from the terraced roof of the Jumna Musjid for an hour before the procession passed was most striking. The space in front of the old Fort of Selimghur, between the fort and the Musjid, the plain, was crowded with spectators. The Musjid steps were closely packed with natives, whose variously-colored turbans and dresses gave the appearance of a gigantic bouquet of flowers. The road across the plain was lined on one side with artillery and on the other with native cavalry. Barely discernible in the distance the gorgeously caparisoned elephants and quaintly dressed troopers of the Rajpoot chiefs were grouped round the entrance of the station behind the narrow gate in the walls of the old Native City. At 2 o'clock precisely a royal salute from the fort announced the Viceroy's arrival. In half an hour later another salute told us the procession was beginning to move. A little longer and the head of the column came in sight, advancing up the road toward the Musjid. First came the Deputy Assistant Quartermaster-General, next the Eleventh Hussars, the A Battery of Horse Artillery, and a regiment of Bombay Cavalry, gay in blue and silver. Some staff officers followed, and then appeared a personage anxiously looked for by us all, I mean Major Barnes, the Chief Herald. The Imperial Assemblage selected him for that important post—so, at least, the Indian papers say—by reason of his being the biggest officer in the Army. What his exact height may be I know not, but sitting on horseback he did not seem greatly to surpass the ordinary stature. But if there be any deficiency in his inches his gorgeous dress made amply amends. To describe it properly would require a knowledge of heraldic nomenclature which I do not possess. Suffice it to say that so long as he remained in sight he was the cynosure of all eyes and the glory of the Viceroy. The native chiefs seemed pale and insipid beside him. In attendance on Major Barnes were his 12 trumpeters, six Europeans and six natives, mounted on fine gray horses and riding by threes, the Europeans and natives alternately like squares in a chessboard. Their dresses were on the same model as that of the Chief Herald, but, of course, far inferior in point of splendor, and the little peaked jockey-caps which the Europeans wore, must have made them supremely uncomfortable in the full blaze of an Indian sun.

Following the Chief Herald and trumpeters came a detachment of that splendid body of men, the Body Guard, the flower of the native cavalry, and immediately behind, seated in a glittering howdah on the back of a magnificent tusker elephant, appeared the Viceroy and Lady Lytton. A gilt umbrella was held over their heads, and an attendant seated behind waved off imaginary flies with a brush made of yak tail. This seems to be a necessary adjunct to all Oriental pomp, and though it may look well, it was hardly necessary yesterday. The viceregal elephant, as has been said, was a magnificent tusker, and he appeared to have a fair idea of his own importance. Instead of walking on quietly and steadily as a well-conducted elephant should, he would insist upon stopping every now and then and taking a look round. Nor could anything persuade him to move until he had satisfied his curiosity. The result was that every few minutes the "halt" had to be sounded, so as to preserve the line of procession unbroken. As the Viceroy passed Musjid he was received well but quietly by the natives. All seemed excited, but there was no cheering. This, however, is not to be wondered at. The natives are not given to express their feelings in our manner, and the silence of the crowd is not in itself any mark of disloyalty. The next elephant carried two little girls, daughters of the Viceroy. They seemed to enjoy the affair greatly, though I daresay they were very tired before the end of the three hours' ride. Behind them came the remainder of the body guard and a squadron of the Tenth Hussars; then the three Lieutenant Governors, each on an elephant, and each attended by his staff; next the members of the Council, the Secretaries to Government, and the Chief Justices of Bengal and the North-western Provinces; then solah tepees, looking singularly out of place in their judicial robes. Lastly, there came a number of native chiefs, their elephants painted with all the colors of the rainbow, and gleaming with gold and silver trappings. Their attendants, arrayed in fantastic dresses, formed a confused but picturesque group. The procession wound slowly through the tortuous streets of the native town, and converging from the city reached the ridge and turned toward the north, passing along a road lined by the elephants and retainers of the chiefs—Scindiah, Holkar, the Gaekwar, the Nizam of Mysore, and others. When it arrived at the flagstaff at the tower it turned sharply off to the left, and, descending from the ridge, advanced up the main street of the Viceroy's camp about 5 o'clock. A few minutes before sunset a royal salute, the third fired during the day, marked the arrival of the Viceregal cortège at the end of its journey.

I have just heard of an interesting incident which occurred yesterday at the railway station while the chiefs and officials were waiting for the Viceroy. The families of the Nizam and the Gaikwar, each of which is now represented by a boy, have been at deadly feud for more than a century. The feud, let us hope, was terminated yesterday, for Mr. Melvil, resident at Baroda, led up the young Gaikwar to the Nizam, and Sir Richard Meade introduced the boys to one another. The Nizam, as the elder, remained seated while the little Gaikwar stood up. They had a short talk, chiefly. I am told, about riding, and then parted on friendly terms. The incident will, perhaps, not lead to much, but it is remarkable as being, perhaps, the first occasion of a Nizam and a Gaikwar speaking to one another for a century and a half.

The Spectator, referring to the proclamation, says: "If there is one thought ever present in the mind of a native of India, no matter what his rank or what his creed, it is that the British reign over his continent is but a passing phenomenon, permitted by the Almighty for some good purpose, or entering for some inscrutable reason into the arrangements of irresistible Destiny, but no more to last than an eclipse, or a rainy season, or a time of unusual drought. It may last long! We despair of conveying to English readers how untrue in native ears that is. It has not lasted a century, and what is a century to men who believe their social system was born before Time was, and will prevail when Time is past; who recall Alexander's invasion as an incident in the narrative of an Indian dynasty; and discourse habitually of 'Eras' within which the European conception of human history would be lost, and the geologist would find with wonder space for his evolutions? What matters time to the Asiatic, who was as he is now when his English conqueror was a pirate of the North, or Sea? The English legions thunder past, but what is that to the breeding people which remembers the Solar Race as Englishmen do not remember the Saxon Kings who ruled them as it were yesterday? The legions do not actively oppress, and in the endless current of the calm river of Indian life—for we are speaking of thoughts deeper than the creeds—what matters that this sand-bank or that arises and disappears? The Ganges rolls on still, unimpeded, and almost unnoticing. When the invaders have done what they want to do, or when Indians are weary of them, or when the hour of Fate strikes, they will disappear, and the old divine order will recommence as if they had never been. But this Coronation roughly disturbs these dreams. These English, then, are not content with invading and taxing, and governing as they please? They are setting up a dynasty; they are demanding allegiance, instead of obedience; they are intending to rule forever, to become part of the holy system, to have their share—and an Englishman's share leaves little for his neighbor—in the whole future of the Sacred Land? The change in the native imagination of the British position will be enormous, and may be most disastrous for his reign."

THE GREAT NAPOLEON.

The Spectator, reviewing Mr. P. Lanfrey's work, The History of Napoleon I., says: "Lanfrey is a historian of a different stamp, and it is the animus which permeates his book, rather than any specifically false statement in it, which displeases us. Napoleon's crimes were so great, and his political blunders so gross, that an advocate, without being lynx-eyed, could not fail to draw up a formidable indictment against him. But it is a mistake, even from an artistic point of view, to paint the devil too black, and the tendency of recent writers to depreciate and disparage the intellectual side of Napoleon's character is a serious error. It was not entirely for evil, or for selfish ends, that for a quarter of a century he was 'the foremost man in all this world.' The interest which men take in his career would otherwise have died out long ere this. But the charm of his name still lingers round his battles, and even now men study the details of Marengo and Waterloo with more avidity than the details of Sadowa or Gravelotte. A similar charm, as is well known, rests on the campaigns of Hannibal, and we must look for something in the personal character of these two great captains to explain this charm. What that something is we have no space here to discuss; its existence is indisputable. Perhaps, in Napoleon's case, the key to the mystery may lie in the fact that although, as Wellington said, he sometimes acted as if he had no sense at all, he was one of the cleverest men who ever lived. Professional soldiers—Turennes, and Condés, and Montecuculis,—are often very dull dogs, and even such burning and shining lights as the great Duke of Marlborough and Wellington fade somewhat to the gaze when looked at away from the areas of their triumphs. But it is unjust to compare Napoleon as a professional soldier, with men who are nothing else. As an administrator and legislator he stands in the very highest rank; and if his insane scheme of universal conquest collapsed completely and miserably, yet the way in which he held his own, when the stars in their courses were fighting against him, is little short of the miraculous. That he had no one to thank but himself for the difficulties which proved too strong for him is true enough, but the adroit skill with which time after time he trampled upon those difficulties, and conjured the storm which his rashness had evoked, is really admirable. Perhaps, indeed, it is the element of wonder in his career, an element not wanting in the career of Hannibal also, which explains the fascination which that career still exercises over the imagination of mankind. Feats of intellect, when we understand, or think we understand, how they are done, soon cease to interest us. But the power of wonder never fails. It is from wonder, that if Shakespeare should appear again among us, we should all rise up, as Charles Lamb said we should, to do him reverence; it is to wonder that is due the imperishable interest which attaches to the checkered life, and more than checkered character, of Napoleon. The cause of his supreme influence in the heyday of his prosperity is very plain and simple. Men were drawn to him, as Goethe said, because under him they were sure of obtaining their object, just as actors attach themselves to a new manager of whom they think that he will assign to them new parts. Napoleon knew men and their weaknesses, and out of their weaknesses he drew his own strength. He met from his creatures and courtiers adulation more outrageous than any which tickled the ears of Tiberius or Caligula, but wherever the pen was not stopped or the mouth closed by his iron hand, there no word of abuse was too strong for him. The 'Modern Attila,' the 'Corsican Ogre,' the 'Incarnate Moloch'—these and similar amenities were poured upon him without stint or stay from the press and pulpit of England. A marked change followed hard, as we have seen, upon his fall, and for once in away the dead lion had the best of it."

A DISTRESSING ACCIDENT.

FALL OF A BRICK CORNICE FROM THE ROOF OF A TENEMENT-HOUSE—SIX CHILDREN SEVERELY INJURED—ALLEGED CULPABLE NEGLIGENCE OF THE LANDLORD.

While a group of little children were at play yesterday afternoon, in the yard adjoining Nos. 42 and 44 Delancey street, a brick cornice projecting from the roof of a rear tenement fell into the yard on the heads of the children, injuring four of them seriously and two slightly. The building, which, in common with the surrounding tenements, belongs to the estate of Joseph and John Brush, of Brooklyn, is an old three-story and basement brick structure, occupied by eight families, consisting of Germans and Irish. Its external appearance indicates an advanced state of dilapidation. Several persons living in the old house assert that the attention of Mr. Joseph Brush has been repeatedly called to the numerous signs of decay, which are plainly discernible, and particularly to the dangerous condition of the cornice under the "gather," but the landlord, it is alleged, made no effort to avert the impending danger. The yard has been a favorite play-ground for the younger children of families living in the front and rear houses, and yesterday afternoon an unusual number of the little ones, mostly girls, were romping there. Two of them, Ella Bernstein, aged 6 years, and Pauline Bernstein, 3½ years, were playing adjacent to the steps leading to the front entrance, while four others, Ella Taylor, aged 8; Julia Krumbach, aged 8; Annie Goldmas, aged 3, and William Rankin, aged 11, were engaged in shoveling snow near the area of the front basement. While the children were thus occupied, at 4:30 P. M. the tottering cornice gave way, the loosened bricks descending with crushing force on the heads and bodies of the children. The long noise of the crash in a moment attracted hundreds of persons to the scene of the accident, and the wildest excitement and grief prevailed among the alarmed parents of the little victims, several of whom were found prostrate under the débris, bleeding from numerous wounds. Mrs. Goldmas, who occupies a room of the second floor, found her daughter Annie suffering from severe bruises on the head and face. Pauline Bernstein and her sister Ella, of No. 153 Forsyth street, who had been on a visit to their aunt, Mrs. Goldmas, were found lying unconscious under a miniature pile of bricks and mortar. Pauline was bleeding profusely from a bad wound on the temple, another two inches long on the left side of the face, affecting the left eye, another on the top of the head, and a fourth, consisting of a fracture of the left hand near the wrist. The nature and extent of this poor little victim's injuries leave little room for hope of her ultimate recovery. Her sister Ella's forehead was found to be disfigured by a large gash, and her left hand was badly bruised. Ella Taylor had the right side of her temple lacerated rather severely, and received in addition two contusions on the back of the head, a slight cut over the left eye, and bad bruises on the arms and hands. Julia Krumbach, whose parents occupy apartments in the rear house, was discovered by her mother lying almost completely hidden under the fallen bricks, unconscious from wounds on the head. Her injuries are extremely dangerous, one wound on the back of her head having penetrated through the scalp and slightly affected the occipital bone. William Rankin, whose parents also reside in the rear house, was struck on the arms by several bricks, but his injuries are, fortunately, very slight.

The little sufferers were, immediately after the accident, borne in the arms of men and women to a neighboring drug store, and thence to the Eldridge Street Police Station, where they were all attended by Police Surgeon Samuel K. Lyon, after which they were taken home and cared for by their parents and friends. It is to be feared that two of the children, Pauline Bernstein and Julia Krumbach, will not survive their injuries, which are undoubtedly very serious. Inquiries made last night at the residences of the other children elicited the information that they were doing well. The people living in the vicinity of the accident were loud in their denunciation of the owners of the building for their neglect to remove the old cornice and substitute a new one. The Police of the Tenth Precinct investigated the affair last evening, and notified the Department of Buildings of the circumstances.

LOSSES BY FIRE.

The engine-house at the head of No. 8 Plane, on the Pennsylvania Coal Company's Gravity Railroad, about seven miles above Scranton, in the Moosic Mountains, was totally destroyed by fire at 12 o'clock yesterday noon. It is reported that a young man named Donnelly, who has been in the habit of loitering about and sleeping in the engine-house, was burned to death, as he was seen in the building as late as 10 o'clock. No definite clue to the origin of the fire can be ascertained, and many rumors were afloat on Thursday regarding it. The Gravity Railroad is the only outlet for shipping the company's coal from the Wyoming and Lackawanna regions. The company's mine at Pittston and elsewhere will be thrown idle for some time in consequence of the fire. The loss is estimated at as much as possible at $15,000, taking into consideration the various contingencies incident to the fire.

About 1 o'clock yesterday morning a fire broke out in the town of Prescott, Ark., which destroyed a row of wooden buildings occupied by business firms. The loss will probably amount to $17,000, on which there is little insurance. Among the merchants burnt out are Stephen Cantley, William Herman, R. J. Barnes, Cams Cassidy, Rapp, Simmons, Jenkins, and a branch house of Probst & Hill, of Little Rock. A defective flue is supposed to have caused the fire.

The house of S. Clark Lum, in Union Township, N. J., was totally destroyed by fire at 3 o'clock yesterday morning. The family escaped, but little of the furniture was saved. The origin of the fire is unknown. The loss is $6,000; insured in Mutual of Newark for $2,000, and in the Elizabeth Mutual for $1,500. The fire was discovered by a sleighing party, who rescued the family.

The German Protestant Orphan Asylum, situated 10 miles from St. Louis, was burned on Thursday night. All the children were safely taken from the building excepting Eugene Long, 6 years old, who perished in the flames. Loss unknown; insurance, $18,000.

THE ASHTABULA DISASTER.

ASHTABULA, Jan. 19.—The funeral services of the unidentified dead took place to-day. Nineteen bodies were lowered into the grave at Chestnut Grove Cemetery. General funeral services were held in the Methodist Episcopal Church at 12:30 P. M., and at St. Peter's, Episcopal, at 2 P. M. The clergy of Ashtabula, assisted by two ministers from Cleveland, held joint services with the Masonic Order at the grave. Three bodies still remain in the vault, in the hope that friends may yet be able to identify them by pieces of cloth troubles in 1856, and said that the blood shed in Kansas gave rise to a Republican State now able to defend itself, and he hoped that the blood of the poor negroes shed in the South would enable that race to defend itself. The Democrats wanted to make a Returning Board out of the Senate and House of Representatives to trample down the rights of the people of Louisiana and give effect to the violence and tumult which prevailed in that State during the canvass.

Mr. BOGY again quoted from the laws of Louisiana, and denied that the Returning Board had acted according to law. The laws of the State required that evidence of violence at an election must accompany the returns or be filed within 24 hours after the close of the polls. No such evidence did accompany the returns or was so filed in Louisiana. The laws of the State provided that the Returning Board should have no jurisdiction unless the evidence accompanied the returns of the election or was filed within 24 hours. All the testimony before that board was gotten up in New-Orleans several days after the election. He was not aware that he was abusing his privileges as a Senator by calling Packard infamous. Any man who by force and fraud attempts to impose himself upon the people of a State as Governor was infamous.

Mr. MORTON, of Indiana, said he regretted to hear the Senator from Missouri [Mr. Bogy] speak as he did about Gov. Packard. He [Mr. Morton] was not under any obligations to Gov. Packard, but he was somewhat familiar with Louisiana affairs, and he had never heard him spoken of as a man of bad character, either as a politician, in society, or in business. Among the jobs heard of in Louisiana during the past five years Mr. Packard was never mentioned as being interested in any of them. He spoke as being well acquainted with the facts relative to the massacres at Mechanics' Institute, Coushatta Parish, and other places, and argued that violence and intimidation had prevailed in Louisiana for years.

Mr. WINSLOW, of Minnesota, pending the discussion, made a report from the Conference Committee on the bill making an appropriation to supply certain deficiencies in the contingent fund of the House of Representatives, which was agreed to. The report as agreed upon appropriates $40,000 for the transportation of Government notes, bonds, &c.; $24,000 for the investigating committees of the House of Representatives, and $25,000 for the investigations now being conducted by the Committee on Privileges and Elections of the Senate.

The Senate then went into executive session, and when the doors were re-opened at 4:30 P. M., adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

A number of petitions were presented asking for an amendment to the Constitution prohibiting the several States from disfranchising citizens on account of sex, and were referred to the Judiciary Committee.

DISCHARGE OF MR. ORTON.

Mr. HUNTON, of Virginia, from the Judiciary Committee, reported a resolution discharging William Orton, President of the Western Union Telegraph Company, from the custody of the Sergeant at Arms. The report accompanying the resolution declares that at the time of his subpœna William Orton was in too ill health to proceed to Louisiana, and further, that he has not had in his possession the telegrams demanded of him. The resolution was adopted.

LOUISIANA.

Mr. ELLIS, of Louisiana, offered a resolution calling on the President for information in regard to the rival governments in Louisiana. Referred.

Mr. LYNDE, of Wisconsin, said that the Sergeant at Arms had in his custody two of the members of the Louisiana Returning Board—J. Madison Wells and Thomas C. Anderson—and asked that they be brought before the House to answer to charges for the contempt of the privileges of the House in refusing to appear and testify before the Committee on Louisiana Affairs and produce certain papers demanded of them.

The Sergeant at Arms having appeared at the bar of the House with the two recusant witnesses, the Speaker propounded to them the usual question.

The witnesses, in reply, requested the indulgence of the House until the two remaining members of the board should have arrived at Washington.

Mr. LYNDE offered a resolution, which was adopted, referring the matter to the Judiciary Committee.

THE CONTINGENT FUND BILL.

Mr. FOSTER, of Ohio, submitted the report of the Conference Committee on the bill to supply the deficiency in the contingent fund of the House. It was agreed to.

PERMITTED TO RECEIVE DECORATION.

A bill was passed permitting Capt. Temple and Lieut. Commander Whiting, of the Navy, to receive a decoration from King Kalakaua—yeas 112, nays 106.

THE LEGISLATIVE APPROPRIATION.

Mr. HOLMAN, of Indiana, from the Appropriation Committee, reported the Legislative, Executive, and Judicial Appropriation bill. It was made the special order for Tuesday next.

The House then, at 4:30 P. M., adjourned till to-morrow.

A PANTHER KILLED IN OHIO.

The Sandusky (Ohio) Register says: "For some time past the people who live in the vicinity of what is known as the Plymouth Prairie, in New-Haven Township, Huron County, have been much exercised over the depredations of a ravenous wild animal, the species of which could not be determined until last Friday, when the animal was killed, and it was ascertained that it was a panther. For a number of days the farmers in that vicinity were in nightly fear of the beast. It went to their sheep-pens and barn-yards under cover of the darkness, and frequently killed between 40 and 50 sheep in a night. At last its depredations assumed such proportions and became so wide-spread in that section of the country, that 200 men started out each day in various directions to hunt for the animal. Several of the hunters caught glimpses of the beast on different days, and some of the men shot at it, but without effect. On day dog that was with one of the parties encountered the beast and a fight ensued, but it was of short duration, as the panther soon overpowered the dog and tore the latter's lower jaw completely off, besides badly using the poor dog up in other ways. The panther's master witnessed the fight with the dog, before the hunters reached the scene. But the beast met its fate at last, on Friday, as stated above. It is now thought that there is still another panther thereabouts—probably the mate of the one that was killed. There are various conjectures as to where the animal that has been shot came from, but the most reasonable one is that it escaped from some traveling menagerie. A couple of years ago two large bears were killed in Huron County, but it is easier to account for the appearance of the bears there than to tell with any degree of accuracy how the panther got into that section of country."

ARREST OF A SWINDLING WOMAN.

The Philadelphia Press of Friday says: "A Russian woman named Antonette Kohn, residing at No. 134 East Cumberland street, was arrested by Special Detective Charles Miller last evening on the charge of obtaining money on false representations. Her plan of operating was to visit a family, and inform the gentleman of the house that she had a fortune of $100,000,000 coming to her from a relative in Russia, she would, after securing the confidence of the gentleman, borrow money from him on the promise to give him a share of the $100,000,000 when it arrived. She further stated that she was the widow of the late Gen. Von Schletonkein, and that her maiden name was Gravestechie. Peter Matthews, a well-to-do butcher residing on Front street, below Fifth, listened to her story and was induced to loan her $1,600, for which she gave him a bond indemnity, in case an accident should befall her. From other persons she obtained from $80 to $2,000 by her shrewdness. It was also asserted, could some through the Russian Consul in New-York. Mr. Miller telegraphed to the official named, and received an answer to the effect that he was not acquainted with the woman. To one of her victims she said that she was in communication with the Emperor of Russia, who had promised to see that her money was returned to her within a specified time. Further inquiries by the detective discovered the fact that she had been carrying on this swindling business for a period of three years with remarkable success, as the people she dealt with had implicit faith in her statement. It is believed that within this time she collected thousands of dollars. She admitted that she was in 'business' in New-York City, but what that 'business' was she declined to say."

A NORTH CAROLINA VIEW.

From the Raleigh (N. C.) Observer, Jan. 16.

Some time since a distinguished citizen of North Carolina was in New-York, and, in conversation with a somewhat pompous bank officer, the latter asked him if North Carolina would pay her State debt.

"Yes," was the reply, "she is able to pay it, and she is going to do it."

"What!" said the bank officer, "will she pay the whole debt, old and new, at par!"

"Yes," replied the North Carolinian.

"How!" asked the bank officer.

"She will pay it," was the reply, "in negroes valued at $1,000 each."

"Ah! but we have freed your negroes," was the response of the banker.

"But," retorted the North Carolinian, "we have got your money for our bonds."

Some people think this is about the only way in which our State debt will be paid.

THE PHILADELPHIA COAL TRADE.

The Pottsville (Penn.) Miners' Journal supplies the statistics of the week as follows: "The quantity of coal sent from the Schuylkill region for the week ending Jan. 13 was 60,217 tons, against 5,466 tons for the same week of last year; increase, 54,751 tons. The quantity sent for the year was 388,317 tons, against 267,996 tons for the corresponding period of last year; increase, 110,219 tons. The quantity sent from all the regions for the week was: Anthracite, 245,320 tons; bituminous, 42,708 tons; total, 288,028 tons; against 212,989 tons anthracite and 28,073 tons bituminous—total, 241,026 tons—for the same week of last year; increase of anthracite, 32,331 tons; increase of bituminous, 14,671 tons; total increase, 47,002 tons. The quantity sent from all the regions for the year was: Anthracite, 1,045,659 tons; bituminous, 109,625 tons; total, 1,148,284 tons; against 1,048,885 tons anthracite and 96,870 tons bituminous—total, 1,145,755 tons—for the corresponding period of last year. Decrease of anthracite, 3,198 tons; increase of bituminous, 5,755 tons."

LAW REPORTS.

WILLIAM R. MARTIN'S FEES.

HE SUES THE WINDSOR HOTEL COMPANY TO RECOVER $60,000 FOR PROFESSIONAL SERVICES—THE CHARGES CLAIMED TO BE EXORBITANT—ALLEGED OPINION OF THE PLAINTIFF CONCERNING LAWYERS.

An interesting case, in which Park Commissioner William R. Martin figures as an applicant for counsel fees, was brought up and argued before Judge Donohue, in Supreme Court, Chambers, yesterday. The suit referred to is brought by Mr. Martin against the Windsor Hotel Company to recover $54,200 for professional services, from September, 1873, to the latter part of 1875, alleged to have been performed at the request of John T. Daly, the President of the Hotel Company, for the company itself. The complaint of the plaintiff sets forth that John T. Daly sold to the company the lease of the Windsor Hotel, the building having been erected by Daly under a long lease of the ground from its owners. Mr. Martin alleges that Daly was the President and Treasurer of the company, and also the owner of its whole stock. When the transfer of the property was made by Daly to the company, Mr. Martin says there were liens of all kinds on it, comprising liens, taxes, arrears of rent, &c., aggregating $600,000. Some of these claims, he asserts, were then being strongly pressed. This was in September, 1873. Mr. Martin says he was employed generally, and earned $60,000. He received only $5,900, thus leaving due to him $54,200. The company, in answer, denies that Daly owned all its stock, and charges that Mr. Martin's fees are exorbitant. It also alleges that Mr. Martin was not employed by the company at all, and that the $5,800 paid him was all his services were worth. Daly himself makes affidavit that Mr. Martin's employment was for him personally; that he employed Mr. Martin for the services referred to, and paid the latter $3,800 in addition to the $5,800 mentioned, making $9,600 in all. He then goes on to aver that he "has received a message from the said plaintiff that there was no use of contesting his claim in this action, that it would be referred by the court to a lawyer, and that lawyers would never go back on each other."

The case came up on a motion by the plaintiff for a reference on the ground that the trial of the case involved the examination of a long account. The defendant's counsel stoutly opposed the motion on the ground that such an exorbitant bill should go before a jury and before the public as well. Judge Donohue reserved his decision on the motion.

The items of the bill of Mr. Martin were read out in court, and produced considerable laughter, especially the $20,000 fee. There was a reluctance manifested by counsel to give the items to the reporter, but as well as they could be taken, while being read, they are as follows, the mistakes, if any, being only in the names of the parties, and not in the amounts of the charges:

Suit of John T. Daly against W. H. Weimore, $500; assignment of lease of Daly to Windsor Hotel Company, $1,000; organization of Windsor Hotel Company, $1,000; suit of Zelecke against Daly, $500; Potter and Sprague, $500; Potter and Sprague, $500; petition for bankruptcy, $1,000; Mandeville and Tighe, similar petition, $1,000; two suits, fees in each, $100 —$200; Peter Sackett and others, three foreclosures, $3,000; foreclosure, each mortgage being for $5,500, and the fee in each being $500. $2,000; foreclosure, $5,000 mortgage, $500; five suits, $2,300.

In the above suits Daly himself was concerned. In the following the Hotel Company figures:

Windsor Hotel Company against Hawk, $500; Windsor Hotel Company against ——, $1,000; in arbitration matter, $5,000; in the matter of mortgages to Sauer, Taylor & Day, $15,000; for general counsel fee and services in saving the property to the defendant, $20,000.

UNITED STATES CIRCUIT COURT.

ADOPTION OF RULES IN RELATION TO CASES IN BANKRUPTCY — TO TAKE EFFECT FROM 1ST OF FEBRUARY.

The following rules in relation to cases in bankruptcy have been adopted by the United States Circuit Court, to take effect on the 1st of February:

1. Notice of an intended application to the Circuit Court for the exercise of a general superintendence and jurisdiction conferred by section 4986, of the Revised Statutes of the United States, must be given within 10 days after the entry in the District Court of the order complained of, by filing such notice in the Clerk's office of that court, and serving the same on the adverse party. The application must be made within 30 days after the entry of such order, or within such further time as may be allowed by an order of the District Judge filed within said 30 days in the Clerk's office of that court. An application cannot be made at a later date.

2. Except where special provision is otherwise made by statute, or where the aggrieved party proceeds by bill in equity, the application must be by petition filed in the office of the Clerk of the Circuit Court and verified by oath. The petition must designate the order complained of, and set forth the facts of the case, so far as may be necessary to show the errors, either in fact or in law, alleged to have occurred in the District Court, and must point out such errors specially and the relief sought therefor.

3. The petitioner must, within five days after filing the petition, procure from the Clerk of the Circuit Court a certificate of the filing of such petition, designating the order therein complained of by its date, and the same in the office of the Clerk of the District Court.

4. Within 10 days after filing the petition the petitioner must serve a copy thereof on the adverse party, who may file an answer thereto, verified by oath, within 10 days after such service, and must in that case serve a copy of the answer on the petitioner within the further period of 10 days. The petitioner may within 10 days thereafter file a reply to the answer, and serve a copy thereof on the adverse party. The Clerk may at once extend either of these periods by order made before its expiration.

5. No application will be heard upon these papers only, unless the court shall, of its own motion, otherwise direct. As soon as the case is disposed of the Clerk of the Circuit Court must certify the order to the District Court.

EIGHT YEARS IN STATE PRISON.

Jacob W. Pickels, the German tinsmith, who, it will be remembered, shot and seriously wounded his wife Mary, on the evening of the 27th of December, was placed on trial before Judge Gildersleeve yesterday, in Part I. of the Court of General Sessions. Pickels had been married to his wife, a young lady of attractive appearance, about four years, but having failed to support her, had been driven from her mother's house, where they resided since the marriage, and went to live at No. 439 West Fifty-sixth street. On the evening of the 27th of December Mrs. Pickels met her husband, who had been confined in the hospital for some months, by appointment, at the corner of Forty-ninth street and Fifth avenue, and he invited her to accompany him for a walk. She consented, and they walked to Seventh avenue, talking pleasantly about their affairs. On reaching Thirty-second street, which was but dimly lighted, Pickels asked me wife to go that way. She objected to going, fearing, apparently, that he had not proceeded far when Pickels, without a word of explanation, drew a revolver, and pointing it at his wife's head, fired, the ball taking effect in her right cheek, inflicting a wound which disfigures her for life. After the shot, Pickels ran off, but subsequently surrendered himself to the Police authorities. Pickels had threatened to take his wife's life on a previous occasion, and it came out in the course of the trial that his father had committed suicide with a pistol. The prisoner, on his own behalf, swore that he had been confined to the hospital for nine months from hemorrhage of the lungs, and had purchased the pistol in order to take his life rather than endure a repetition of the pain. On the night in question he was in the act of revealing his intention to the wife, when the pistol accidentally went off and shot her. The summing-up argument of Assistant District Attorney Rollins convinced the jury that Pickels fully intended to shoot his wife, and they returned a verdict of guilty, with a recommendation to mercy. Judge Gildersleeve sentenced the prisoner to eight years in State Prison.

INDICTED SAILORS' BOARDING-HOUSE KEEPERS.

Capt. Murray and the officers of the Fourth Precinct brought to the Court of General Sessions yesterday ten keepers of sailors' boarding-houses, who had been arrested on bench warrants by the Captain for not taking out licenses. The names of the prisoners, who all kept sailors' boarding-houses along Water street, are as follows: George W. Elliott, Benjamin C. Craig, Mary Churchill, Catharine Heffernan, Margaret Loftus, Charles M. Lawrence, Henry Sheppard, Charles H. Smith, John C. Wallace, and Alfred V. Pearsall. Sheppard, who kept a place at No. 388 Water street, pleaded guilty, and Judge Gildersleeve sentenced him to three months in the Penitentiary. The others pleaded not guilty, and were held in $500 bail each, to appear for trial. They expressed the wish to pay their license fees at once, but Assistant District Attorney Rollins said that they should be taught not to trifle with the law. He will bring the cases to trial at once.

THE RETORT COURTEOUS.

An instance of the necessity of caution by lawyers in their diatribes against opposing counsel is afforded by an incident which took place before Judge McAdam, in Marine Court, Chambers, yesterday, on the hearing of a motion to dismiss the proceedings in the case of Sanborn against Ross, upon the return of an order for the defendant's examination as a witness before trial. The defendant's counsel made the motion to dismiss on the ground that no notice of the examination had been served on him as required by the statute. A dispute then arose as to whether the notice had been served or not. John L. Lindsay, to sustain his motion, produced the papers served on him and the duplicate served on his client, to which no notices were attached. The plaintiff's attorney, William G. Peckham, then charged Mr. Lindsay with tampering with the papers served upon the defendant, and said that Lindsay had previously been guilty of such tricks. Mr. Lindsay, then gave Mr. Peckham the retort courteous by calling the latter a liar. Judge McAdam called the attorneys to order and administered a severe rebuke to them, after which he directed them to appear before him at a later hour, after they had had time to cool their mutual wrath, when he would investigate the charge. At the later hour an investigation was had, and witnesses were examined orally. Upon their examination it appeared that the charge of tampering with the papers was unfounded. Judge McAdam, on ascertaining this, dismissed the plaintiff's proceedings, and ordered Mr. Peckham to pay $10, the costs of the motion, personally.

THE FERRY-TICKET CONSPIRACY.

CONVICTION OF THE ACCUSED EMPLOYES—A PERFECT SYSTEM OF DETECTING DISHONESTY.

The trial of Jacob A. Van Volckenberg and George W. West, ferry-master and ticket collector at the Cortlandt Street Ferry, charged with a conspiracy to defraud the Pennsylvania Railroad Company, ended yesterday in the conviction of the prisoners. The jury came into court at 10:40 A. M. yesterday, and returned a verdict of guilty, with a recommendation to mercy. Mr. Mott, counsel for the prisoners, moved in arrest of judgment. Mr. Charles W. Brooke, counsel for the Pennsylvania Railroad Company, opposed the motion, and it was denied by Judge Sutherland.

Mr. Brooke, addressing the court, said that he had been instructed by the officers of the company, who in this case had represented the people, to state that they did not wish to press for the severe punishment of the prisoners. They were satisfied that public justice had been amply satisfied by the conviction of the accused, and therefore asked his Honor to show as much leniency in his sentence as his duty would permit. Judge Sutherland said there was no evidence to show that the prisoners had been the originators of the conspiracy to defraud the company; they had probably only joined in it at the suggestion of others. In view of the recommendation of the jury and the generous request of Mr. Brooke, on behalf of the company, he would not inflict the full penalty prescribed by law. His Honor then sentenced each of the prisoners to three months' imprisonment in the Penitentiary, and to pay a fine of $100, and stand committed until paid, for a period not exceeding 100 days.

The conviction of Van Volckenberg is looked upon as one of very great importance by ferry and railroad companies, and other large corporations whose revenues are intrusted to the care of employes, and a short history of the case will be read with interest. The trial occupied 12 days in hearing before Judge Sutherland, and attracted considerable attention, owing to the nature and extent of the conspiracy to cheat the company which existed all through the ranks of its employes. Under the former management of the Jersey City ferries it was a well-known fact that ferry-masters and other employes grew rapidly rich on salaries not exceeding $70 per month, and lived in luxury, many of them owning considerable real estate and other property. One of them, indeed, is known to have left a fortune of $200,000 at his death, although the highest month's salary he was ever known to have received was $68 and some cents. Others purchased handsome brown-stone mansions, and lived in much better style than the stockholders of the ferry could. Finally the ferries between this City and Jersey City were leased to the Pennsylvania Railroad Company, and Mr. Henry W. Gwinner, Auditor of the passenger receipts department, became convinced that the company was being defrauded out of between $60,000 and $70,000 per annum on three-cent ferry fares alone, and took immediate steps to prevent it. The result of Mr. Gwinner's attention to the subject was the invention of a system of issuing to and collecting from every person passing through the ferries a ticket which became a check on dishonest officials. This system went into operation at all the ferries leased by the company on the 1st of April, 1875, and so perfectly and unerringly did it work that before many days the company began to reap the benefits. As soon, however as the ferry-masters saw that their sources of enrichment were gone, they began to look around for some means of counteracting the effective system introduced by Mr. Gwinner. They entered into combination with the ticket collectors, by the terms of which the collectors retained a number of the tickets which they should have deposited in their boxes, and sent them back to the ferry-masters, who resold them, the proceeds being divided between the conspirators. In this way as many as 400 tickets would be fraudulently disposed of in one single eight-hour tour of duty, and the system of fraud became so perfect and extensive that the honest and dishonest employes were known by their distinctive titles. Fortunately, however, Mr. Gwinner discovered the conspiracy, and instituted proceedings which resulted in the arrest and indictment of Van Volckenberg, West, and others. The prosecution of these parties paralyzed the conspiracy, and the returns since show that the stealings from the company must have exceeded $200,000 per year. The trial of the former discovered was conducted by Mr. Brooke, and the verdict of the jury was only arrived at after long and careful consideration. The conviction of the accused establishes the fact that the days of dishonest ticket issuers and collectors are numbered, the system introduced by the Pennsylvania Railroad having proved in the hands of the suspected officials, an unerring detective of their frauds.

HOW FITZ SAYS HE WAS TAKEN IN.

HIS SUIT AGAINST THE FISHKILL NATIONAL BANK AND OTHERS—A RELIC OF THE DEFAULTER BARTOW.

An interesting reminder of Bartow, the defaulting Cashier of the Fishkill National Bank, was afforded yesterday in the case of Charles Fitz against Thomas N. Avery, Charles Rogers, and the Fishkill National Bank, which came up before Judge Donohue, in the Supreme Court. The complaint sets forth that Avery, by falsely representing the value of a patent for making paper bags and the machinery used in the manufacture, sold to the plaintiff such patent and machinery for $16,200. Of this amount Fitz paid $11,200 in cash and gave his notes, indorsed by Rogers, for the remaining $5,000. The notes were made payable on Feb. 4, 1877, and were discounted by the Fishkill Bank. The plaintiff seeks to restrain the bank, and Avery, from taking any proceedings in regard to the notes. He charges that the bank was fully informed of the fraudulent nature of the transaction between Avery and himself. The matter came up before Judge Donohue, in Chambers, yesterday, on a motion by the bank to vacate the preliminary injunction so far as it is concerned. In support of this application, an affidavit made by a Mr. Rapelje was read. This gentleman avers that he is the Vice President and acting Cashier of the bank, and that to the best of his belief the discounting of the notes was a regular business transaction on which the bank advanced full value. The plaintiff's counsel asked that the motion should be dismissed, or else that no reference to be ordered. He said that Mr. Rapelje had been Cashier of the bank only for a week or two, having been appointed in the place of Bartow, the defaulting Cashier. The gist of the action, the counsel said, was that Avery and Bartow had acted in collusion in the matter, and that at the time of the discounting Avery had overdrawn his account to the amount of $8,000. The plaintiff's counsel claimed that the notes were put in to the credit of Avery's account. No new consideration, the counsel claimed, had been given. Judge Donohue said it seemed to him that Mr. Rapelje's affidavit was not made in absolute good faith. On the face of it, without explanation, it would appear as though Mr. Rapelje was the Cashier at the time of the discounting. It appeared now that he was not, and was speaking rather from information than from knowledge. A reference, said the court, will be ordered.

A MILITIA MAN'S GRIEVANCES.

The cases of Perault against Turner and Perault against Rand were argued before the Supreme Court, General Term, yesterday, the decision being reserved. The plaintiff was a member of Company F, of the Seventh Regiment, National Guard, for six years, and was expelled in April, 1873. The expulsion was set aside in September, 1876, on the ground that the Captain of the company did not preside at the court-martial. Perault then sought to compel the Colonel of the Seventh Regiment to give him an honorable discharge, on the ground of his having performed seven years of militia service. This the Colonel refused to do, and Judge Barrett refused Perault's application to compel him to act in the desired way. A new court-martial was, however, about to be had in Perault's case, but he sought by injunction to restrain the action of the court-martial. This application was also denied. Perault now appeals to the Supreme Court, General Term, from the orders denying this latter application, as well as the one by which he sought to compel the certification of his term of service.

SUIT FOR A $75,000 FARM.

A rather complicated law-suit came up for hearing yesterday before Justice Pratt, in the Supreme Court, Circuit, Brooklyn. The parties to the litigation are Isaac Hall, of New-York; Susannah A. Schenck, and John Henry Schenck, of Kansas, against Thomas Hall and Julia W. Hall, of Boston, impleaded with Helen Hall, of New-York, and others. The suit is for partition, and involves 150 acres of land in Newtown, adjoining Calvary Cemetery, valued in all at $75,000. William Hall, farmer, of Newtown, died on July 26, 1861, leaving a last will by which he devised the property to the children of his sister, Cerissa Spaulding, subject to a life estate of said Cerissa, who died in 1874. The children of Thomas Hall, the deceased brother of the testator, claim that the devise is void, because at the testator's death the children of Cerissa were aliens, and by the statutes of New-York disqualified from taking land by devise. The children of Thomas Hall claim in the suit that the land descended to the heirs at law of the testator, who were his sister Cerissa Spaulding, his brother Isaac Hall, and the children of his deceased brother, Thomas Hall. After the death of the testator, the children of Cerissa became naturalized citizens, and took their mother's share at her death. Isaac was already dead, leaving no heirs, and his one-third descended to Cerissa and the children of Thomas. The Halls claim in the action that they are entitled to one-half of the fifty acres, and that the Spauldings are entitled to the other half as heirs, and that the Spauldings cannot take under the void devise. Justice Pratt directed a verdict for the plaintiffs and in favor of partition, as prayed for in the complaint, and reserved the question of a motion for a new trial.

UNITED STATES SUPREME COURT.

WASHINGTON, Jan. 19.—The following cases were argued in the Supreme Court of the United States yesterday:

No. 166—The Consolidated Fruit Jar Company vs. Wright.—Appeal from the Circuit Court for the Southern District of New-York.—This is an action for an infringement of a patent, of which the company is the assignee, for an improvement in fruit jars. The object of the invention is set forth to be the preservation of fruit and other substances by means of rubber rings or gasket, employed in making air-tight joints without exposing the rubber to the contents of the jar. The court below decided that the patent, obtained by one Mason, was void because of an abandonment before application, if it was made, nine years having elapsed between the invention and the application, and it appearing that he had himself put into public use articles containing the invention in the meantime. It is here insisted that the delay in obtaining the patent was the fault of his attorney and not his own, and that therefore Mason is excused for the laches, and the patent is valid. It is also insisted that mere delay will not invalidate a patent subsequently obtained. J. H. B. Latrobe for the company; George Gifford for Wright.

City of Omaha vs. Hammond.—Error to the Circuit Court for the District of Nebraska.—This was an action on contract for the construction of two wells for the city. The defense was that the work was not done according to contract. To this reply was put in that the Engineer of the City superintended the work, and the city, upon their completion, used the wells, and that this constituted a waiver of the defense set up. The court so held and gave judgment for the contractor. The point made by the writ is that the city was entitled to have the jury charged that if the work was not done according to the terms of the contract as proved before them there could be no recovery—which was refused. The case was submitted upon the printed argument of Mr. A. Strickland and Mr. Thurston for plaintiff in error; W. J. Connell and E. Wakely for defendant.

The following were the proceedings of the Court to-day:

No. 948.—Peter Melendy et al. plaintiff in error, vs. Wells S. Rice.—This cause was submitted on printed arguments by Mr. George S. Wright, of counsel for plaintiff in error, and by Mr. Thomas J. Henderson, for defendant in error, under the twentieth rule.

No. 910.—Peter Doyle, Secretary of State of Wisconsin, appellant, vs. The Continental Insurance Company of New-York.—This cause was submitted on printed arguments by Joseph Casey, of counsel for the appellant, and by William Allen Butler, R. J. Stevens, and Mr. J. C. Sloan, for the appellee, under the twentieth rule.

No. 643.—George Chorpenning, appellant, vs. The United States.—This case was submitted on printed arguments by Mr. Joseph Casey, of counsel for the appellant, and by Mr. Solicitor General Phillips, for the appellee, under the twentieth rule.

No. 958.—Hiram Barney, plaintiff in error, vs. The City of Kockuk et al.—This cause was submitted on printed arguments by George W. McCrary, of counsel for plaintiff in error, and by Mr. R. G. Ingersoll, for the defendants in error, under the twentieth rule.

No. 907.—The Board of County Commissioners, County of Johnson, plaintiffs in error, vs. Nathaniel Thayer et al.—This cause was submitted on printed arguments by Mr. Cobb, of counsel for plaintiffs in error, and by Mr. Wallace Pratt for the defendants in error, under the twentieth rule.

No. 846.—Mrs. M. E. Burke, plaintiff in error, vs. Louis Tregre et al. intervenors.—The motion to dismiss this cause was submitted on printed arguments by Mr. Thomas Allen, and by Mr. J. R. Beckwith in opposition thereto.

No. 166.—The Consolidated Fruit Jar Company, appellants, vs. James T. Wright.—The argument of this cause was concluded by J. H. Latrobe of counsel for appellants.

No. 167.—The President, &c., of the Insurance Company of North America, plaintiffs in error, vs. Phebe A. Field.—This writ was argued by Mr. John J. Bennett, of counsel for the defendant in error, and submitted on printed arguments by Mr. J. J. Farnsworth, of counsel for the plaintiffs in error.

No. 168.—The Electric Match Company et al., plaintiffs in error, vs. The United States.—This cause was submitted on printed arguments by Mr. Assistant Attorney General Smith, of counsel for the defendant in error, no counsel appearing for plaintiffs in error.

No. 169.—Henry Mees, appellant, vs. Jacob A. Conover.—This cause was argued by Mr. J. A. Todd of counsel for appellant, and by Mr. R. Mason for the appellee.

No. 170.—William Bayne, Trustee, &c., appellant, vs. the United States.—The argument of this cause was commenced by Mr. Thomas W. Hall, Jr., of counsel for appellant.

Adjourned until Monday.

IMPORTANT ASSESSMENT SUITS.

Six important cases, brought by the St. Joseph's Asylum and other charitable institutions to set aside assessments on their property, were argued before the Supreme Court, General Term, yesterday, the decision of them being reserved. The cases are similar in their character, and a recital of the facts of one answers for all the others. Thus, in the case of the St. Joseph's Asylum, it appears there were four assessments laid on the asylum property for different improvements. The property has not been valued by the Tax Assessor since 1858. The Trustees of the asylum moved to set aside all four assessments on the ground that they came within the recent decision of the Court of Appeals in the case of the Protestant Episcopal Orphan Asylum. In that case it was held that where the valuation of the property was put down at 0 no assessment can be levied, since by the statute property cannot be assessed for more than one-half its valuation. In the present case there was no valuation, as previously stated, since 1858. Three of the four assessments were less in amount than one-half this valuation, while the fourth exceeded the one-half. The last-named assessment was reduced by the court below to less than one-half the valuation, and as thus modified all four assessments were affirmed. The Trustees of the asylum now bring this appeal claiming that the assessed valuation mentioned in the statute means the assessed valuation for the year in which the assessment is laid. They claim the assessed valuation referred to is only the last assessed valuation, and that property is not declared to have no assessed valuation merely because there is an omission of any assessed valuation on the tax valuation books.

CHARGED WITH GRAND LARCENY.

Jacob Rice, a young man employed by Mr. Seligman Adler, of No. 354 Broadway, was arraigned before Justice Duffy, in the Tombs Police Court, yesterday afternoon. He was arrested on Thursday last by Detective Hagan, of the Fifth Precinct, on the complaint of Mr. John Campbell, who charged that Rice had robbed him of goods valued at $712 50. Mr. Campbell is in the dry goods business at No. 3 Liespenard street. On the evening of Jan. 15, 1876, he was robbed of a number of Paisly shawls and other articles. He made his loss known to the trade, but for several months learned nothing of the thief nor of the disposition of the stolen property. In October last, Rice, the prisoner, it is alleged, brought the stolen shawls for sale to Mr. Brice, of the firm of Brice & Johnson. That gentleman took the shawls and sent for Mr. Campbell, who identified them as his property. Justice Duffy held the prisoner to bail in the sum of $1,500, which was furnished by Mr. Seligman Adler, who said Rice had been in his employ for a long time and had always borne himself well.

THE PRICE HABEAS CORPUS CASE.

The proceeding whereby Mrs. Constance B. Price seeks to recover the custody of her deaf mute daughter, Lillie M. Price, from the guardians appointed for the little girl by her deceased father, was brought up before Judge Donohue yesterday. Gen. Roger A. Pryor appeared for the petitioner, and A. Oakey Hall and Gen. Hughes for the guardians. The merits of the case were not gone into, as a preliminary objection was taken to the jurisdiction of the court. It appears that a similar proceeding was begun in the Supreme Court in Warren County, and that then a stipulation was entered into by Mr. Pryor's predecessor in the case, and the respondents' counsel, by which it was agreed that no further proceedings should be had until the decision of the habeas corpus proceeding in Warren County. This latter proceeding Gen. Pryor discontinued, but the respondents claim he had no right to do so. The point really involved in the case is whether an attorney can bind a client by a stipulation in a matter not relating to property. Decision was reserved.

A CLIENT IN SEARCH OF A LAWYER.

The foreclosure case of Isidore Wormser and others against George Hoffman and others, was brought before Judge Donohue, in Supreme Court, Chambers, yesterday, on a motion by Hoffman to vacate the decree of foreclosure and sale obtained in the action. He obtained a temporary stay and an order to the plaintiff to show cause, returnable on the 23d inst., why the decree should be set aside. In his affidavit Mr. Hoffman avers that he is the owner of No. 509 Fifth avenue, for which, he says, he has refused $165,000. The present suit is for the foreclosure of a $25,000 mortgage on the premises in question. Mr. Hoffman says he has a good defense to the action, and when the suit was begun he consulted with some of his friends as to what he should do in the matter. They recommended him to go to one John McGurk, an attorney, and he employed the latter to defend the suit. He says he saw McGurk at different times during the pendency of the action, but was assured by the attorney that everything was all right in the matter. On the 16th inst., however, he saw that the property was advertised for sale. He then went again to McGurk and was assured, he says, by the latter that all was right. McGurk, however, finally admitted that there had been a decree of sale. Hoffman says he began to suspect McGurk, and after trying in vain to see that gentleman on the 17th and 18th inst., he went to Messrs. Sullivan, Kobbé & Fowler to get their advice. They promptly informed him that they could not act for him, they being engaged for other parties to the suit. He then applied to ex-Judge Beebe, who undertook the case and made the application in Hoffman's behalf yesterday.

COURT NOTES.

The jury in Part III. of the Supreme Court yesterday gave a verdict for the plaintiffs in the replevin suit of Porter & Wetmore against Gordon, already reported in THE TIMES.

The application of Sergt. Augustus Miller to recover his pay while he was under sentence of dismissal from the Police force, was denied by Judge Donohue in the Supreme Court yesterday.

The argument on the injunction on the performance of the play "Die Danischeffs," was yesterday adjourned until Monday, when the matter will be argued before Judge Donohue in Supreme Court, Chambers.

Nicole Alexandre Bellezza sued Leland Stamford to recover $7,000, the value of a scarf pin containing one large diamond and 531 small ones. He procured an attachment against the defendant as a non-resident, but the attachment was vacated by Judge Donohue yesterday, because Mr. Stamford gave bonds in $14,000.

Achille Messina, an accomplished Italian sneak-thief, living at No. 94 Baxter street, who entered the apartments of Mary Gillespie, of No. 105 East Broadway, and stole therefrom a coat containing $1, was found guilty yesterday in Part I. of the Court of General Sessions. Judge Gildersleeve sent the thief to State Prison for four years.

Charles Seymour, a printer, and a resident, as he says, of Jersey City, was committed for trial at the Fifty-seventh Street Court, yesterday, on a charge of being a sneak-thief and stealing $300 worth of jewelry from the residence of Isadore Goldstein, No. 436 West Fifty-first street. The prisoner was arrested by a citizen named Stephen Schrame.

The certiorari proceedings in the case of Capt. Van Dusen, who was recently dismissed from the Police force, were brought before Judge Donohue, in Supreme Court, Chambers, yesterday, on a motion to have the return to the writ by the Police Commissioners made more specific. The case was, however, adjourned until Monday. Capt. Van Dusen seeks a reviewal of the decision of the Police Board.

Solomon Jacobs, the keeper of a notorious receptacle of stolen goods at No. 64 Baxter street, who was arrested by Capt. Lowery on Tuesday evening last for receiving goods, was arraigned in the Court of General Sessions yesterday on eight separate indictments for petit larceny, grand larceny, and receiving stolen goods. Assistant District Attorney Rollins announced that the prisoner would be tried on Monday.

The matter of an award for some lands in this City, taken by the Brooklyn Bridge Company, was before Judge Donohue yesterday, on a motion to confirm the report of Commissioners appointed to award damages for lots between Water and Front streets, and near Dover street. By the report Herman Toby, a tenant, is given six cents damages, and Annie D. Squire, the owner, is awarded $62,000. The latter is given subject to $70,000 of mortgages, and several years' back taxes. Judge Donohue ordered the amount to be paid into court.

The suit of Gano against McCunn, which grows out of the disputes concerning the distribution of the estate of the late ex-Judge McCunn, was brought up before Judge Donohue, in Supreme Court, Chambers, yesterday, on a motion by Joseph J. O'Donohue, the Receiver of the estate, to be relieved of his trust. He says he is desirous of going to Europe. The motion was contested, because the counsel for the plaintiff in the action desire some provision for the continuance of the suit, and also desire an accounting.

The case of Abeasais against Gray was brought to trial before Judge Sedgwick and a jury, in Part I. of the Superior Court, yesterday. The plaintiff sues to recover $1,200, the value of rubber stored with the defendant at No. 15 Front

The more the plan for counting the Electoral vote by a mixed commission is looked into the less it is liked. Those in favor of it are chiefly business men who do not profess to have mastered its provisions, but who are ready to welcome any means of escape from complications which injure trade and retard the recovery of public confidence. Sundry jurists of both parties emphatically condemn the bill as a subterfuge or a usurpation. Those who believe that the Constitution vests in Congress the power of counting the vote are as little disposed as those who maintain the constitutional function of the President of the Senate, to concede that the power can be delegated to any tribunal whatever. The Senatorial supporters of the bill have a due appreciation of its weakness in urging its immediate consideration and adoption. It is not calculated to stand the ordeal of a week's criticism outside of Congress, whatever may be its chances of coming safely through a few days' discussion in both houses.

The election of Mr. GEORGE F. HOAR to the Senate of the United States is a gratifying evidence of the sound condition of the Republican Party in Massachusetts. He is a gentleman of marked ability and of sterling character. Though he is not likely to raise the representation of Massachusetts in the Senate to the level it attained in the time of Mr. SUMNER, and much less to that it had in the time of Mr. WEBSTER, he will make a conscientious and pure Senator, with excellent understanding and firmness and independence. His election is an emphatic defeat for "Butlerism," and is recognized as being so by the Simmons-Butler faction. If the gentlemen who control this not very valuable group would now accept the estimate which the country has made of them and retire to the safe obscurity of private life, they would confer a favor on the public and on the Republican Party which they could not compass in any other way.

While we think that the Directors of the Western Union Telegraph Company have made a blunder in conceding the power of Congress to compel the production of copies of telegrams held by the company, it is a matter of satisfaction that the public will now have an opportunity of comparing the confidential communications of the managers of both political parties. There is but little left to learn in regard to the telegrams sent out by the Republican committee, but there is much interesting matter in reserve for those not in the secret of the Tilden dispatches. Now that the Democrats have got what they have so persistently clamored for, they seem to be a little afraid of the consequences. A good deal of unwelcome light will be thrown upon the methods adopted for keeping certain States "in doubt" when the telegraphic instructions of HEWITT and his coadjutors in Liberty street are made public.

Judge STRONG has delivered an opinion adverse to the claim of the Government to be considered a preferred creditor of the Centennial Board of Finance. The opinion declares that the language used in the bill relating to the Government contribution was the ordinary language of an appropriation, not of a loan; that under that view of the case, the stockholders must first be satisfied before the Government claim can be admitted; that there can be no "profits," in the usual acceptation of the word, till the capital stock has been refunded, and that if there are no profits after such repayment, the Government has no claim. Under such a ruling, the United States Treasury will, of course, get nothing, and the stockholders will receive about eighty cents on the dollar of their shares. The decision is an able and interesting one on other grounds besides its application to the funds of the Exhibition. The questions involved will, however, be carried to the Supreme Court for final settlement.

The tone of the foreign press on the Eastern crisis, so far as cable dispatches indicate it, is moderate and not at all alarming. There is manifestly a growing respect for Turkey. As THE TIMES has steadily pointed out, the Sublime Porte could not possibly assume any other attitude consistent with a decent self-respect than that which it has all along maintained. Whatever may have been the provocations of the Moslem, the independence of his Government was all that he had left to fight for. This surrendered, all was gone. Now that a final rejection of the terms of the powers has been given, it is impossible not to respect the spirit which accompanied it. It is not likely that there will be any decisive hostilities between Russia and Turkey at present. And no one can tell what new diplomatic combinations may arise from the negotiations which are almost sure to occupy Russia, Austria, Germany, and Turkey, from this time until the end of Winter.

Messrs. WILLIAM F. SMITH, JOEL B. ERHARDT, DEWITT C. WHEELER, and SIDNEY P. NICHOLS, Police Commissioners of this City, allege that by certain strictures which have appeared in THE TIMES they have been injured in their "good name and credit" to the extent of ten thousand dollars each. It is a gratifying piece of intelligence to learn that the Police Commissioners have so much character left to damage, though it is extremely doubtful whether they could succeed in convincing an intelligent jury of their fellow-citizens of that fact. A copy of their complaint is published in another column, and will be found rather amusing reading. It is complimentary to THE TIMES that it should have been singled out as the spokesman of the entire population of this City who have reached years of discretion, and who have with one accord indulged in more or less forcible criticisms upon the disgusting condition of the streets and the gross incompetence of the men who are responsible for it. We appreciate the delicate testimonial to our position tendered by the Police Commissioners, and shall continue to keep them well-advised about what the public think of them. Their sensitiveness is as much a surprise to us as the extravagant valuation they place upon their characters. It has manifested itself rather late, however, to warrant the belief that they are capable of rising above the administrative methods of a somewhat thick-skinned order of political tricksters.

THE POWERS OF THE PROPOSED COMMISSION.

Mr. EDMUNDS announced yesterday that he should call up the bill of the Committees on the Electoral Votes to-day, and press its consideration. We may look, therefore, for an early and full explanation of the committees' view of the powers conferred by the bill upon the proposed commission. We trust that on this point Messrs. THURMAN and BAYARD, the principal Democrats on the Senate committee, will make themselves entirely clear. The country will be interested in knowing how far these gentlemen expect the commission to go in considering the questions submitted to it. No one supposes that the Republicans will urge the commission to an extreme interpretation of its jurisdiction and its functions. There is no motive for their doing so. The more completely the commission respects the rights of the States as they are defined by the Constitution and as they have heretofore been sustained in action, the more likely is the Republican Party to obtain the decision to which the law as it now stands clearly entitles it. But the contrary is true of the Democrats. They have every reason to push the action of the commission beyond the declaration of the Electoral vote by the agencies appointed by the States, and to induce it to take up the question at the ballot-box itself. That such power in the commission would be without warrant in the Constitution; that it would be giving to a creature of Congress functions which Congress cannot itself exercise; that it would be stripping the States of privileges distinctly reserved to each of them by the letter and spirit of the Constitution; and that it would be a precedent for endless confusion and usurpation in the future, few who have studied the subject will doubt.

Meanwhile we ask our readers to look carefully at the language of the bill. The commission, be it remarked, is "impartial" only by a balancing of partisans, with the introduction of a single arbiter of uncertain bias. This is the essential principle in its constitution. Even the Judges of the Supreme Court are selected one-half from one party and one-half from the other, thus recognizing baldly the idea that these Judges may properly be classified according to their politics, and may be with propriety expected to consult their prejudices, and not their conscience or understanding, in the gravest case ever submitted to them. The Judges, thus stamped beforehand as partisans, are associated with Senators and Representatives also counted as committed, and then to the whole group is to be added an odd Judge, who shall decide when the others have fallen apart on the predetermined party lines. The tribunal thus constituted is not even in pretense a judicial one. It is merely an assorted set of gentlemen of such a number that they cannot be evenly divided, appointed to come to a decision which Congress is asked to take from the President of the Senate, to whom it belongs, and which it is apparently afraid to take upon itself.

The commission, thus contrived, is, in case there are more than one return, or paper purporting to be a return, from a State, to receive such returns and papers, together with all papers accompanying the same, and all objections made by members of either house in writing to the counting of either of such returns. This is all that is submitted to them directly from the two houses in meeting. The bill then provides that in considering the subject matter of the papers above enumerated, the commission "may take in view such petitions, depositions, and other papers, if any, as shall by the Constitution and now existing laws be competent and pertinent in such consideration." This is sufficiently sweeping, but it is not as much so as some other of the clauses pretending to define the functions of the commission.

The bill says that one of the questions "submitted to the judgment and decision" of the commission is, "Which is the true and lawful Electoral vote" of any State in dispute? Further on, it is provided that the commission shall consider the papers referred to it, and those which it is authorized to take in view, "with the same powers, if any, now possessed for that purpose by the two houses, acting separately or together, and by a majority of votes decide whether any and what votes from such State are the votes provided for by the Constitution of the United States, and how many and what persons were duly appointed Electors in such State." This is all the bill says about the powers of the commission. It is obviously too little. It leaves those powers not only undefined, but discretionary. It gives to the commission not only the right to determine what evidence it can call for "by the Constitution and now existing laws," but also the right to interpret the powers of Congress in the premises, when these powers are confessedly undetermined in the declarations or the precedents of that body itself. More extraordinary legislation than this it has never fallen to our lot to examine. That a responsible legislative body, acting under a written Constitution, possessing no powers not derived explicitly or by clear and necessary inference from that instrument, should be asked to clothe an arbitrary, accidental commission with "all the powers, if any," possessed by itself in the premises, is, we believe, unheard of. We may add that it ought also to be intolerable.

In the first place, if Congress has no powers it cannot delegate them. In the second place, if it has power in the premises, they are given to it to use, not to transfer to some unrecognized, unprovided-for commission. Finally, if there is doubt as to what the powers of Congress are, there is only one way known to the Constitution by which they can be determined, and that is, by the common declaration, in form of law, of the two houses, subject to the approval of the Executive, and to adjudication, in cases of actual litigation, by the Supreme Court. That this solemn process, protected at every step by the safeguards of parliamentary usage and regulation, by the veto power of the President, and by the searching conditions of judicial review, can be exchanged for the almost hap-hazard and wholly undigested decision of a mixed up commission of Judges, Senators, and Representatives, such as the Edmunds-Conkling bill provides for, is preposterous.

There is an element of the absurd that is little less than ludicrous in calling the contrivance of the committees a settlement; nor can we see how Supreme Court Judges, with any proper conception of the dignity of their office, can consent to take part in such a helter-skelter method of shuffling around a great public question. The conditions under which they are called upon to act are fatal to anything like judicial thoroughness, which is essential to judicial impartiality. Every court has a right to ask that its duties shall be clearly defined. What, then, can be said of a court to which is referred a question which Congress does not pretend to state with precision, to be decided on evidence which is only vaguely described, and with powers which Congress has not yet ascertained, and which it could not delegate if it possessed them?

THE ILLUSION OF A DOUBLE STANDARD.

It is evident from Mr. SHERMAN'S haste to put himself on record as in favor of a silver legal tender as a nominal substitute for the United States notes, that the project of remonetizing silver is by no means abandoned. It may or it may not be brought up during the present session, but it is plain that the Silver Ring, having once gained the majority of the House of Representatives, and having the support of the Chairman of the Senate Finance Committee, will not fail to pass their scheme if an opportunity should be afforded. Their efforts will be seconded by a certain number of our public men who are apparently captivated by the idea of a double standard, who imagine that they are following in the steps of the "bi-metallists" of Europe, and who reason that it is only by the use of two metals as legal tender that a nation can maintain a steady currency. There is, with this class, a tacit assumption that if there is a sudden and large falling off in the production of either silver or gold, the other metal will remain steady, and vice versa, that if either one is largely increased the other will not fluctuate.

But it is only necessary to look for a moment at this reasoning to see its fallacy. There is no more chance for a double standard in money than for a double yardstick in the dry goods trade. If both gold and silver were legal tender, only one would be used in commerce, and that one would be the cheapest, just as surely as, if there were a yard which measured thirty-six inches and another which measured only thirty-two, the merchant who was called on to deliver a certain number of yards would use the shortest measure. In the nature of a standard it must be single and constant, and the notion of two for the same unit is a practical impossibility and a logical absurdity. The history of our own coinage shows this as plainly as anything can be shown. There were eighty years, from 1793 to 1873, when gold and silver were alike legal tender in the United States. For the first half of this period the gold dollar contained one-fifteenth the weight of pure metal that was used in the silver dollar; but one ounce of gold was worth, on an average, 15½ ounces of silver, and the silver dollar was thus legal tender for 1-30 more than its real value. In other words, fifteen and one-half dollars' worth of goods could be paid for with fifteen dollars in silver. Consequently silver was used exclusively.

In 1834 the gold coin was altered, and the gold dollar thereafter contained only one-sixteenth of the pure metal in the silver dollar. The ounce of gold was still intrinsically worth about 15½ ounces of silver, and the conditions of trade were now completely reversed. Gold was in its turn used exclusively. For the next forty years though silver was as fully a legal tender as ever, not a dollar of debt was paid in it, and the average annual coinage of silver was only $160,000. If the course of events had been arranged with that purpose, it could not have more clearly proved that, whatever the law may say about a double standard, the sterner statute of human interest forbids the use of a dearer, and compels the use of a cheaper, metal when both are alike a tender.

A still later and strictly analagous instance is found in the relation of gold and legal-tender notes. Is there any more reason to suppose that silver would be used on a plane with gold, if one hundred dollars of the latter would buy one hundred and seven dollars of the former, than there is to suppose that gold will be used at par with paper in the markets of to-day? Were Mr. BLAND'S bill passed, silver and gold and paper would all be on exactly the same level, so far as the law can make them. Then, if silver dropped in London to 46½d., as it did in July last, can we expect that silver would in fact be on a level with gold or even with notes? Should we have a double or triple standard? On the contrary, we should have at any given time but one standard, and that one whichever happened to be intrinsically of the least value.

Of course, every time that there is a change in the legal tender actually in use, there is necessarily more or less loss in trade, which inevitably falls most heavily on those who are least able to bear it, and to authorize a third species of legal tender in a metal exposed to such fluctuations as silver has undergone during the last year would be only to multiply indefinitely the danger of such loss. The gentlemen who are taking sides with the silver party under the impression that it will prove popular may learn, when it is too late, that no party can be permanently popular which strikes a blow at the interests of honest trade.

MR. RUSKIN'S REMEDY.

The disgraceful and criminal mismanagement of the absurdly-named "Security" Life Insurance Company, the particulars of which have been laid before the readers of THE TIMES, is, as we all have reason to believe, not peculiar to that institution. It is but an instance, somewhat peculiar in its flagrancy and shamelessness, of the way in which the affairs of a very considerable number of financial trust corporations have been conducted during the last five or six years, it not longer. Nor are such criminal breaches of good faith in deed and word peculiar to corporations. The sad revelations of the last two or three years have ruined the reputations of not a few men who had stood high in the estimation of the public for their probity as well as their business ability. Under such circumstances, the question, how we are to be protected against such ruinous rascality on the part of men of fair reputations, becomes of the first importance. As the business of the world is now conducted, there must be corporations and individuals who hold money in trust. Insurance companies, savings banks, banks of deposit, trusteeships under wills—all these must exist and will exist, notwithstanding the dreadful recent experience of so many of those whose whole living has been taken from them by the men whom they have trusted in vain. And the men who hold the positions of trust thus created will be of just the sort which those were whom we have lately found faithless in word and thieving in deed. When we seek trustees and managers of our financial affairs, we do not go to sordid misers, to men who live in squalor, voluntary or involuntary, to ignorant, uneducated, unenterprising men. We are naturally and justly attracted by the men who appear to be above the temptation to do evil; men of fair appearance before the world, intelligent, educated, active, and energetic. Such men we know, if they discharge their duties in good faith, will make the best investment and the best use of our money; they will make us sure of our principal, and give us the best chance of a steady receipt of a fair income from it.

Unfortunately, however, it has been lately revealed that this not too large class of men contains not a few who can be led to use their reputations and their fiduciary positions to rob those who trust in them. We say they can be led so to use them; for we would not, for the credit of human nature, believe that any large proportion of the men who, during the last few years, have gone to moral wreck and cast others upon financial ruin, did so deliberately. A charitable construction of their conduct, at least, is, not that they sought or took their trusts with the intention of betraying them, but that having money in their hands, and being unfortunate in their private business, or believing that they could improve their condition, they used their trust funds for private purposes, with no intention of absolutely appropriating them, and losing at first, or sometimes losing and sometimes gaining, they were led on, like the gambler who flings down stake after stake, until they found themselves, with their victims in a slough of despond from which there was no hope of extrication. Such we know has been the course of some of those who, once trusted and honored, are now fugitives from justice or subject to arrest, if they have not already been within prison walls; and it is not only charitable but reasonable to suppose a like experience in many others. No one, says the great Roman satirist, ever became thoroughly base all at once, and his sentence has passed into an adage because the world has recognized its essential truth. But unfortunately for those who place their money in the hands of men of reputation, it is, by the very gradual progress of these men into the depths of vice that the former are ruined. A man's intentions may be good, and he may not have yet been led into perjury, but still he may have brought you nearly to ruin. How shall we protect ourselves in this contingency?

It is possible that Mr. JOHN RUSKIN may have pointed out a way in which we can attain security as nearly as possible. Mr. RUSKIN, whose reputation was achieved as an art critic, has given himself of late years to political economy and social science. He publishes monthly a letter "To the Workmen and Laborers of Great Britain," which he calls "Fors Clavigera," a name which he himself is not quite able to explain, and which is fitly given to letters which, so far as those to whom they are addressed are concerned, might as well be written in Latin, or for that matter in Sanscrit. He has also established a guild called "St. George's Company," the very practicable purpose of which seems to be chiefly that its members shall live without using the products of machinery, and particularly of steam-engines; that they shall travel on horseback or on foot, instead of by rail; that they shall neither take nor pay interest for money or rent for land; and that they shall always tell the truth. Of this company Mr. RUSKIN himself is master, and after some two years' agitation we believe he has about a score of members, a few hundred pounds in money, and a few rocky and utterly barren acres of land. Idiotic as the scheme may seem to many persons, totally impracticable as it must seem to almost every one, its author has hit upon one plan, which, if the company were to become possessed of millions of pounds sterling and do a business equal to that of all the railroad companies in Great Britain, would prevent, absolutely prevent, it seems, all peculation on the part of its officers, and all dishonest or irregular dealings on the part of its members. This is that every member shall furnish every month, for the inspection of the company, a full statement of his receipts and expenditures, giving, with vouchers, the source of the former, and also, with vouchers, the particulars of the latter. As master of the company, although it can yet hardly be said to have gone into operation, Mr. RUSKIN has already begun to conform in this respect to the rule which he established, and he publishes every month in "Fors" an account of his personal receipts and expenses—the latter even down to the books and prints he buys and the money he gives away. Now, it is quite hopeless to bring people in general to making such statements. Privacy in personal affairs is that which is most desired concerning them. Nor is it necessary that this privacy should be violated in general. But with the sad revelations of the last few years before us, and the certainty and the necessity that there will be trustees and trust companies, is it too much to expect a requirement that every person holding a position by which he becomes responsible for trust funds shall render a monthly statement of his receipts and expenditures of all kinds, business and personal, which shall be accessible to those, and only to those, to whom he is pecuniarly responsible? Of the efficacy of this plan there can be little doubt. The expense at which men in such positions were living, and their business affairs, would be so well known that deceit would be almost if not quite impossible. Let whoever was unwilling to accept trust funds under such a provision remain in the seclusion of absolute privacy. Men who may safely be trusted, and who would under the circumstances mentioned be willing to make such exhibit for the benefit of those who trust them on their reputations, would not be so scarce that our money corporations would go without officers and our estates without trustees. In our present perplexity Mr. RUSKIN'S remedy is at least worthy of consideration.

THE SULTAN AND THE POPE.

There are certain points of resemblance between the Pope of Rome and the Sultan of Turkey. The Pope is the successor of St. PETER; the Sultan is the successor of the Prophet MOHAMMED. The Pope is Pope because he is Bishop of Rome; the Sultan is Sultan because he is King of Constantinople. The Pope is the earthly and visible head of the Roman Catholic Church throughout all the world; the Sultan is the earthly and visible head of the Moslem Church throughout all the world. The spiritual children of the Pope are in every land where the Gospel of the Cross has ever been preached; the spiritual children of the Sultan dwell in Europe, Asia, and Africa, many of them in lands over which his temporal authority has never borne sway. The temporal power of the Pope, after lasting for more than a thousand years, has now been wholly swept away. The temporal power of the Sultan is certainly at this moment in imminent danger of extinction. The destruction of the temporal power of the Pope, if we may believe the unanimous voice of Roman Catholics, has only tended to strengthen his spiritual authority; but they still exhaust themselves in argument to show that the absolute independence and autonomy of the Pope as a temporal Prince is essential to the safety and well-being of the Church. The destruction of the temporal power of the Sultan may not in the least diminish the authority which he wields in spiritual matters as Commander of the Faithful and successor of the Prophet; but the Moslem population in lands distant from Turkey are now manifesting their anxiety for the preservation of his throne, just as the Roman Catholics in lands distant from Italy displayed their anxiety for the preservation of the throne of PIO NINO.

There are said to be not less than 40,000,000 of Mohammedans in British India, who regard the Sultan of Turkey as the earthly head of their Church; and it is well known that one of the reasons which have led them to submit so willingly to the rule of England was the fact that England stood before the world as the peculiar champion and most powerful defender of the Sultan. The Indian Moslems appear to be intelligent men, and to have a clear understanding of European politics. The news we published the other day, concerning a petition which they had drawn up and were about to lay at the feet of the Empress of India, shows that her Moslem subjects perfectly comprehend the scope and purpose of the agitation against Turkey which has been going on in England during the last six months. They implore her Majesty in this petition to refuse to abandon the traditional policy of her Government respecting Turkey; to turn a deaf ear to the advice of the evil counselors who are urging her to desert the Sultan and leave him a prey to his foes; and to remember that this desertion would inflict the deepest sorrow and humiliation upon her faithful subjects in India. This petition has not availed to change the policy which Lord SALISBURY has been pursuing at Constantinople, and it is likely that England's abandonment of the Sultan will hasten his expulsion from Europe. Egypt can then not much longer afford him an asylum, and the Commander of the Faithful may find a refuge in Asia. The Popes were exiled from Rome for 70 years, and returned in triumph; and many Roman Catholics still hope, or pretend to hope, that PIO NINO or his successor will again reign over the patrimony of ST. PETER. But the Sultan, once driven from Constantinople, will scarcely return, either in his own person or in that of any of his successors; and probably the Moslems may in time be willing to regard him only as a spiritual head, just as the less zealous of the Roman Catholics are now content that the Pope shall bear sway only in spiritual things.

MEXICO FOR THE MONKEYS.

The leading Mexican statesmen are defending the sublime principles of anarchy with unswerving devotion. Gen. DIAZ, having taken possession of the capital, is endeavoring to place the finances of the nation upon a substantial basis by imposing forced loans of a pair of boots upon one capitalist, an extra shirt upon another, and a box of cigars upon a third. President LERDO is understood to be down cellar somewhere in the western part of the country, trying to read the papers by the light of a small lantern and waiting for better times. President IGLESIAS has established a peripatetic seat of government all over the north of Mexico, and, in company with a few faithful adherents of the Church Party, is constantly singing that grand old mediæval hymn:

"Diaz iræ, Diaz ille, Solvit Lerdo and all the rest of them."

Each President is as firmly convinced as ever that his two rivals are unprincipled traitors. DIAZ, as he confiscates a watch or a pocket-book for the use of the nation, sadly remarks that never, with his consent, shall Chief Justice IGLESIAS trail the ermine of the Supreme Court in the mire of partisan politics, and that as for LERDO, that person has already had one term of the Presidency, and is a greedy pig to want any more. President LERDO, in his turn, accuses DIAZ of having intimidated him, and claims that IGLESIAS usurped judicial functions when he tried to count himself in as President; while IGLESIAS, as he wheels his seat of government from one village to another, denounces DIAZ and LERDO as men destitute of religion, and actuated solely by a love of the transitory boots and pocket-books of this wicked world.

Mexico has now tried the experiment of popular anarchy for more than half a century. The Mexican theory of government is modeled upon the two popular sports of tag and target shooting. When a President is elected, it is by no means understood that he is to rule. On the contrary, he is intended merely as the target, so to speak, at which rival Generals are expected to aim, and the one who hits him hard enough to overthrow him is considered to have lawfully won the right to take his place. The latter, thus, in his turn becomes a target for the other contestants, and so the game goes noisily and merrily on. Regarded in its relation to the juvenile game of tag, the Mexican system of government possesses a charming simplicity. The newly-elected President is the "it" of the game, who is to be chased by the other players until he is caught, when the captor immediately becomes "it." The result of this simple, yet ingenious, system is that Mexico enjoys perpetual anarchy; and so long as there is a shotgun or a General in the land, the supply of anarchy will never become exhausted. Each of the various races which inhabit Mexico has from time to time tried its skill in government. First, the pure-blooded Spaniards undertook to rule the country; next the Creoles tried what they could do; and, finally, such pure-blooded Indians as JUAREZ and DIAZ took possession of the Presidency. Neither race, however, has essentially changed the political condition of Mexico, though time has strengthened the feeble plant of anarchy sowed by SANTA ANNA and his comrades, until it now overshadows the whole Republic, and its branches have become the roosting-place of every variety of political buzzard.

A year or two ago a naturalist of some miscellaneous South American race captured a Brazilian monkey. The naturalist was well aware that not only is the monkey intelligent, but that he is full of all sorts of ingenious vocal organs, of the true use of which he has hitherto been ignorant. To the naturalist's mind there seemed to be no physiological reason why the monkey should be incapable of learning to talk, and he therefore devoted himself to the task of teaching his private monkey to read, write, and speak Portuguese. His success was really wonderful. That monkey will now hang himself by the tail from a convenient chandelier and converse with his master with the fluency of a restaurant waiter. If the monkey is called upon to express his views as to the brass candlestick of the baker, or is asked whether the uncle of the shoe-maker really has the golden stockings of the carpenter's wife, he will reply in terms that would charm the original Mr. OLLENDORF—if that intricate linguist still survives. Whether he has yet been taught to read and write, we are not informed; but there is no doubt that a monkey who can learn to talk can also learn all the other accomplishments taught in the public schools.

Now, if our casual South American monkey can be taught to talk intelligibly, it follows that the Mexican monkeys, who are of the same race as those of Brazil, are similarly capable of education. The monkey population of Mexico is not included in the census returns, but there is every reason to believe that it fully equals in numbers the black, white, red, and variegated population. Hitherto, the monkeys have lived quietly in the woods and avoided taking any part in political affairs. Let them, however, once know how to speak and to write proclamations, and they will no longer leave politics exclusively in the hands of the Creoles and the Indians. They will emerge from their forests, issue patriotic addresses, and take possession of the Government, while the leading Mexican statesmen will fold their cloaks around such portable property as they can conveniently carry, and steal away in search of some country where their peculiar abilities will have freer scope.

It is thus seen that the future of Mexico is not altogether hopeless. If the Mexican statesmen can only be superseded by intelligent monkeys who will abstain from forcibly borrowing all the money and good clothes in the country, Mexico will enter upon a new era of peace and prosperity. The human population is evidently incapable of anything commendable, for it has even refused to die out, although yellow fever, cholera, and war have offered it abundant opportunity for so doing. "Mexico for the monkeys" should be henceforth the motto of every true philanthropist, and no efforts should be spared to successfully carry it out.

THE MISSISSIPPI ELECTION.

THE FRAUD AND INTIMIDATION—TESTIMONY BEFORE THE SENATE COMMITTEE ON ELECTIONS—VIOLENCE GENERAL TO AFFECT THE RESULT.

WASHINGTON, Jan. 19.—The Senate Committee on Privileges and Elections to-day continued taking testimony in relation to the conduct of the late election in Mississippi.

Merryman L. Howard, (colored,) of Fayette, Jefferson County, Miss., testified that he had been a magistrate, a member of the Mississippi Legislature, and was three times elected Sheriff of Jefferson County, but before he had served the whole of his third term the office was declared vacant by the County Board of Supervisors, and a Democrat was chosen in his place; he testified to numerous instances in which intimidation had been used to prevent colored Republicans from holding political meetings, and threats made against their lives by armed Democrats; the witness left Mississippi four days before the last election, as he considered his life in danger; when he left he went to New-Orleans, and remained in that city until sub cenaed to come to Washington; he is still afraid he would be killed should he return to his home at Fayette.

Mr. Richards, a colored lawyer from Claiborne County, testified to the existence of armed organizations of Democrats in the county where he resides, and stated that Mr. Lynch, a colored member of Congress, attempted to address the Republicans of Claiborne County at Port Gibson, and on that day the town was filled with armed Democrats; that Mr. Lynch was told by some of the Democrats that he could speak, but they should give him the lie if he said anything; the Democrats did not indorse; Mr. Lynch did not speak, but left. Port Gibson in company with witness for fear of bodily harm; the witness stated that fully one-third of the voters in Claiborne County were denied registration by fraudulent means, the Republicans of that county being thoroughly intimidated; the election day passed off quietly in Claiborne County.

W. D. Gibbs, a lawyer from Yazoo County, testified that he was a candidate for Presidential Elector at the late election in Mississippi, on the Democratic ticket; he canvassed ten counties, making political speeches in them all; he claimed that the great change in the vote of Mississippi since 1872 was caused by a change of political sentiments among the colored voters; he had heard that intimidation had been resorted to in that State to influence voters, but he never saw anything of the kind himself.

At this point the committee adjourned until to-morrow.

ILLICIT DISTILLATION OF SPIRITS.

THE INCREASE OF FRAUDS UPON THE REVENUE—THE CRIME CARRIED ON SOUTH TO AN EXTENT HERETOFORE UNKNOWN—THE LAWS BOLDLY DEFIED—REVENUE AGENTS FATALLY SHOT—THE PRESIDENT'S INTERFERENCE.

WASHINGTON, Jan. 19.—The Commissioner of Internal Revenue has called the attention of the Secretary of the Treasury to the increase of frauds upon the revenue by the illicit distillation of spirits, and to the difficulty of enforcing the Internal Revenue laws in several of the Southern States. From recent reports of officers and agents of the Bureau stationed in North Carolina, Georgia, and northern Alabama, it appears that the illicit distillation and illegal sale of spirits is carried on to an extent unknown at any time before during the existence of the present laws. The frauds in the production and sale of manufactured tobacco in the State of North Carolina alone are believed to amount to nearly $500,000 annually. In the States above named, together with south-western Virginia and East Tennessee, there are operated at this time (not less than 2,000 illicit distilleries, producing on an average 15 gallons per day, the tax upon which is $27,000. All these distilleries will run at least 20 days during the month, and some of them continually for four months of this year, occasioning a loss to the revenue of no less than $2,500,000. These stills are located in the mountain gorges and sparsely-settled districts, and can only be discovered and the offenders arrested by extraordinary efforts on the part of the officers. During the last year Revenue Agent Wagner, with a mounted and armed civil force, succeeded in breaking up 133 such stills and arresting 133 offenders, nearly all of whom were convicted and are now serving out their sentences in a State Penitentiary. In North Carolina, South Carolina, and Georgia a considerable number of persons were arrested. These active operations and arrests seem not to have at all deterred the violators of the laws. They are now more bold and defiant than ever, especially in North Carolina, South Carolina, and Georgia. They have combined together to resist the execution of the laws, and boast that they will resist to the end, and meet force with force. A few weeks ago, a party under charge of Revenue Agent Wagner, searching for illicit stills, were attacked at about daylight by a force of 20 armed men, and fired upon. On the 12th inst. Deputy Collector Barton, of the South Carolina District, and his assistant, Hendricks, were both wounded by a distiller whom they were attempting to arrest. Hendricks was fatally shot. Commissioner Raum says it is impossible to execute the laws in these States with the force now at his command or with any force that he can employ under the present appropriation. He recommends that the commanding officer of the military division or department embracing the States named be instructed to furnish a sufficient force of troops to assist the civil officers to execute the laws and arrest offenders. The letter of the Commissioner was made a subject of consideration at the Cabinet meeting to-day, having been presented by the Secretary of the Treasury, and has received the following indorsements:

Referred to the Secretary of War, who will please have the commander of the troops in the States referred to instructed to give all the aid necessary to enable the revenue officials to perform their duties and to arrest the violators of the revenue laws.
Jan. 19, 1877. U. S. GRANT."

Respectfully referred to the General of the Army, who will issue such instructions to the Commander of the Department of the South as will carry out the purpose of the President's indorsement.
J. D. CAMERON, Secretary of War.

DOMINION BOARD OF TRADE.

THIRD DAY OF THE SESSION—TRADE RELATIONS WITH THE UNITED STATES—THE DUTY ON CANNED FISH.

OTTAWA, Jan. 19.—This was the third day of the session of the Dominion Board of Trade. A letter was received from T. C. Keefe on the subject of promoting oyster culture in the Gulf of St. Lawrence, pointing out the adaptability of those waters for the purpose. The question of life insurance was taken up, and the following resolution in reference thereto was adopted:

That, inasmuch as the Government of Great Britain and some of its colonies have in operation a system of Government annuities and life assurances for the better protection of all classes of the community,

Resolved, That, while having due regard to existing interests, the board would respectfully bring the subject to the notice of the Government for its consideration.

The following resolution was also adopted:

Resolved, That the Dominion suffers from the United States demanding a duty on lobsters, or on packages containing them, which is deemed an infraction of the Treaty of Washington, and that the attention of the Government be called to the matter.

Another resolution was adopted, urging the Government to take measures for assimilating the Fishery laws of the Dominion with those of the United States bordering on the inland lakes and rivers.

THE CANAL FRAUDS.

THE LORD AND LEAHY CASE IN APPEAL ARGUED.

ALBANY, Jan. 19.—In the Supreme Court, General Term, to-day, was argued the case of The People, &c., against James Lord and John Leahy. This action was brought to recover $55,000 for damages alleged to have been sustained arising out of a contract for work done on the canals, and comes up on an appeal from a judgment of nonsuit in the court below. It was argued on behalf of the plaintiff, by Deputy Attorney General Paige, that the people were not precluded from maintaining the action because it did not act immediately upon discovery of the fraud; that the evidence offered by the defendants to prove the waiver, and upon which the nonsuit was granted, was not admissible, and that the cause of action was abundantly proved and had been so held in the court below. Mr. R. W. Peckham presented the case on the part of the defendants, and decision was reserved by the court.

SMALL-POX IN MANITOBA.

WINNIPEG, Jan. 18.—The small-pox at Gimli has abated, but is still prevalent at Big Island, Punk Island and Lake Winnipeg. The mortality among the Indians is very great. Dr. Beddome, at Fort Alexander, reports that there is no sickness on the east side of the lake.

ALBANY.

THE ELECTORAL RESOLUTIONS IN THE SENATE.

THEIR CONSIDERATION POSTPONED—BOTH SIDES INCLINED TO WAIT A LITTLE—BUSINESS IN THE ASSEMBLY—A STREET-CLEANING BILL—THE FIRST "STRIKE" OF THE SESSION.

From Our Own Correspondent.

ALBANY, Friday, Jan. 19, 1877.

The Senate chamber was well filled this morning with an audience eager to hear the expected debate on the resolutions relative to the counting of the Electoral vote. It was supposed that the Democrats would have their substitute ready, that the debate would be long, and that both parties would clearly define the position in which they stood upon this all-important question. All these expectations were disappointed. There was no debate worth recording; there was no Democratic substitute offered; there was not only no defining of party positions, but a studious avoidance of anything which even pointed that way. Both parties desired to wait a little, each for their own reasons. The resolutions were agreed to in the caucus of Republican Senators on Wednesday night—they were presented in the Senate Thursday morning. Simultaneous with their presentation came the news that a plan of compromise had been agreed upon at Washington; and it may be said here positively that the general temper of the Republican majority of the Legislature is favorable to the proposed settlement. By this is meant not that the plan in all its details commends itself to their judgment; but only that the fact of an agreement having been reached at all upon a subject on which agreement seemed impossible, is looked upon as a ray of light in a dark place, and as showing that a pathway can be found through what threatened to stand as a wall of rock. Under these circumstances, the temper of the Senate was favorable to postponing the passage of the resolutions; and the Democrats were most of all desirous that they should be postponed. They were not prepared to express opinions on the matter without consultation elsewhere than in Albany, and more particularly as the resolutions are so skillfully worded that it is difficult to take issue upon them without also taking issue with the Constitution. In their ignorance, however, of the change of mind in the majority, they came prepared to talk against time this morning, and by an adroit move, the hour of adjournment of the Senate was, on motion of Mr. Jacobs, fixed at 12:30, which left less than an hour to be consumed. When Mr. Woodin called up the resolutions, Mr. Jacobs asked for time, spoke of their great importance of the necessity for full debate, &c., and moved they be made the special order for Tuesday next. Mr. Woodin was not inclined to have debate. In fact, he thought it was better there should be none, for, as gentlemen on both sides were not likely to change their votes upon argument, it would be only wasting time to make any. Mr. Woodin's remarks were in an easy, good-humored strain, and he seemed more inclined to poke fun at Mr. Jacobs than to argue; in fact, he said he would not be drawn into an argument. Then came Mr. Gerard, who talked for five minutes in his usual facetious style, and set everybody laughing; and next came Mr. Bradley, who talked for another five minutes in his usual ponderous style, and would have put everybody to sleep had he continued longer; and lastly came Mr. Starbuck, who talked for ten minutes in his usual dry-bone style, and filled everybody with alarm that he would talk until the hour for adjournment. But he did not, and when he sat down, it being then 12:15, Mr. Woodin, with that peculiar smile which always foretells a little surprise, complimented Senator Jacobs on the neatness of the little trap he had set; and wound up his remarks by agreeing to allow the resolutions to go over to Tuesday next. Thereupon they were made the special order for that day by unanimous vote. It is not altogether sure that they will be passed. Mr. Woodin said that he was prepared to stand a deluge of oratory from the minority about bayonets, returning boards, Federal interference, will of the people, and all that, but he would venture to say that no one member of the minority would touch the real question at issue, and it is more than likely that they will not. The only point worthy of mention in the debate was the denial by Mr. Woodin of Mr. Jacobs' assertion that the highest Republican leaders at Washington had abandoned the position in respect to the powers of the Vice President over the Electoral vote. He, however, merely denied it, but refused to argue the point. The talk of all the Democratic Senators was simply a repetition in various ways and shapes that the subject was highly important, and time should be given to consider it. Mr. Starbuck acknowledged the skill and adroitness shown in the drawing of the resolutions.

The principal business beyond the above, done in either House to-day, was in the introduction of bills. Senator Baaden has an armory bill, also familiar here, creating a commission, consisting of various city officers, to pass upon the old claims for armory repairs, and all that sort of thing. These armory claimants seem inclined to ask everything except permission to sue for their claims in the courts, the same as other people do. Or if they go there, they want to go with a special law in their hands practically legalizing their claims, like the bill introduced in the Assembly yesterday.

In the Assembly, Mr. Cowdin introduced a bill in relation to cleaning the streets of the City. It so amends existing laws as to give to the Board of Police exclusive power and authority to clean all public streets, avenues, wharves, and piers; to remove daily, and as often as may be necessary, all ashes, garbage, and rubbish, dirt and sweepings of the streets, and all dead animals, offal, and other refuse matter; all fish, birds, and poultry in condition unfit for human food, and all manure, and all tainted or immature or impure meats, fish, and fowl, and also all other matter or nuisances which the Board of Health may order to be removed; the same to be disposed of in such a manner as not to be offensive or injurious to the public health. It authorizes the Board of Police to contract for the sale of street sweepings, ashes and garbage for the benefit of the City, on condition that the same shall be promptly removed and in a manner not detrimental to the public health; and also to enter into contracts with responsible parties for separate districts, each district not to exceed a precinct, for cleaning the streets, and collecting and removing to the dumping boards of the department, or other location stipulated in the contracts, all street sweepings, rubbish, and garbage, such contracts to be for one year or less period, and to contain specifications and conditions necessary to secure a complete performance of the work; the Board of Police, when satisfied that any contractor has failed to perform the conditions of the contract, may abrogate the same at one day's notice. The bill also gives the Board of Police power, on like stipulations and conditions, to contract with responsible persons to remove the street cleaning from the dumps of the department, and to dispose of the same. All moneys received under this section shall be paid over to the Chamberlain, and copies of all contracts made under this section shall be filed in the Finance Department of the City.

The first "strike" of the session has made its appearance in the Assembly, and characteristically, it comes from the notorious ex-Police Justice James E. Couiter, member from the Seventeenth District, which last session was so excellently represented by Mr. Graff. The bill proposes to reduce the fare on the Elevated Railway between the hours of 7 and 8 in the morning, and 6 and 8 in the evening to five cents between the Battery and Fifty-ninth street.

WILD BILL'S MURDERER TO BE HANGED.

YANKTON, Dakota Territory, Jan. 19.—In the Supreme Court of the Territory to-day the judgment of the United States District Court against Jack McCall for the murder of "Wild Bill" was affirmed. McCall will be executed on the 1st day of March.

SUICIDES.

EXETER, Jan. 19.—Samuel Miller, 80 years of age, committed suicide by hanging this afternoon.

PROVIDENCE, Jan. 19.—Thomas Langford, a silversmith, to-day died from the effects of a self-administered dose of strychnine.

FUNERAL OF REAR ADMIRAL SMITH.

WASHINGTON, Jan. 19.—The funeral of the late Rear Admiral Joseph Smith, United States Navy, took place at 11 o'clock to-day from St. John's Episcopal Church, and was attended by a large concourse of friends and relatives of the deceased. In compliance with his wishes, there was no escort of the Marine Corps, and the officers appeared in undress uniform. The casket, which was covered with black cloth, was devoid of ornamentation. The body was removed from the late residence of the deceased, and, preceded by the clergy, Rev. Drs. J. Vaughan Lewis, J. A. Harold, and Thomas Ritchie, and the pall-bearers, Gen. Sherman, Adjutant General Townsend, Quartermaster General Meigs, Admirals Selfridge, Radford, and Powell, Solicitor General Bowles, and Naval Constructor Lenthall, was borne up the aisle of the church by eight seamen, and placed in front of the chancel. The service of the church was read, and appropriate music was sung. The cortège was then formed and proceeded to Oak Hill, where the remains were placed in the family vault.

THE RECENT DUEL.

MR. BENNETT'S TRUNKS FOLLOW THEIR OWNER.

Another proof that Mr. James Gordon Bennett is now on his way to Europe, where he intends to stay for a long time, was furnished on Thursday, when 16 traveling trunks and five wine cases, marked "J. G. B." were shipped on the Hamburg steam-ship Lessing. The destination of these packages is Plymouth, England. Shortly before the Lessing left her dock a carriage containing a lady closely veiled and two gentlemen drove to the pier. The mysterious lady immediately went to a state-room, and did not emerge from it before the vessel started. The two gentlemen supervised the stowing away of the 16 trunks and five wine cases aforesaid, and afterward loitered near the steamer until she sailed. They watched her from the dock until she passed out of view. Then they moved away, like men from whose minds a great responsibility had been lifted.

It was learned yesterday that "Baron" Vogel, Mr. Bennett's valet, was a passenger on the Lessing, and acted as the escort of the veiled lady, who is believed to be Miss Jeannette Bennett. The "Baron" went on board the steam-ship early on Thursday, and remained in privacy until after she had left the pier.

Lawrence Jerome, John C. Heckaher, August Belmont, and Perry Belmont, all of whom are supposed to know more or less about the Bennett-May duel, were before the Grand Jury yesterday. The District Attorney was not present, and none of the gentlemen were kept longer than a few minutes. They were unable to give, of their own knowledge, any information in relation to the duel, and were therefore allowed to depart. So far, the Grand Jury has not been able to obtain a syllable more information in relation to the transaction than has appeared in THE TIMES. It is expected that Mr. Frederick May will be in the City to-day or to-morrow.

WASHINGTON, Jan. 19.—Fred May was interviewed last night in regard to the report charging that he ran away from Bennett after the snap of his pistol. He refused to say anything about it, remarking that it was his private business, and that he would not deny or affirm any reports in connection with the affair. He does not know where his antagonist, Bennett, is. May left the city last evening for the North.

AMUSEMENTS.

GENERAL MENTION.

Mr. Heller will give a matinée at his Wonder Theatre to-day.

The Aquarium invites inspection morning, afternoon, and evening.

The last matinée performance of "Azurene" at Niblo's is set down for to-day.

"Santa Claus" will have its last afternoon exposition at the Eagle Theatre, to-day.

"The Marble Heart" will be acted afternoon and evening, to-day, at the Park Theatre.

The first matinée representation of "Lemons" may be enjoyed at the Fifth Avenue Theatre to-day.

A day performance of "Uncle Tom's Cabin" is set down for this afternoon at the New Broadway Theatre.

The San Francisco Minstrels are to offer their habitual Saturday après midi entertainment, this afternoon.

Mr. Booth acts Richelieu at to-day's matinée at the Lyceum Theatre, and appears in "The Stranger," this evening.

"Forbidden Fruit" will be withdrawn after its performance this afternoon and this evening at Wallack's Theatre.

The last matinée performance of "Dan'l Druce," and its last representation but one, occurs to-day at Booth's Theatre.

The sale of seats for Miss Kellogg's representation of English opera at the Academy of Music is now in progress. The indications point to a very brilliant season.

THE STEAMER GEORGE CROMWELL.

THE PASSENGERS AND CREW OF THE MISSING STEAMER—THE VESSEL POSSIBLY DISABLED AND DRIVEN TO THE WEST INDIES.

HALIFAX, Jan. 19.—The cabin passengers of the missing steamer George Cromwell, hence for St. Johns, N. F., are F. N. Jordan, W. N. Roper, and Charles E. Lyler. There are only two or three steerage passengers, whose names are unknown. E. B. Bacon was her Captain, Mr. Corkian, first officer, Mr. Bacon, a brother of the Captain, second officer, and a son of the Captain was steward. The crew numbered about 20, and all belonged to New-York. Here the vessel hailed from. It is possible she became disabled and was driven off to the West Indies.

THE WEATHER.

INDICATIONS.

WASHINGTON, Jan. 20—1 A. M.—In the lower lake region and Middle States, falling and low barometer, increasing south-east to south-west winds, stormy and rainy weather, followed by rising barometer and winds shifting to colder north-westerly.

In New-England, falling and low barometer, increasing south-west to south-east winds, and warmer, cloudy, followed by stormy weather, with rain.

Meech, Buffalo, No. 9, Grand Watchmen. It is expected the sessions will close to-morrow.

FATAL CASUALTIES.

WORCESTER, Jan. 19.—John Hickey an engineer at the Millbury Cotton Mills, in Millbury, was scalded to death this morning by the bursting of the throttle-valve of his engine while he was getting up steam. The damage to the machinery will amount to about $500. Joseph H. Hayward was injured fatally yesterday in the woods of Millbury by a tree falling and crushing him.

BOSTON, Jan. 19.—Richard Hemenway, of South Framingham, Mass., was run over by a train of cars at that place to-day and killed, his head being severed from the body.

HORSE RACING AT CHARLESTON.

CHARLESTON, Jan. 19.—This was the third day of the races on the Washington Course. The first race was a two-mile dash for all ages. There were but two entries, Hatteras and Jim Hinton. The race was won by the former in 3:54½. In the second race, mile and a half dash for all ages, there were three entries, Tom O'Neil, First Chance, and Franz. Tom O'Neil won the race, and the other two came in in the order named. Time—2:46½. The track was improved, but the weather dull and the attendance small.

FIFTY DOLLARS FOR A RESERVED SEAT.

BOSTON, Jan. 19.—The net receipts of the Murdoch testimonial entertainment at the Boston Theatre this afternoon were $3,400. Several seats were sold at auction to-day, Joseph Murphy, the Irish comedian, leading with a bid of $50 for a single seat.

SIOUX INDIANS IN ONTARIO.

OTTAWA, Jan. 19.—The Free Press says information has been received at the Capitol that 500 families of Sioux Indians, recently in hostility with the United States Government, crossed the North-western border and encamped near Wood Mountain. They are peaceably disposed

TURKEY AND RUSSIA.

COMMENTS OF THE LONDON PRESS.

THE WORK OF THE CONFERENCE—THE TIMES SAYS THE RESULT WILL SURPRISE NOBODY—THE NEWS SAYS TURKEY MUST DEPEND ON HER OWN SWORD—THE POST CALLS IT A NATIONAL DETERMINATION—OPINIONS OF THE TELEGRAPH, STANDARD, &C.

LONDON, Jan. 19.—The Times of to-day, referring to the result of the conference, says: "This event will surprise nobody. Those whom it will disappoint are fewer than they may have been even at the opening of the new year. The friends of the Turks are naturally delighted at the spirit and courage displayed by the Porte and the supposed humiliation which has befallen the diplomatists who presumed to trespass on the sovereign rights of the Sultan. What will be the effect of the Porte's decision on the peace of Europe? There are those who declare themselves absolutely certain that Russia will not attack Turkey; there are those, on the other hand, who profess to detect consummate astuteness in Gen. Ignatieff's moderation, and who will now say that he knew from the first how surely the fanaticism of Constantinople would force the Porte to open defiance. On this subject we shall be content to form a judgment on events as they occur, without speculation or prediction. There can be no doubt that Russia is in a most difficult position; between a war from which it can expect no permanent advantage, and a pledge which, if not redeemed, will discredit the throne. In any case it is not to be assumed that a decision for peace or war will necessarily be made at once. It is quite possible that weeks may pass amid new diplomatic overtures before Russia thinks it convenient to announce her final resolution. Perhaps the dissolution of the conference marks the beginning of a new phase, in which the Western powers will be for a time inactive, and the three Imperial Courts will once more concern themselves with the business."

The Daily News says: "The effort at diplomatic coercion came far too late; it never had a fair chance. Long before the Western plenipotentiaries reached Constantinople the Turkish Government and people had been filled with the idea that England would in the last resource stand by the friend of the Ottoman Empire. We have shown that even while the conference was sitting only too much reason was given them, despite Lord Salisbury, to cherish the same conviction. At the same time we own to a certain feeling of satisfaction that Turkey has taken her honor and integrity into her own hands. We, as a State, have nothing more to do with them. With the breaking of the conference ends the old-fashioned policy which accepted Turkey as the hereditary responsibility of England. Henceforward Turkey must patch up its credit the best way it can and fight its own battles. We do not know how soon it may be called upon to test its new mettle, but soon or late it must depend on its own sword. Although the conference is over, the troubles it sought to settle are troubles still. The world must look with some anxiety to see in what shape and from what quarter the next attempt to bring Turkey to reason will arise."

The Post says: "The important act thus achieved possesses every characteristic of a national determination. Its importance is only equaled by its dignity. At a time when treaties have been torn to rags and international equity disregarded; when the might of huge powers and overwhelming armies is terrorizing smaller States; when each giant is restrained by no consideration of law or justice, but only by calculations of brute force and the weighing of alliances pro and con, it has been reserved for Turkey to stand forth boldly as the champion of treaty rights and European order. The attitude of the Sultan must win the admiration of all who are sufficiently unprejudiced to admit that the spirit of chivalry and patriotism has not yet been effaced from mankind. If, as we are confident they will, the Turks, under the able guidance of Midhat Pasha, carry into effective being their new parliamentary system, so as to improve their Government, redeem their finances, and establish civil and religious liberty, they will certainly win back the warm esteem of England, which will gladly see in renovated Turkey a nation of freemen whose conduct may open up a new political horizon, showing the dawn of constitutional principles in the East." The Post ventures no predictions about the attitude of the other powers.

The Daily Telegraph says: "It cannot be doubted that the sum and substance of this decision are what the Turkish representatives will report in reply when they next meet the European delegates in conference. The judgment of the Sultan's chief councilors and ecclesiastical magnates will be surely indorsed to-morrow by Safvet Pasha, Minister of Foreign Affairs, and Edhem Pasha, President of the Council of State, in the name of the Sultan and the Ottoman people, even though it be accompanied by polite explanations, or a slight offer of conciliation. Should the Envoys, as cannot be doubted, part to-morrow, the chief difficulty is for Russia. Her wisest course will be to regard Bulgaria, henceforth, as of European moment, and give Turkey time and fair play. Many unexpected incidents and policies may now suddenly develop, and since these lie outside, our influence and attention must be turned to our own statesmen and countrymen. Great discussion will follow these negotiations. We trust it is not too much to hope that after such a warning as recent events have given the anti-English party, it might chiefly be animated by national and international interests. We must admonish those who are preparing to make political missiles of their own demolished statements that the more the history of the past six months is elucidated the more fatally it appears that the designs of those who talked most loudly of Christian philanthropy partook least of its spirit. Light will possibly be thrown upon incidents now imperfectly understood, such as the origin of the Bulgarian massacres, the proposed occupation of the provinces, the reasons for the dispatch of the British fleet, and the suggested use of it to coerce the Porte. Those who declaim upon the merits of this business hastily are likely to repent their loquacity at leisure, since the full story of the dangers which the conference averted is yet to be heard. When all is known we are mistaken if Prince Gortschakoff will look, as perhaps he now does, to the advent of a Liberal Ministry to power in England. Whatever party had ruled during the past year must have acted as this Government did, having their information, or stood condemned for a want of fidelity to European peace and national interests. Whatever party shall hereafter hold sway, when all the past, is known will never be suffered by public opinion to connive at schemes for the disruption of the Turkish Empire, if they bear even a distant resemblance to those which have been frustrated with all the success and none of the cost and sorrow of a triumphant military campaign."

The Standard says: "We are not sure the decision of the council is wise. The proposals had been reduced so far that it is uncertain they would not have been further softened had the Porte consented to discuss them. The question now is, what will Russia do? Defied by the Porte after minimizing her demands again and again, will she eat the words of the Moscow speech, withdraw her mobilized regiments, and preserve peace? There are signs pointing in that direction. All our intelligence is to the effect that the enthusiasm for war has cooled down, and that the public are waking up to a sense of the risks of an invasion of Turkey. The press seem to be preparing the public mind for a retreat by representing the failure of the conference as a defeat, not of Russia, but of England. Possibly all this weakness is assumed. At any rate, it is certain that the work of mobilization shows no slackness. In a letter which we published yesterday, our correspondent explained how formidable the Russian preparations are, and assured us that the reports of suffering and disorganization are exaggerated. This perseverance in massing a great army on the Turkish frontier does not look like an intention to submit to diplomatic defeat. The truth doubtless is that the Russians are yet uncertain regarding Prince Bismarck's intentions, and consequently are hesitating. That they must fight Austria if they invade Turkey seems certain unless Prince Bismarck repays the debt of 1870. We have but to reflect upon the excitement created in Prague by Gen. Tchernayeff's presence, to form an idea of the effect on the Austrian Slaves of a series of Russian victories south of the Danube. Clearly Austria could not remain quiet in such a contingency, but how would Prince Bismarck act? Germany's permanent interests undoubtedly forbid Russian aggrandizement, but meantime an alliance with Russia might add to Germany a much coveted seaboard and still severed members of the German race. Russia then can bid highly for aid. She needs to protect her right flank when crossing the Danube, and she is not without hope of making the bargain. In any case, however, it is unlikely that war will break out immediately. Neither Russia nor Turkey are ready to move, and the season forbids serious military operations. We must look forward, therefore, to a few months more of uncertainty and disquiet."

The Pall Mall Gazette of this afternoon says: "But for an accident—but for the happy expulsion of the Gladstone Government from office three years ago, what we have now learned we should have learned after a war—war with England and Russia on one side, and Turkey, Germany, Austria, Italy, and Greece, too, perhaps, on the other, and with the whole mass of the Mohammedan population of India ardent for our defeat. As it is, we have enlarged our knowledge and deepened our insight at no such risks, and what we have learned to-day will be extremely useful in averting war in the future, or at least in guiding us with greater confidence through the dangers of war, should it be forced upon us. But the immediate question is What will be the action of Russia? Very much depends upon the internal condition of the Empire, and the view its rulers may take of the alternatives before them; and we in England have no accurate measure of the considerations which distract their counsels, or, even if we had accurate knowledge of them, we should yet have to learn how they affect the particular minds which in Russia have the immediate disposal of events. There are such things as points of honor, religious feeling, and dynastic fears, and these, speaking in a single mind, or in two or three minds, may not be quite in harmony with the voice of prudence and the verdict of calculation. Whatever may be the upshot, it will not surprise us if at this point the Czar or his Ministers issue a new declaration of the Moscow kind."

COMPLICATIONS IN EUROPE.

PARIS, Jan. 20.—The Republique Française publishes a letter which states that work on the fortifications at Metz and Strasbourg is being pushed forward to completion with the utmost haste, and great stores of provisions are arriving. The Temps, however, discredits the alarmist inferences which the Republique seeks to draw.

LONDON, Jan. 20.—A special dispatch from Pesth reports that the Russian volunteers, who had left Belgrade, have been ordered to stop at Turnaverin and await fresh orders.

The Cologne Gazette says telegrams from French sources, announcing that German troops would co-operate with the Russians, have excited Mussulman fanaticism against the German colonies in the neighborhood of Jaffa and Beyrout. Immediately on hearing of this, the German Government called the attention of the Porte to the matter and ordered the German man-of-war Gazelle to cruise along the Syrian shore and visit particularly Jaffa, Haifa, and Beyrout. England and Austria readily promised to co-operate in the protection of the German colonies. The German Government, therefore, hopes it has acted in time to ward off all danger.

The Berlin Reichsanziger publishes a Paris letter commenting on the eagerness of the French press to attack Germany's Eastern policy. It also states that the French sailors of the Chatean Renaud recently provoked a quarrel with the sailors of the German gun-boat Meteor at Smyrna, and one of the latter was killed while defending himself.

The Deutsche Zeitung reports that Russia has sent fresh orders to the United States for large quantities of arms and ammunition, and has requested the Austrian contractors for cartridges to hurry deliveries; but they will be unable to make any deliveries before the date originally fixed.

CONSTANTINOPLE, Jan. 19.—Mehemed Rudchi Pasha, late Grand Vizier, has been appointed Minister without portfolio.

The Vienna correspondent of a morning paper says it is a fact that the Porte on Tuesday last informed Servia that it would on no consideration renew the armistice, but would march on Belgrade if Servia did not treat directly with Turkey for peace before March 1. Prince Milan is known to have expressed himself strongly in favor of such peace.

THE COTTON AND GRAIN TRADE.

LIVERPOOL, Jan. 19.—The circular of the Liverpool Cotton Brokers' Association, in its review of the week ending last night, says: "Cotton was quiet throughout the week, with a comparatively limited business. There was a very free supply, and prices for almost every description are lower. American has been in moderate request, and prices for medium and lower grades have declined about 3-16d. For Sea Island the demand was small and prices remain steady. In futures business was moderate, with daily reductions in prices."

A leading grain circular says: "The weather was less unsettled this week, but still there has been much more than an average rain-fall. The wheat markets of the country are generally quiet, with scarcely any variation from the prices previously quoted. The demand off the coast has been but moderate, with prices quotably unchanged, though bidders are barely up to recent sales. Several cargoes of Californian for shipment have been taken at extreme prices. A quiet tone has prevailed on the spot since Tuesday at the rates of that day. At this market to-day the attendance was limited, and the demand for wheat proportionate. A somewhat restricted business was done at Tuesday's prices. Flour was unaltered. Corn was slow at the last quotation. The temperature is very mild for the time of year."

LAWLESSNESS IN MISSOURI.

ST. LOUIS, Jan. 19.—A special dispatch to the Globe-Democrat from Carthage, Mo., gives a brief account of a riot at Webb City yesterday. It appears that a somewhat notorious fellow named Bud Blunt was arrested for violating the city ordinances, and, not being able to pay the fine assessed was lodged in the calaboose. Subsequently he was released, and in a spirit of revenge he, with his brother and a large number of followers, procured several guns and pistols and opened fire on the citizens promiscuously. About 200 shots were fired, and seven persons badly wounded, including two of the assailants. Several horses were fired into, two horses killed, and two men severely beaten. Great excitement prevailed. The citizens rallied, and 10 of the rioters were arrested and will be prosecuted to the extent of the law.

SUDDEN DEATH IN A CHURCH.

Special Dispatch to the New-York Times.

HUDSON, Jan. 19.—Mr. N. B. Merrick, an old and highly respected citizen of this place, dropped dead this morning while in attendance at prayer-meeting in the Presbyterian Church. He was a deeply interested participant in the religious services, and was in the very act of prayer when struck down by apoplexy. The deceased was formerly a resident of Rochester.

MRS. MARY J. HOLMES

Has just commenced a new story entitled "The Forrest House; or, Everard's Repentance." This charming story is now ready in the New-York Weekly.—Exchange.

THE lungs are strained and racked by a persistent cough, the general strength wasted, and an incurable complaint often established thereby. Dr. JAYNE'S EXPECTORANT is an effective remedy for Coughs and Colds, and exerts a beneficial effect on the Pulmonary and Bronchial Organs.—Advertisement.

TO DO the best thing possible to be done, and to spare no pains in doing it, sum up the conditions of great successes. It is, therefore, proper to present for B. T. BARRY'S TOILET SOAP an overwhelming popularity. An exhaustive chemical skill and perfect honesty of purpose enter into the composition of it, for the fine vegetable oils are unscented, except by their own pleasant odor.—Advertisement.

LELAND'S STURTEVANT HOUSE, Broadway, 28th, and 29th sts., New-York. Rooms with board reduced to $3 and $3 50 per day. Rooms only $1 per day and upward.—Advertisement.

WE EMPLOY no canvassers. Buyers of the HOME SEWING-MACHINE and HALL TREADLE allowed canvasser's commission. No. 30 Union square.—Advertisement.

Everdell's, 302 Broadway, elegant Wedding and Ball Cards, Foreign Note Papers, Coat of Arms, &c., lowest prices.

If your Hair is Gray, use Parker's Hair BALSAM. You will be delighted with the way it restores the color.

Public Speakers and Singers will find "BROWN'S BRONCHIAL TROCHES" beneficial in clearing the voice before speaking or singing, and relieving the throat after any exertion of the vocal organs. For Coughs and Colds the TROCHES are effectual.

Holmes' Burglar Alarm Telegraph Company, No. 571 Broadway. Within a few months we have arrested two burglars in the store of J. Thornton, Walker st.; one in Bacon & Eaton's, Walker st., and two in H. B. Claflin's. We never fail. We jingle no bell at your door. We appropriate no 600 names from other parties to our circulars.

First Premium.

FRIDAY, Jan. 19—P. M.

The stock speculation to-day was irregular, with frequent but not wide fluctuations in prices. The entire business amounted to 92,300 shares, which embraced 21,500 Western Union, 16,100 New-Jersey Central, 12,000 Lake Shore, 11,200 St. Paul, 8,500 Erie, 6,400 Delaware, Lackawanna and Western, 6,300 Michigan Central, and 2,500 Pacific Mail. The coal stocks were strong, especially New-Jersey Central, which, on reports that the company had effected a satisfactory settlement with the Lehigh Navigation Company, advanced from 34¼ to 36¼, with closing sales at 35½. In sympathy with New-Jersey Central, Delaware, Lackawanna and Western rose from 75 to 76, but later reacted, and closed at 74⅞. The bull speculation in Western Union still hangs fire, and appearances strongly indicate that the parties to the pool constitute a by no means happy family, and that each member of the household is a little but suspicious of the good faith of his associates, and fears that some one or other may attempt to steal a march upon him and realise before the appointed time. The fluctuations in the stock to-day ranged within ⅜ ₱ cent., the closing transactions being effected at 76. Lake Shore opened at 55¼, advanced to 55½, and closed at 55⅜. Michigan Central recorded an improvement of ¼ ₱ cent on the day's transactions. Illinois Central continues to travel on the down grade, and to-day declined from 87¾ to 86¾, with only a recovery of ⅛ ₱ cent in the final dealings. The statement which was made yesterday to impart life and animation to Pacific Mail, several previous efforts of the same kind, seems to have been abortive, as the dullness in the stock to-day was in marked contrast with the spasmodic activity which characterized the dealings yesterday, the transactions amounting to 2,500 shares as against 1,500 on Thursday. The price, however, was well maintained at 25@25⅛, the former being the closing figure. The granger shares were firm. Investment shares were firm and higher, New-York Central advancing to 103¼ and Rock Island to 101⅝.

The money market worked smoothly, and during the greater part of the day borrowers on call found difficulty in supplying their wants at 4@5 ₱ cent. Toward the close there were abundant offers of capital, and the rate declined to 3 ₱ cent.

The national bank notes received for redemption at Washington to-day amounted to $700,000. The following were the rates of exchange on New-York at the undermentioned cities: Savannah, buying, 3-16; selling, par; St. Louis, 75 premium; Cincinnati firm, buying, 50 par; selling, 50 premium; Chicago, 50 premium; New-Orleans, commercial, ⅜@7-16; bank, ½; Charleston, easy, ¼ discount, par.

The foreign advices reported a slight decline in British consols, which was doubtless attributable to the more war-like aspect of the Eastern Question, created by the refusal of the Turkish Government to accede to the propositions of the other European powers. Consols for both money and the account closed at 95¼@95⅜. American securities were strong and higher, at an advance of ⅛ to ⅜ ₱ cent. Old 1865s closed at 105½, 1867s at 109¼@109⅝, 10-40s at 109½, and new 5s at 107⅛. Erie common was unchanged, but the preferred made an advance of ¾ ₱ cent. French rentes made a slight decline. The Bank of England lost £80,000 on balance to-day. Bar silver is quoted in the London market at 58¼d. ₱ ounce.

The Sterling Exchange market was quiet and unchanged. Prime bankers' bills sold at $4 83 for long, and at $4 84½@$4 84¾ for demand, the nominal asking rates remaining at $4 83½ and $4 85½.

There was a very limited speculation in gold, and the market was steady at 106⅜@106¼. The former was the opening and the latter the closing quotation. On gold loans the rates ranged from 5 to 2 ₱ cent. for carrying. The last loans were made flat.

Government bonds were strong, and prices made a further advance of ⅛@¼ ₱ cent., New 1865s selling up to 110⅜, 1867s to 113⅜, and to 109¼ for old 1865s. The demand was active again to-day, while the offerings were small on account of the large amounts recently taken from the street for investment. The market at the close was strong in tone. The transactions in railroad mortgages were small outside of Union Pacific Firsts, $50,000 of which changed hands at 103⅜@103¼. Chicago and Northwestern consolidated coupon sevens advanced nearly 1 ₱ cent., selling at 92¾@92⅞. Rock Island 7s rose to 109⅜; New-York Central 6s of 1887 to 104½; Union Pacific Land Grants to 101⅞; North Missouri Firsts to 97; Pacific of Missouri Firsts to 98½, and Toledo and Wabash Firsts, St. Louis Division, to 80. Milwaukee and St. Paul, La Crosse Division, declined to 99; de. Consolidated Sinking Funds to 83½, and Ohio and Mississippi Consolidated Sinking Funds to 83½. In State bonds, Louisiana Consolidated, which were offered yesterday at 56, sold at 58¾. Missouri Long 6s rose to 104⅜. Tennessee new were steady at 43½. District of Columbia 3.65s advanced to 73@73⅛.

The imports of dry goods at the port of New-York for the week ending this date were $1,835,140, and the amount marketed $1,870,923. The total imports of dry goods at the port since Jan. 1, were $4,707,168, and the total amount marketed, $4,687,431.

A DECISION AGAINST THE GOVERNMENT.

THE STOCKHOLDERS TO BE PAID FIRST—AN ELABORATE OPINION BY JUSTICE STRONG—PROBABILITIES OF AN APPEAL.

From Our Own Correspondent.

PHILADELPHIA, Friday, Jan. 19, 1877.

A decision in the case of the Government against the Centennial Board of Finance, involving the return of $1,500,000 appropriated by Congress for the International Exhibition, was announced today in the United States Circuit Court here. Judge Cadwalader read the opinion, as received from Justice Strong. It gives great satisfaction, and, although it has not been officially announced, it is known that United States District Attorney Valentine will appeal in the matter, and have the case carried to the United States Supreme Court. The decision of Justice Strong is against the Government, and, under its rulings, the stockholders will be paid before the million and a half dollars are returned to the Government. It is believed that, under this decision, those holding stock will receive about 80 cents on the dollar invested. The decision, while covering this case fully, also contains valuable information regarding the organization of stock companies in general. The hearing was had on Saturday, 6th inst., before Judges Strong and McKennan, when the arguments made were reported in full in THE TIMES. A few days more than one month have been consumed since the case was first commenced until the decision to-day.

Justice Strong, after reciting the claim of the United States and the inauguration of the Centennial Exhibition, says:

Thus it plainly appears, not only that the Exhibition was a national one, set on foot and sanctioned by Congress, but that the Centennial Commission and the Centennial Board were made the agents of the Government in preparing and conducting it. Under this legislation the corporation was authorized, and stock subscriptions, for which certificates were issued to the amount of about $2,400,000, were made, which are still outstanding. The subscriptions were made in reliance upon the provisions of the act of Congress. The number of subscribers was very large, and they are scattered all over the United States, holding the stock in various amounts, from one share to 10,000, the number held by the State of New-Jersey. Such has been the action of Congress, and such were the rights of stockholders when the act of Feb. 16, 1867, was enacted, out of which arises the controversy in this case. Its preamble is significant. After referring to the act of March 3, 1871, and the act of June 1, 1872, and after reciting that the President of the United States, in compliance with a joint resolution of Congress, approved June 5, 1874, had extended to foreign nations, in the name of the United States, an invitation to take part in the International Exposition to be held in Philadelphia, under the auspices of the Government, and after reciting that the Governments so invited, to the number of 38, had accepted the invitation, and were making extensive preparations to embrace the courtesy so extended to them, "thereby rendering proper arrangements for the coming ceremonies, on the part of the Government of the United States, a matter of honor and good faith," the preamble asserted that the preparations designed by the United States Centennial Commission, and in part executed by the Centennial Board of Finance, were in accordance with the spirit of the acts of Congress relating thereto, and on a scale creditable to the Government and people of the United States. It was therefore enacted as follows:

"That the sum of $1,500,000 to complete the Centennial buildings and other preparations be, and the same is hereby appropriated out of any moneys in the United States Treasury not otherwise appropriated, which shall be paid on the drafts of the President and Treasurer of the Centennial Board of Finance, one-third immediately after the passage of this act, and the remainder in four equal monthly payments, provided that in the distribution of any moneys that may remain in the treasury of the Centennial Board of Finance, after the payment of its debts, as provided for by the 10th section of the act of Congress, approved June 1, 1872, incorporating said Centennial Board of Finance, the appropriation hereby made shall be repaid in full into the Treasury of the United States, before any dividend or percentage of the profits shall be paid to the holders of said stock. Provided also, that the Government of the United States shall not, under any circumstances, be liable for any debt or obligation of the United States Centennial Commission, or the Centennial Board of Finance, or any payment in addition to the foregoing sum."

The appropriation was avowedly made to complete the necessary preparations for a celebration and exhibition which Congress had declared national, and under its sanction, to which other nations had been invited by the Government to join, and the proper arrangements for which the preamble to the act declared to be a matter of honor and good faith on the part of the Government of the United States. It was, therefore, meeting at least an honorable obligation, and that it was so considered may be inferred from the closing words of the section, which declared the United States should not be liable for any obligation or payment "in addition to the sum" appropriated. A careful inspection of this act, under which alone the United States asserts a claim to any portion of the funds in the hands of the complainants, makes it evident that Congress did not intend thereby to create the relation of debtor and creditor between the Centennial Board of Finance and the United States. The language used is the ordinary language of an appropriation, not of a loan. No evidences of debt were required from the board. Bonds were not exacted for the return of the money, though by the act of 1872 the board was empowered to borrow money and give bonds therefor, and though the President of the board was required by the second section of this act to execute a bond with sufficient security in the sum of $560,000, conditioned for the safekeeping and faithful disbursement of the sum appropriated. Were it not for the proviso relative to the distribution of any moneys that might remain in the treasury of the board, or (as they are called in the act of 1872) "remaining assets," after the payment of all its liabilities, there could be no pretense that the act was anything more than a mere appropriation demanded by the honor and good faith of the Government. But even the proviso repels the idea that the board became a debtor by receiving the sum appropriated. It reserves no right to the United States until the debts of the board shall have been paid. It is only "after the payment of the debts," not after the payment of its other debts, but after all its debts shall have been satisfied, that any payment into the Treasury of the United States is required to be made. If the appropriation was intended to be a loan merely, it created a debt, and was demandable as such, without adding the words, "after payment of its debts." It would be an absurd measure to attribute to Congress that they intended to say that after the payment of its debts the board shall pay another one of its debts. And if it had been intended the board should be a debtor for the amount of the appropriation, but that its payment should be postponed till the other debts were paid, the language used would have been, "after its other debts are discharged," or words equivalent. It seems plain, therefore, even from the reading of the proviso, that it was not the purpose of Congress to assume for the Government the position of a creditor. That was carefully avoided. Congress had in view the fact that at the close of the Exhibition, its agent, the corporation, would wind up, and, after paying its debts, would distribute its remaining assets, and the proviso preserves nothing more than a right to be a possible distributee of a portion of those assets. It was not known how large they would be; whether they would suffice to repay what the stockholders had paid in and profit on their investment or not. It may have been supposed the Exhibition would yield profits on the investment.

If, then, the appropriation was not intended to have the character of a loan, creating a debt of the board, and to be paid as a debt, the stockholders who subscribed for the stock have, by the tenth section of the act of 1876, a clear right to the "remaining assets," at least to the extent of their capital invested. The section enacted, as we have seen, that after the close of the Exhibition it should be the duty of the board to convert its property into cash, and after the payment of all its liabilities, (or debts, as they are called in the act of 1876,) to divide its remaining assets pro rata among its stockholders, in full satisfaction and discharge of its capital stock. The stockholders were thus entitled to a satisfaction of their stock out of whatever assets remained after the payment of the debts of their corporation. It is not to be assumed that Congress intended to take away those rights without the consent of the stockholders. The directors of the corporation could not bargain them away. And there are no words of repeal in the later act; nor is there any necessary implication of an intent to repeal. The proviso, therefore, must receive a construction, consistent, so far as possible, with the provisions of the act of 1872. Its direction is that after the payment of the debts of the Centennial Board, the appropriation shall be paid, in full, into the Treasury of the United States before any "dividend or percentage of the profits shall be paid to the holders of the stock." What is here meant by "dividend or percentage of profits?" It is observable that in all the legislation respecting the Centennial Exhibition, the word "profits" here first appears. In the act of 1872 the residue after payment of the liabilities was called "remaining assets," and in a former part of this act it was called "moneys that remain." But when the fund is mentioned, to which the United States may resort in case there is such a fund, it is called profits. The phraseology is changed, and with it, we think, the meaning. So far as the United States has rights as a distributor, the subject for distribution is "profits," not "remaining assets," not capital. Before any dividend or percentage or proportion of the profits may be paid to the stockholders, the appropriation must be paid into the United States Treasury. If there are no profits, the Government has no claim. Now, what are the profits of a corporation that has a capital stock? Very plainly, only what has been gained beyond the stock. They are always acquisitions beyond the investment or expenditures. Nobody would think a tax on the profits of a bank or an insurance company, or, indeed, of any corporation, was a tax on its capital or a tax on its entire property, if that property had been counted into cash in the process of winding up. Congress, in the proviso, is speaking of the profits of a corporation, and it is to them, and them only, it sets up a claim. But in this case there were no profits. The assets remaining after the payment of debts, and now for distribution, are only remnants of the capital, and insufficient to return what the stockholders paid in. We think the word "dividend," as well as the word percentage, points to profits and not to capital. They are synonyms as here employed. That the word dividend is sometimes used to describe a distribution of capital may be admitted, but such a use is abnormal. It is more commonly used to denote a division of profits, and very evidently it was so employed in this proviso. It was not said dividend unqualifiedly, or dividend of the remaining assets, or dividend of remaining moneys that remain after payment of debts, but it was used in connection with profits; "dividend or percentage of the profits"—that is, as we understand the phrase, dividend, portion, or percentage of the profits. If it was intended to embrace a division of all the money remaining in the treasury of the board why were the words "or percentages of the profits" added? If the amount appropriated was meant to be paid before the stockholders could get anything, those added words were totally unnecessary and unmeaning. The introduction of the word profits would have had no other object than to designate the subject of the dividend or percentage. If it was intended to give the United States a prior claim on the entire remaining assets, it would have been sufficient to have said before any dividend or division shall be made among the stockholders—and we are not at liberty to say the added words have no meaning.

For these reasons we are of the opinion that the fund in the treasury of the Centennial Board of Finance should be distributed pro rata among the stockholders of this corporation, as directed by the tenth section of the act of 1872, and as it is insufficient to pay the stockholders the full amount invested by them, as stockholders, as no part of it is made up of profits, the case contemplated in the proviso has not arisen, and the United States is entitled to no part of the funds.

Let a decree be prepared accordingly.

The following is a copy of the decree, which was formally entered:

"CIRCUIT COURT OF THE UNITED STATES, &c.—The Centennial Board of Finance vs. Patterson et al.—And now, this 19th day of January, 1877, this case having been heard upon the bill and answers, and having been argued by counsel, whereupon, in consideration thereof, it is ordered and decreed that it be complainants do pay and distribute the fund in their hands to and among the several and respective stockholders of the complainant, pro rata, according to the true intent and meaning of the act of Congress approved the 16th day of February, 1876, and it appearing that the said fund is not sufficient to pay to the said stockholders the full amount invested by them, it is ordered that no part of said fund be paid into the Treasury of the United States. And it is further ordered that upon such payment and distribution among the said stockholders being made, the complainant do stand discharged of and from all liability in the premises. And it is further ordered that the costs in this cause be paid out of the said fund."

FAILURES LAST YEAR.

A COMPARISON WITH 1875—REDUCTION OF AVERAGE LIABILITIES—THE STATE OF TRADE IN THE COUNTRY — CIRCUMSTANCES WHICH POINT TO A HEALTHY CONDITION OF TRADE.

The annual circular to the trade of Messrs. Dun, Barlow & Co. has just been issued, and it contains a large amount of interesting information concerning the past, present, and prospective trade of the nation. The total number of failures in the United States during 1876 was 9,092, as compared with 7,740 in 1875. The amount of liabilities in 1875 was $201,060,353, while in 1876 it was $191,117,786. These figures show an increase of 1,350 failures over the number reported in 1875, but the liabilities in 1876, notwithstanding the increase in the number of failures, show a diminution, and the average indebtedness last year in each failure was but $21,020, as compared with $25,960 for each failure in 1875. The number of failures in New-York State in 1876 were 998, involving $19,311,933, while in 1875 there were 706 failures, with $11,920,822 liabilities. In 1875 the number of failures in New-York City were 951, with liabilities of $49,263,667, while in 1876 there were in the City 837 failures, with liabilities amounting to $33,244,018. The average amount of indebtedness in failures in this City in 1875 was $51,769, while in 1876 it was but $37,499. The reduction in the average liabilities indicates that a greater number of small traders were included. The severity of the financial pressure in different sections of the country is shown by the following table:

	No. of failures.	Amount Liabilities.	Average Liabilities.
New-England States.....	1,314	$37,657,062	$28,828
Middle States.....	2,909	72,244,681	24,809
Western States.....	3,139	52,870,541	16,843
Southern States.....	1,361	23,033,266	16,960
Pacific States.....	369	5,262,236	14,261
Canada.....	78	23,117,991	14,767

These figures confirm the impression that trade has been less disastrous in the West and South than in the Eastern and Middle States. In the Middle States failures occurred in every 57 names reported in business, while in the Western States the proportion is one in 72. The comparison between the East and South shows one failure in 59 names in the former, to one in 64 in the latter. In Canada, where there is a gold basis and light taxation, the showing indicates greater pressure than exists in the United States, the failures being one in 32. The figures for the United States show a failure of one in every 63, indicating that the pressure has not been so great in this country as elsewhere, or that it has been borne with less disastrous results than abroad. Were it not for the fact that these failures are largely due to departure in years gone by from correct business principles, the prospect would be disheartening. It would be unfair to conclude that trade is unpromising, as a wider view may bring more comfort. The past year has witnessed a marked improvement in the values of many leading staples; in extent of profitable trade there has been a perceptible gain, and in many branches of business a larger number added to their surplus in 1876 than in 1875. Many articles have reached a par of value, the speculative spirit has been regulated, and the pressure to sell diminished. An improvement took place in September and October, but, says the circular: "The heated Presidential contest and the miserable muddle that followed it completely paralyzed business." Chief of the adverse influences that have been at work against business is the National Bankrupt law. So long as it is allowed to remain in its present shape, unprincipled traders will be able to dictate terms to those whose interests should entitle them to the permanent control of the bankrupt's estate. If there is any disposition of Congress to attend to subjects of really practical advantage, there is none, they say, to which its ability could be more profitably applied than the repeal or amendment of the Bankrupt law. The conditions which favored an improvement in trade in the Autumn of 1876 still prevail. The year just closed has augmented the wealth of the country, cotton, grain, sugar, tobacco, gold and silver, petroleum, and other resources having been produced in quantities sufficient to yield nearly $1,000,000,000. The economy of the people has been demonstrated; impertations have dwindled to dimensions at one time thought impossible, and a safer basis is being reached. The delivery of grain, pork, and other farm produce, and the operations of lumbermen, facilitated by the abundant snow, increase the absorption of goods, and create a more active circulation of the currency, thus compensating for the severity of the Winter. The improvement in the value of the currency, the stability of the Government issues, the approach to par of gold, the steady demand and excellent prices for all the products of the land, are all indications of a healthy condition. The fertility of the country, the industry of its producers, the positive prosperity of the agricultural community, the vast development of mines, the completeness of means of inter-communication and transportation, the excellence and extent of its manufactures, and the genius of its people are placed under contribution toward a return of a prosperous and safe condition of trade.

A WOMAN TARRED AND FEATHERED.

A brutal outrage was perpetrated at Saurland Mountain, near Bound Brook, N. J., last Wednesday evening. The names of all the parties are withheld by the authorities in the hope that the persons implicated may be arrested, but the particulars of the affair are as follows: In a small dwelling located about half way up the mountain reside a man and his wife. The woman does not bear a very good reputation, and is charged with having been too intimate with the husbands of other women. One of the indignant wives, whose husband had been led astray, resolved upon revenge. She employed six young men, whom she first made drunk, and then gave them $2 each to execute her plan. The young men repaired to the house of their intended victim, and at midnight broke in the door. The woman and her husband were in bed, but on hearing the noise, jumped up, and in their alarm sprang made their way to the rear yard, whence the husband made his escape over the fence. The wife remained, however, and was found by the young ruffians almost frozen in the snow, and they at once proceeded to tar and feather her, after which they left her more dead than alive. The next day they made the affair public themselves while on a drunken frolic, and as soon as the necessary affidavit can be made by the woman they will probably be taken into custody.

CENTENNIAL CELEBRATION OF BURGOYNE'S SURRENDER.

Hon. Horatio Seymour has been appointed by the Saratoga Monument Association to deliver the oration, and Alfred B. Street the poem, in the celebration of the centennial of Burgoyne's surrender, the 17th of October next. The celebration will be at the village of Schuylerville, in Saratoga County, the place of the surrender.

THE SIGMA PHI FRATERNITY.

The New-York members of the Sigma Phi Fraternity celebrated the semi-centennial anniversary of the founding of the order in Delmonico's last evening. Among those present were ex-Gov. Hoffman, who presided; Health Officer Vanderpool, Commissioner J. B. Erhardt, Deputy Attorney General Winslow Page, Elihu Root, Dr. L. R. Sayre, and E. A. Rookwell. The chapters of the society were toasted, eloquent speeches were made, several songs were sung, and at a late hour the Brothers disbanded in a very hanny frame of mind

LOCAL MISCELLANY.

THE MISSING DRUG CLERK.

NO NEW FACTS ELICITED IN THE CASE—THE POLICE BELIEVE THAT NO CRIME HAS BEEN COMMITTED.

Nothing new was elicited yesterday in the case of Albert D. Jousset, the Frenchman, whose mysterious disappearance was fully chronicled in THE TIMES of yesterday. Superintendent Walling has virtually abandoned the case, as he is convinced that Jousset's disappearance is voluntary, and that no crime has been committed. Detective Reilly, who was engaged until a late hour on Thursday night investigating the matter, has been withdrawn from the case. Superintendent Walling stated yesterday that the statement made in one of the morning papers to the effect that Jousset had been seen in Brooklyn on Thursday last is not true, as far as his knowledge goes. Mrs. Jousset is still at her brother's house, at No. 115 Clinton street. She said yesterday that she did not think her husband was dead, nor does she believe that he has voluntarily abandoned her. She says that they always lived happily together, and he did not in any way show that he had become weary of her. She still believes that he has gone to fight a duel with his Teutonic adversary, and she is in hopes of hearing from him in a few days, if he survives the combat. She scouts the idea that he had become involved in an illicit connection with a young female who was a servant in the family of Mr. Kretzchman, the druggist in whose store Jousset was employed as a clerk. She says that she has full confidence in her husband, and says that he may have gone to Canada to avoid the contemplated duel or the consequences of having fought and wounded his antagonist.

August Homan, her brother, says positively that he has not seen Jousset since he parted from him on Wednesday night, when he gave him a letter and the sum of $150, his wife, as stated in THE TIMES. He was at that time fully impressed with the idea that Jousset was about to fight a duel with his German antagonist, but in the light of later developments, Mr. Homan says he has no theory to advance. Mr. Kretzchman, the druggist in whose employ Jousset had been until Tuesday last, stated yesterday that he did not believe that Jousset was murdered or that he had committed suicide. He believed that he is keeping out of the way to avoid prosecution for his conduct toward the servant girl whom it is said he seduced under promise of marriage, representations to which Jousset is unmarried. Her relatives threatened to punish him by both civil and criminal suits, and it is supposed that Jousset has fled to avoid exposure. The sensational display at the foot of Eighteith street, East River, was evidently prepared to lead his pursuers to believe that he was dead.

Capts. Robbins and a squad of Police made another search along the bank of the river, at Eightieth street, at daylight yesterday morning, but did not succeed in finding anything that might throw light on the affair. The search was prosecuted at low water with the same result.

A COMPLIMENT TO MR. GREEN.

THE EX-CONTROLLER TENDERED A DINNER BY A NUMBER OF BANKERS AND MERCHANTS—HE THANKS THEM, BUT DECLINES THE PROFFERED HONOR.

A number of bankers and merchants of this City having taken steps to offer a public dinner to ex-Controller Green, Mr. Green begs that the matter may not proceed further. The following correspondence has passed between the parties on the subject:

NEW-YORK, Jan. 11, 1877.

Hon. A. H. Green:

DEAR SIR: Viewing with pride and pleasure your untiring and faithful vigilance in the discharge of your duties as Controller of the City and County of New-York, during the past five years, and admiring the indomitable courage which enabled you to resist unjust claims upon the City, we cannot allow the occasion of your retirement from your official duties to pass without expressing to you our full appreciation of the good service you have rendered the citizens of New-York.

We have to ask you, therefore, to name a day that will be convenient for you to meet us at a dinner to be given you by your friends and fellow-citizens. Very respectfully, your friends,

No. 1 FIFTH AVENUE, NEW-YORK, Jan. 16, 1877.

GENTLEMEN: Your very appreciative note, the preliminary of a movement for a public dinner, asking the designation of a day that would be agreeable to me therefor, was received last evening.

Permit me to present my warmest acknowledgments for the kind and complimentary terms in which you are good enough to allude to the administration of the Finance Department during the years of my connection with it—a period of intricacies and difficulties without precedent in the annals of Municipal history.

While a meeting on such an occasion would be most agreeable, I feel that I ought to be more than satisfied with your friendly expressions of confidence without the further courtesies contemplated. I hasten, therefore, to request the relinquishment of all further steps toward embodying your favorable regards in the form proposed, and am, gentlemen, with the greatest respect, yours very sincerely,

ANDREW H. GREEN.

THE GERMAN REPUBLICANS.

ORGANIZATION OF THE CENTRAL COMMITTEE—ADDRESS BY THE PRESIDENT, EX-JUDGE DITTENHOEFER.

The newly elected delegates to the German Republican Central Committee met last evening at No. 349 Bowery, to elect officers and organize for the ensuing year. After the meeting had been called to order and the credentials of the delegates had been presented, an organization was effected by the election of the following officers: President, A. J. Dittenhoefer; Vice Presidents, Carl Schwedler and Frederick Bernhard; Recording Secretary, Gustave Beyerle; Corresponding Secretary, Leopold Weil; Treasurer, Dr. Louis Naumann. Contesting delegations from the Eighth Assembly District and the Twenty-third Ward were present, and the contests in these districts were referred to a special committee of five to be appointed by the Chair. The President then spoke as follows:

FELLOW-MEMBERS: In assuming the Presidency, to which your kind partiality has elevated me for the third time, it is right that I should give expression to the satisfaction we all feel that the German Republican Central Committee has ceased to be a mere side-show—that it has at last been recognized as an integral and essential branch of the Republican organization. The amendment recently adopted, which confers on its two chief officers membership, ex-officio, in the Central Republican County Organization, carries with it, by necessary implication, the acknowledgment that this committee must hereafter be regarded as the official exponent of German Republican views. There is no denying the fact that our party can have no future, unless the German voters, instinctively Republican, but repelled by hostile legislation and official non-recognition, are drawn back to their allegiance. We need the German voters, all say; but how little is done by the Republican leaders to gain them. And yet how easy is the task. Nothing more need be done by them than to remember in their conclaves and conferences that there are German voters, and to give up the foolish notion that by throwing to them a Coronership on the eve of an election they can atone for the neglect—the whole year round—to consult them as to party measures and party nominations and patronage. Gentlemen, long before the end of my present term, the American people, I am sure, will have begun to enjoy the inestimable blessings of peace, and the revival of industry sure to follow the peaceful inauguration of President Hayes on the 4th of the coming March. In again thanking you for this renewed evidence of your confidence, I beg most respectfully to announce that I shall not again be a candidate for the Presidency of this committee.

Resolutions were adopted to the effect that it was the opinion of the committee that the President of the Senate alone has the power to count the Electoral votes, and an executive committee of 23 members, one from each district, was appointed, after which the meeting adjourned.

BUSINESS OF THE POLICE BOARD.

A meeting of the Board of Police was held yesterday, President Smith in the chair. The Superintendent submitted a report in the case of Dr. Charles Phelps, specifying that the Doctor failed to attend the patrolmen on the sick list of the Eighteenth Precinct on the 8th and 9th inst., and that a patrolman of the Twenty-fifth Precinct was without medical attendance during the same period. The report was referred to the Committee on Rules and Discipline. Several new rules and some amendments to old ones were adopted. Sergt. Kealy, of the Detective Squad, was granted permission to receive $100 as a reward for the capture of Patrick Smith, a convict, who, with several others, escaped from Sing Sing Prison last June by jumping on a locomotive of the Hudson River Railroad. A communication from Capt. Williams, of the Twenty-ninth Precinct, commending to the Riot Relief Fund Committee the case of Patrolman McDowell, who was recently dangerously wounded while effecting the arrest of a burglar, was indorsed by the board. Patrolman Thomas McCormack, of the Twentieth Precinct, was granted permission to receive a reward of $50 for the arrest of a burglar at the Hudson River Railroad Depot. Sergt. Phillips, of the Thirtieth Precinct, was fined three days' pay for neglecting to enter on the blotter the fact of his having returned from post to the station-house.

POLICE COMMISSIONERS DAMAGED.

LIBEL SUITS AGAINST THE TIMES—THE COMMISSIONERS INJURED TO THE EXTENT OF $10,000 EACH.

The Police Commissioners of this City served on Mr. George Jones, of THE TIMES, yesterday, complaints in libel suits begun by them, in which each claims $10,000 damages. These complaints are identical, excepting as to a few unimportant expressions. Commissioner Smith's complaint is as follows:

Supreme Court, City and County of New-York—William F. Smith vs. George Jones.—The plaintiff, William F. Smith, by Fullerton, Knox & Crosby, his attorneys, complains in this action of the defendant, George Jones, as follows:

First—That, at the time hereinafter mentioned, the defendant was the editor, publisher, and proprietor of THE NEW-YORK TIMES, a daily newspaper, published in the City and County of New-York, in this State. That, at the same time, the plaintiff, with others, composed, and for many months prior thereto had composed, the Board of Police Commissioners of said City and County, and as such had been during that period, and at the time hereinafter mentioned was, actively engaged in the performance of his duties as such Commissioner.

Second—That on the 14th day of January, 1877, the defendant maliciously published in said newspaper a certain article, to wit:

"The streets are to be cleaned at last, or rather Broadway and some of the principal thoroughfares are to be relieved of their accumulated mass of snow and ice. The Police Commissioners wanted the trifling $150,000 or $200,000 appropriated for this special work, and they refused to do anything till it was given them. Let it not be too hastily inferred that the Commissioners have not carried their point, even though they have apparently been compelled to 'back down.' The street-cleaning appropriation amounts to some $2,000 a day. How much of this has been spent during the last 30 days for the purposes for which it is intended? Very much less than half, if the evidence of the senses of the observing citizen is to be trusted. It will thus be seen that an impudent device to gain time was quite as effective for the ends of the Police Board as the desired action of the Board of Apportionment. They have been enabled to snap their fingers at an indignant public, and to pocket, for purposes best known to themselves, the entire amount of the appropriation asked for, by professing a hypocritical regard for the letter of the law, and by showing a very laudable contempt for its spirit. And yet, we have what is called a very harmonious City Government."

Third—That said article was false and malicious, and was published concerning said Police Commissioners, of whom plaintiff was one, as hereinbefore stated. And the plaintiff alleges that said article was published with intent to charge said Police Commissioners with neglect and violation of their official duties, and with dishonest practices and dishonesty, and cause it to be believed that they had acted, and were acting, in violation of their official duties, and were dishonest, and were so acting, and the plaintiff avers that said article was, and is, a libel on him.

That by means of said publication, the plaintiff has been injured in his name and credit, and he claims damages because thereof, to the amount of $10,000, with costs of suit, and asks judgment accordingly.

This complaint is verified as are also the complaints of Commissioners Wheeler, Erhardt, and Nichols, in the usual manner. Each complaint is accompanied by the ordinary summons for relief.

DISCRIMINATING FREIGHT TARIFFS.

A CONFERENCE BY COMMERCIAL ASSOCIATIONS—APPOINTMENT OF A COMMITTEE OF INVESTIGATION.

A conference of several commercial organizations was held yesterday in the rooms of the Grocers' and Importers' Board of Trade, in Wall street, to consider the question of discriminating freight tariffs. Representatives were present from the Produce Exchange, the Chamber of Commerce, the Cheap Transportation Association, and the Grocers' Board of Trade. Mr. Franklin Edson, of the Produce Exchange, presided, and Mr. William Wilson was chosen Secretary. Mr. Charles C. Hill spoke at length on the Erie Canal, showing its advantages and disadvantages to commercial interests. Mr. Theodore F. Lees said the progress of New-York, during the past, toward an equitable position, indicated a tendency to uniform rates between the seaboard cities and the West without distinction between local and competitive business. About a year ago the City was embarrassed by a discrimination of fully 100 per cent. against it; but this state of affairs had been modified, and after many tariff agreements had been entered into by the different roads, there is now but a small percentage against New-York. Between New-York and Baltimore there is, he said, a discrimination of 13 per cent. on local business, under which had been classed the shipments of Eastern jobbers to Western buyers. But while the railroads discriminate against us to this amount, we, in the matter of cartage and delivery, discriminate to a much greater extent, and it would be well to remedy the enormous grievances that are entirely within our own control before we discuss and condemn too harshly a tariff basis about which there is some doubt as to its having a basis at all. As it is, it will melt away and vanish with the warm days of the Spring.

Mr. Charles C. Hill said that this was a question deeply concerning the jobbers of New-York, and that any discrimination, if permitted to go on, would be a confession that New-York could not provide terminal facilities equal to those of competing cities. He thought there were good reasons to doubt whether there had really been a railroad war. It might rather be called a well-devised plan of the roads to kill off the Erie Railroad.

Mr. Fuller spoke of the lack of docking and transporting facilities in this City, and said that it was well known by merchants in New-York that in this respect it was much more expensive to do business in New-York than it was in Baltimore, Boston, or Philadelphia, but that the remedy was in the hands of merchants in this City if they would but apply it.

Mr. Theodore L. Husted said that there was a disposition to find fault with the New-York Central. It seemed to him that it was the only one of the three great lines that had attempted to do practical justice to the City of New-York. When the compact between the railroads was signed, the New-York Central was the only one that declared it would be bound by the regulations to rebate. Erie was non-committal on the subject, and the Pennsylvania Road says flatly it will not make it. If the Central Road can afford to bring freights at low rates from distant points, local freights will come down in time. It seemed to him that rather than find fault we should commend it for the stand it has taken. Mr. Charles C. Hill asked for the appointment of a committee to investigate the facts under the present proposed tariff formula, and the committee was appointed as follows: Mr. Charles C. Hill, Grocers' Board of Trade; Mr. Theodore F. Lees, Cheap Transportation Association; Mr. John Taylor Johnston, Chamber of Commerce, and Mr. Theodore L. Husted, Produce Exchange.

THE GREAT FORGERY.

HORACE E. BROWN COMMITTED IN DEFAULT OF BAIL—ARREST OF GEORGE L. MAXWELL.

The broker, Horace E. Brown, who is charged with being concerned in the forgery by which the Union Trust Company was defrauded of $64,225, was again brought before Justice Duffy in the Tombs Court-room yesterday afternoon. He was in charge of Detectives Sampson and Selleck. In appearance he was perfectly unconcerned as to the result of the charge against him. Mr. Wheeler H. Peckham appeared for the Union Trust Company, and presented to the Justice a long statement of the case against the prisoner. The magistrate asked to be excused from reading the long document, and asked Mr. Peckham to state the case briefly. The latter then recited the facts embodied in the affidavits published in THE TIMES of yesterday. At the close of Mr. Peckham's remarks Mr. Hewitt, Brown's counsel, waived the examination of his client, and Justice Duffy committed him in default of $10,000 bail. Before being sent to a cell in the Tombs Prison, Brown, in response to the questions of the Commitment Clerk, said he was 45 years of age, a native of Massachusetts, a broker by occupation, and a resident of No. 224 Seventh avenue. He declared he was not guilty of the charge preferred against him.

George L. Maxwell, the broker, who, according to his own statement, received from Brown the forged check for $64,225 on the Union Trust Company, and through Mr. S. L. Blood purchased $60,000 worth of gold with it, was arrested yesterday afternoon at his residence, No. 250 West Twenty-third street. Detectives Sampson, Williamson, and Rogers made the arrest. They found Maxwell in bed, suffering from a broken ankle and bruised head. He was thrown down by a Seventh avenue car, in Park place, as he was returning to his home on Wednesday night. The arrest was made on the authority of an order from District Attorney Phelps. The ground of this order was that there was reason to believe Maxwell had fuller knowledge of the transaction in which he engaged than he admitted upon the discovery of the forgery. The prisoner could not be removed from his home and Officer Rogers was left at his bedside. Later in the day Superintendent Walling, at the request of the District Attorney, ordered that an officer of the Twenty-ninth Precinct should keep guard over Maxwell until he is strong enough to appear in court for examination.

CITY AND SUBURBAN NEWS.

NEW-YORK.

Timothy R. Crawford assigned his property to Benjamin S. Clark yesterday.

James W. Beekman will lecture on "The Founders of New-York," at the Holland Reformed Church, No. 279 West Eleventh street, on Tuesday evening, the 23d inst.

Last Thursday there arrived at the Post Office 176 bags of mail in transit from Australia to London, whither it will be dispatched by the steamer Britannic, of the White Star Line, this morning.

The public are cautioned against imposters who are soliciting subscriptions for alleged charitable objects, and who use the name of Mrs. T. C. Doremus and other ladies to aid them in their swindling operation.

Elijah K. Bangs and Andrew Merwin, composing the firm of Bangs & Co., formerly Bangs, Merwin & Co., auctioneers, of No. 656 Broadway, made an assignment for the benefit of their creditors to William B. Nassau yesterday.

Mr. William C. Rommel delivered an interesting lecture last night to the boys of the Elvington Street Lodging House. His subject, "The Region of the Yellowstone," was treated in a manner that both instructed and amused the boys.

A meeting of clerks connected with the office of Superintendent of the Railway Mail Service, Second Division, was held on the 18th inst. to take action in regard to the death of their late associate, Mr. John C. Thomas, head clerk New-York and Buffalo Railway Post Office, which occurred at Syracuse on the 16th inst., from injuries received while en route to report for duty. After remarks by various gentlemen, a committee was appointed, consisting of Messrs. Bonney, Casterlin, and Douglas, to draft resolutions to be forwarded to the family of deceased.

The suit of the grand-daughters of Eugene Sue in regard to the estate of their father, Nathaniel Niles, deceased, was brought before Judge Donohue, in Supreme Court, Chambers, yesterday, in pursuance of the adjournment, but after some little discussion was adjourned until Tuesday, when the motion for a Receiver of the estate will be fully argued. The counsel for Nathaniel Niles having objected to the publication of the case, which appeared in THE TIMES and other papers, Mr. Richard Busteed, who appears for the petitioners, took occasion to land the newspapers for the good work they do in their reports of cases.

BROOKLYN.

Rev. A. P. Putnam has declined a call of the Quincy Unitarian Church.

James McCue and Charles Trace were convicted of burglary in the first degree yesterday, in the Court of Sessions. Trace was sentenced to 10 years, and McCue to seven years in the Penitentiary.

Mr. Charles Parker, the proprietor of a restaurant on Willoughby street, well known as "Parker's," died of heart disease yesterday morning. Mr. Parker was a native of England, but came to this country 45 years ago. He was widely known and esteemed, both in this city and New-York.

In the divorce suit of Oswald Miller against his wife Margaret, the jury yesterday rendered a verdict for the defendant. Dr. McManus, one of the witnesses who was committed by Judge McCue for perjury during the trial, pleaded not guilty to the charge, and was committed in default of bail.

Judge Pratt yesterday granted an application for the appointment of a Referee to examine into the affairs of the suspended Continental Life Insurance Company. The application was made on the ground that the Receiver, Mr. J. J. Anderson, had not made a statement to the stockholders of the assets possessed by the company. Ex-Judge Fullerton opposed the application on the ground that the Receiver had not finished his work.

A lady named McGoin, who resides in Fifth avenue, New-York, called at Police Head-quarters yesterday, and inquired if a person named McGoin had been arrested. After her husband had gone to business yesterday morning, her brother called on her and asked for a check for $200, which he said he wanted to use to get her husband, who was locked up in Brooklyn, out of prison. Mrs. McGoin refused the check, but accompanied her brother to Brooklyn to give her husband the money. The brother, when near Police Head-quarters, ran away. No person named McGoin was arrested in Brooklyn yesterday.

About 7:30 o'clock last evening, flames were seen bursting out of the fur and straw hat factory of William Heath, on the corner of Park avenue and Hall street, Brooklyn. The factory was a large three-story frame building. The Fire Department arrived promptly, but owing to the inflammable nature of the material contained in the factory, it was found impossible to save the building. The fire did not last more than half an hour, but the loss on stock, machinery, and building is estimated at $100,000. The two-story frame house No. 47 Hall street, owned by Mr. Richter, and occupied by Mr. Steel, was damaged to the extent of $200. The two-story frame house No. 45 Hall street, owned by John Colgan, and occupied by Messrs. Burns & Pomalia was damaged to the extent of $400. The tenants lose about $200 in furniture. The stock and machinery were insured in the Fire Association of Philadelphia, the Fire Trust Company of New-York, the Franklin, and other companies, but for what amount could not be ascertained. The building was insured in the Hoffman Company for $1,800. The buildings Nos. 45 and 47 Hall street, which were partially burned, were fully insured. By the burning of the factory a large number of people will be thrown out of work. The cause of the fire is not known, and, unless the building contained an immense stock of goods, it is probable that the Police estimate of $100,000 loss is somewhat exaggerated.

THE EASTERN QUESTION.

THE RESULTS OF THE CONFERENCE.

YESTERDAY'S SESSION—A MESSAGE FROM THE PORTE—SUGGESTIONS MADE BY SAFVET PASHA—THE SULTAN'S PROPOSALS DECLARED UNACCEPTABLE—THE COMMISSIONERS OF THE GREAT POWERS TO LEAVE ON MONDAY.

LONDON, Jan. 20.—A dispatch from Constantinople says: "The European delegates yesterday were understood to be disposed to declare the conference at an end, but if the Turkish propositions should appear worthy of examination it is not impossible that the conference will be adjourned until next week for arriving at a decision."

A dispatch from Moscow says: "To-day's Gazette, discussing the result of the conference, concludes as follows: Europe has lowered her prestige by her complaint humor. As the Porte has refused the proposals, Europe must now enforce her original demands instead of the modified scheme of the conference."

A dispatch from Constantinople says: "Safvet Pasha opened the proceeding at to-day's sitting of the conference by reading a note, stating that the Porte might come to an understanding with the powers on certain points of detail, but passing over in silence the proposal relative to the appointment of Governors, and instead of an international commission proposing a local elective commission presided over by an Ottoman functionary. Finally Safvet suggested that the settlement of questions relating to Servia and Mentenegro be reserved for an ulterior decision. Thereupon Lord Salisbury declared that the Porte having refused the two chief guarantees demanded by the powers, there no longer was any common basis for discussion, and the conference, therefore, must be regarded at an end. Gen. Ignatieff, the Russian plenipotentiary, spoke similarly. He declared the Porte's proposal unacceptable; laid stress upon the responsibility resting on the Porte, and expressed the hope that Turkey would not undertake hostilities against Servia and Montenegro, but cause the position of her Christian subjects to be respected. The conference then broke up. Lord Salisbury and Gen. Ignatieff leave Monday, and other plenipotentiaries in the course of the week.

ST. PETERSBURG, Jan. 20.—The Berlin telegram which was published on Thursday last, stating that Prince Gortschakoff had issued a circular to the Russian representatives abroad, expressing the belief that Turkey would reject the conference proposals, and declaring that Russia could not undertake a warlike policy because Europe would not support her and might form a coalition against her, is a pure invention. No circular of any kind has been issued. The Czar awaits official cognizance of results at Constantinople before adopting a decision respecting his next steps.

KISCHINEFF, Jan. 20.—The Grand Duke Nicholas passed a restless night owing to vomiting. He has no feverish symptoms.

CONSTANTINOPLE, Jan. 20—Safvet Pasha justified the note he read at the conference to-day by the decision of the Grand Council. Before the dissolution of the conference, Gen. Ignatieff spoke on behalf of the Cretans. Lord Salisbury said Europe would gladly see the Porte extend reforms to its entire territory. The departure of the Ambassadors does not imply a rupture of diplomatic relations, as Chargés de'Affaires remain.

FRANCE AND THE NEGOTIATIONS.

THE PROGRAMME OF THE POWERS DECLINED WITH THANKS—LORD SALISBURY AND SIR HENRY ELLIOTT—A CHAT WITH A MEMBER OF THE OTTOMAN LEGATION—A BRIEF HISTORY OF DIPLOMATIC OPERATIONS.

From Our Own Correspondent.

PARIS, Wednesday, Jan. 3, 1877.

At this time all hope of a peaceful settlement of the Eastern question has been given up, and a speedy declaration of war appears certain. The conference has proved a fiasco, and it will be lucky to escape general ridicule. It seemed a little risky for the Marquis of Salisbury to go out to the flourish of trumpets and beating of bass-drums, without having been invited by the Porte, and it was thought that Turkey must be very sick indeed, if she could submit calmly to the sort of guardianship that the great powers would impose upon her. We now find that the Turks were simply laughing in their sleeves at all Europe. They allowed the delegates to go on until they were thoroughly compromised, and then told the conference that they intended to manage Ottoman affairs in their own way. Courteously but firmly they refuse the programme so carefully prepared by the powers, and even the English Envoy is politely shown to the door and invited to mind his own business. True, this was done in an indirect way, so that no offense could be taken, but Lord Salisbury has received a very severe check nevertheless. "Tell her Majesty," the Sultan said to him at the close of their private interview, "tell the Queen that it would cost me my life to accord what is now demanded of me. If I were to attempt it a revolution would break out wherever there are Ottomans; and for us a revolution would be more fatal than a war." At the same time the Sultan reiterated his promises to have the new reforms carried out to the letter; but he was firm upon the point above noted, stating again that a war with Russia would be preferable, even though Turkey had to enter upon it without allies, than insurrections in Turkey. Perhaps he is not wrong in this assumption; he is certainly right so far as the dynasty is concerned. It will be observed that the Sultan uses the new word "Ottomans" instead of "Mussulmans," and this comes from the fact that the new Constitution recognizes all the peoples of Turkey, whatever may be their race or religion, under the generic title of Ottomans. This is a step in the way of progress, for the word Mussulman refers to the State as a religious rather than as a civil power, and there were thousands of subjects of the Ottoman Empire who rejected the title of Mussulmans on account of its religious significance. It is a step in advance, therefore, when the Jew and the Gentile, the Christian and the Mohammedan subjects of the Porte are all classed as Ottomans.

It is said that Lord Salisbury went out of the seraglio with a flea in his ear, and in no gentle frame of mind. His first idea was entirely characteristic of the man; he went off and vented his bad humor upon Sir Henry Elliott, accusing him of having shown too much sympathy for the Turks, and thus thwarted the plans of her Majesty's Government. Sir Henry retorted sharply, and said that he had not been sent these to hob-nob with Gen. Ignatieff, and thus favor the plans of Russia, and this home thrust was a telling one, the Marquis having been trying to menager la chèvre et le chore, according to the French expression, drawn from one of Lafontaine's fables, or to "blow hot and cold," according to an old English saying. Indeed, laughable as the thing may appear, the Marquis really thought he could "throw sawdust in the eyes" of Gen. Ignatieff, a past-master in the art of diplomatic duplicity. The Marquis of Salisbury went out to Constantinople under the conviction that Sir Henry Elliott had been duped by the wily Russian Ambassador, and his every act seemed to say, "Wait until I get there, and you will see how such fellows as Ignatieff are to be managed." But it appears that Ignatieff "wound the Marquis about his finger" in a few days' time, to use another homely saying, and he went so far in the way of supporting Russian designs that Sir Henry Elliott had to enter a protest. Lord Salisbury acted as if the Porte were bound to accept his propositions, being bound over under heavy recognizances; but when the decisive moment came, the Porte declared that his plan was inadmissible, that even war was preferable, and left him to take his revenge out of Sir Henry. The latter's cool impudence so angered the Marquis that he telegraphed home at once to ask the Ambassador's recall.

The evening of the day the special envoy of her Majesty arrived in Paris I was sitting at a restaurant over my cup of coffee, reading the papers and commenting upon the news with an attaché of the Ottoman Legation. "'The arrival of Lord Salisbury with a suite of 30 persons,'" he said, maliciously emphasizing the latter words—"how that sentence paints the character of the man." And he went on to say that Lord Salisbury would not accomplish anything, because he had neither the capacity nor the temper necessary for such a mission. Lest I should think that he wanted to depreciate his lordship's high talents and intellectual worth, he hastened to say that he meant by the term capacity the power of dealing with the diplomats who have so long studied the intricacies of the Oriental question. He would prove a mere infant in the hands of Gortchakoff, Bismarck, Ignatieff, Safvet Pasha, Midhat, and the clever men who stand behind the latter as advisers, and who were advisers in the time of Fuad and of Mahmoud. Besides, he opined, the Marquis had a quick temper, not always governable or under his control, and when angry he is sure to commit the fault of trying to bully. My friend thought that he would be at loggerheads with everybody before the conference was half over. It must be confessed that there was some reason in these appreciations; but this can be said for the Marquis, that, under the conditions, it is probable that he did as well as any other man could. The truth is that the entire party of diplomats started ont badly, for the first step was to secure the adhesion of the Porte to their programme, or at least a recognition of their authority.

It must be borne in mind that the programme of the powers was arranged at the preliminary sittings, and, contrary to the advice of Sir Henry Elliott, Lord Salisbury accepted the propositions of Russia. It is hardly permissible to suppose that he should have done this without orders from his Government, since he is in constant telegraphic communication with Downing street; but, if so, what must be thought of the instructions given to Sir Henry? There is a conflict here that is clearly inexplicable. The other delegates gave their adhesion to the preliminary programme; but when the Ottoman delegate was admitted, he upset everything by declaring that the Porte could not accept certain of the conditions, though perfectly willing to introduce into the empire all the reforms demanded. Lord Salisbury made a speech, following Count de Chaudordy, and he flew into a passion again when the Turk calmly said that the Sublime Porte could not compromise or negotiate in the matter of foreign occupation of the Turkish provinces, or consent even to discuss the plan for forming a local gendarmerie with foreign auxiliaries, no matter what nation might furnish them. The Marquis asked if this was to be taken as a final refusal of the propositions of the conference, and the wily Ottoman delegate replied that he had only expressed the sentiments of his Government, and that the last word always rested with the Sultan. Lord Salisbury marched off to see his Majesty, while the representatives of Russia, Germany, and Austria met at the house of Gen. Ignatieff to hold a sort of indignation meeting. Among themselves it was voted that this was only another attempt on the part of the Porte to trick the conference and procure a delay, and it was then and there resolved that they could have no further discussion of any sort with the Porte. But Lord Salisbury came in to calm the excitement of these gentlemen, telling them something which has not yet been made public—the result of his interview with the Sultan—and it was agreed that the delegates would abide in patience until Thursday, (to-morrow,) which may or may not be a decisive day. Meanwhile, however, Gen. Ignatieff had received a dispatch from Prince Gortchakoff instructing him to protest against the counter-note of the Porte, and to give prompt and categorical refusals to all the propositions contained in it.

This is a brief history of the operations during the past few days, and from it we can see that the Turks are prepared for war. Confident in the strength of their Army of 600,000 men, they are even ready to take the initiative, and if the Russians do not advance rapidly the Turks may move into Bessarabia and look for them. On Saturday Midhat Pacha is said to have remarked that his country was never before so well prepared for war, and one of his colleagues added: "The great powers want to drive us out of Europe. They may be able to do it, but only after defeat, at the point of the bayonet, with a whole nation in arms." The Ottoman Army is in superb condition, and has a magnificent artillery corps. Besides, Turkey has a very strong Navy. It is now confessed that Abdul-Aziz was not so great a lunatic as was supposed, for, if he took the people's money, he expended it in arms, and all the arsenals of the country are well filled. The war is already popular, and religious fanaticism is entering into it. When the standard of the Prophet has once been raised, the entire nation, without doubt—without a shadow of a doubt—will rally to it.

In connection with this subject let me say that there are many curious rumors afloat about the news, which are said to have been suppressed for purposes of speculation, or until the January liquidation was over. The weather continues extraordinarily fine, and we have not yet had any Winter temperature.

FOREIGN BUSINESS AFFAIRS.

COMMERCIAL AND FINANCIAL INTELLIGENCE

—THE PRICE OF SILVER.

LONDON, Jan. 20.—The Mincing lane markets have been generally inactive during the week, and the adverse Eastern news has restricted operations, especially those of a speculative character. Plantation Ceylon coffee fell 3 to 4 shillings per hundred weight, but yesterday's sales showed a partial recovery and a steady demand. Quotations had previously reached an extremely high point. There is now a full supply of the new crop available. Common kinds in many cases exhibit the same depreciation, and the bulk of Rio Janeiro at auction was withdrawn. There has been some demand for new Burmah rice; spring shipments sold lower than the price on the spot. The famine in India is likely to affect this market. Sugar is depressed, the few transactions reported show 2 to 3 shillings per hundred weight reduction from the currencies during the late period of speculative excitement.

Tea is flat; some common grades at auction sold lower. The decline established upon black pepper at the weekly sales has since led to more inquiry.

The stock market was firm at the beginning of the week, but subsequently weakened for a majority of descriptions. Attention mostly centred on the fortnightly settlement, which was satisfactorily concluded on Wednesday. The open discount market has been inanimate. Erie descriptions and American Governments have been firm. Canadian railways are slightly flatter. The feature of the foreign market has been the strength of South American loans. Argentines are 4 and Entre Rios and Santa Fé 2½ better. Russians are depressed and 1½@ 1¾ lower. Turkish are weaker. News of the failure of the conference has not had much effect, the result having been discounted; consequently the foreign market has been fairly sustained by the closing of speculative accounts for a fall.

Silver was quiet to-day at 58 3-16 pence per ounce.

THE ILLINOIS SENATORSHIP.

NO CHANGE IN THE SITUATION—THE DEMOCRATS BECOMING UNITED ON ANDERSON—LOGAN'S CHANCES NOT IMPROVING.

Special Dispatch to the New-York Times.

SPRINGFIELD, Jan. 20.—Five ballots today produced no change in the situation. Logan failed to get the three votes necessary to elect him. His friends say he will get them if the Republicans hold out long enough, but many Republicans are growing restive, and fear they may hold out so long that the Democrats and Independents will have time to coalesce and elect their man. It is not certain that Logan can control the Republicans much longer, as they cannot see where the three votes are coming from. Logan can hardly get the full Republican vote after Monday. In the meantime, the Democrats are getting round to Anderson, who, in spite of bitter hostility in his own Congressional district, is likely to get the support of the entire party in caucus, which will insure his election. If the Republicans accept Mr. Plumb, uncle of one of the Independent Senators, or some other Republican acceptable to the Independents before the Democratic caucus indorses Anderson, the Republicans may save the vote in the Senate. Otherwise they probably cannot. Sixteen German members of both parties threaten to caucus to-morrow afternoon and bring out a candidate, probably Washburn. This indicates disintegration on both sides. An election is expected Tuesday.

GERMANY AND FRANCE.

BERLIN, Jan. 20.—The North German Gazette of this evening, reproducing the alarmist Paris letter published in the Reichsanzeiger this morning, commenting on the eagerness of the French press to attack Germany's Eastern policy, adds: "We hope, with the Reichsanzeiger, that the agitations of the French press against the German Government will cease. If they do, we shall gladly regard as mere speculation the import of corn from Hungary into France, which by far exceeds her requirements, and shall not consider it as preparation by the French Commissariat Department."

MARINE DISASTERS.

THE BURNING OF THE MOCTEZUMA—OTHER DISASTERS.

HAVANA, Jan. 20.—The steamer Moctezuma was burned off Bragman, on the coast of Honduras, by her Cuban captors, on the 3d of January. The Spanish gun-boat Jorje Juan was in sight at the time. When the boats from the gun-boat reached the Moctezuma she was wrapped in a sheet of flame. The Cuban captors and the captured men of the original crew of the Moctezuma went ashore in their boats, the captors retreating to the woods, and the crew remaining on the beach, whence they were taken off by the boats of the gun-boat and carried to Clenfuegos. The crew are now in Havana.

FORTRESS MONROE, Jan. 20.—The steamer Isaac Bell, of the Old Dominion Line, from New-York, for Richmond, ran aground on Willoughby's Spit, two miles below this port, in a dense fog yesterday afternoon at 4 o'clock. The steamer W. P. Banks has gone to her assistance. A dense fog has prevailed here during the past week.

THE ASHTABULA BRIDGE.

SUICIDE OF THE CHIEF ENGINEER OF THE LAKE SHORE RAILROAD.

CLEVELAND, Jan. 20.—This morning the dead body of Charles Collins, Chief Engineer of the Lake Shore and Michigan Southern Railway, was found at his residence. It was apparent that he had been dead 24 hours. In one hand was grasped a revolver, while another pistol and a razor were lying beside him on the bed. He undoubtedly committed suicide by shooting, and it is believed that anxiety on account of the late accident at Ashtabula affected his reason. The family of Mr. Collins was absent at the time of his suicide.

THE WEATHER.

INDICATIONS.

WASHINGTON, Jan. 1—1 A. M.—In the Middle and Eastern States, rising barometer, diminishing north to west winds, colder and generally clear weather, succeeded in the former by winds backing to southwesterly, and falling barometer.

GREAT FIRE IN PHILADELPHIA.

Special Dispatch to the New-York Times.

PHILADELPHIA, Jan. 21—1 A. M.—About midnight the extensive glue manufacturing works and curled hair establishment of Messrs. Baeder, Adameon & Co., on the Delaware River and Allegheny avenue, about four miles from the centre of the city, were discovered to be on fire, and at this hour the entire establishment is falling a prey to the flames. This was the largest establishment of the kind in the country. The loss will be over half a million of dollars, and is partially covered by insurance.

THE BOUNDARY LINE OF TWO STATES.

BALTIMORE, Jan. 20.—The commission selected to decide the long disputed question of the boundary line between Maryland and Virginia, consisting of Hon. J. S. Black, of Pennsylvania, Commissioner on the part of Maryland, and Hon. James B. Beck, of Kentucky, Commissioner on the part of Virginia, and Hon. Charles J. Jenkins, ex-Governor of Georgia, umpire, have filed their award in the Executive Department at Annapolis. By the decision of the majority of the commission, [Messrs. Black and Jenkins,] Maryland is awarded sovereignty over the whole of the Potomac River to its southern bank, except that Virginia is to have domain over the soil to low water-mark on the south side of the river, and to such use of the river beyond low water-mark as may facilitate the full enjoyment of her riparian ownership without interfering with navigation or with Maryland's proper use thereof. The line as established across the Chesapeake to the Atlantic, gives Maryland valuable oyster-beds on the east side of Tangier Sound, and the north side of Pocomoke Bay, which have long been a matter of controversy between the two States and collision between their oystermen. Senator Beck, acting on the part of Virginia, dissents from the award of the majority, filing a minority report. He agrees with the majority as to the rights of Maryland on the Potomac, but differs as to the line of division between the mouth of the Potomac and the sea in the locality of points called for in the charter to Lord Baltimore. By the acts of the two States creating the commission, they bind themselves to abide the decision of any two or three members.

THE AMERICAN SPIRITUALIST.

LONDON, Jan. 20.—Monday, Jan. 29, is fixed for the argument of the appeal of Dr. Slade, the American medium who was prosecuted under the Vagrant act and sentenced to three months' confinement at hard labor in the House of Correction, on Oct. 31 last, by Mr. Magistrate Flowers. Slade, meantime, has been on bail.

SEIZURE OF A REVENUE CUTTER.

SAN FRANCISCO, Jan. 20.—A Portland (Oregon) dispatch says that the new revenue cutter has been seized by the sub-contractors for a claim of $9,000.

THE COUNTING TRIBUNAL.

CAUCUS OF DEMOCRATIC SENATORS.

A LARGE ATTENDANCE OF THE TILDEN FACTION—THE PROVISIONS OF THE COMMITTEE'S BILL EXPLAINED BY SENATOR THURMAN—HE ALSO EXPRESSES HIS OPINION—TO WHICH VIEWS SOME OPPOSITION IS EXPECTED.

Special Dispatch to the New-York Times.

WASHINGTON, Jan. 20.—The Democratic Senatorial caucus met this morning. It had been understood that the bill agreed upon by the Joint Committee on the Electoral Count was to be discussed, and some party action proposed and possibly matured, and there was the largest attendance of Senators of that political faith that has gathered at a caucus for a long time. Every Democratic Senator now in the city was present. Senator Stevenson presided, and when the caucus was called to order Senator Thurman, by previous arrangement, took the floor for the purpose of giving a detailed explanation of the bill. He made a clear and concise explanation of the various provisions of the proposed measure from a Democratic stand-point. He argued that the bill was eminently fair to both parties, and one upon which both ought to unite as a temporary expedient to tide over the present difficulties. Without being questioned by the opponents of the measure present, he undertook to argue away the various objections raised by some of his party associates. The burden of his argument or explanation was directed toward the constitutional objections which have been urged against the measure, he presenting, as an argument to sustain his assertion that it was constitutional, the theory that the power of supervision over the work of the tribunal given the two houses of Congress by the bill would make a declaration of the results of the tribunal's labors the constructive, if not the positive, act of the two houses of Congress. He also held that the tribunal created by the bill would act in a semi-ministerial and not in an executive capacity in determining and announcing the result. He spoke for half an hour, and, without doing any business, after the speech of Mr. Thurman, the caucus adjourned. It will meet again on Monday night in connection with the House Democratic caucus, and then there will probably be considerable warm dissent from Mr. Thurman's views of the measure.

THE PLAN OPPOSED BY INDIANA.

ACTION OF THE STATE LEGISLATURE—A DISPATCH SENT TO SENATOR MORTON—HIS OPPOSITION TO THE BILL UNANIMOUSLY APPROVED OF BY THE REPUBLICAN MEMBERS.

Special Dispatch to the New-York Times.

WASHINGTON, Jan. 20.—Senator Morton to-day received a dispatch from Indianapolis stating that at a caucus of Republican members of the Indiana Legislature, held Friday night, resolutions were unanimously adopted declaring their belief that Hayes and Wheeler were legally elected, and that it is the duty of the President of the Senate to declare the result; second, that the Justices of the Supreme Court should not be vested with political power, and that they therefore indorse the action of Senator O. P. Morton in withholding his consent to the measure proposed by the joint committee of Congress. In addition to this indorsement of his action in opposing the Electoral bill, Senator Morton is in constant receipt of telegrams and letters from various sections of the country urging him to remain steadfast in opposing its passage.

THE DEBATE ON THE COMPROMISE.

THE DISCUSSION COMMENCED IN THE SENATE—MR. EDMUNDS' ARGUMENT IN FAVOR OF THE BILL—HIS APPEAL TO THE PEOPLE FOR SUPPORT—HIS REMARKS FULLY COMMENTED UPON—THE MATTER TO BE RUSHED THROUGH CONGRESS.

Special Dispatch to the New-York Times.

WASHINGTON, Jan. 20.—The debate on the compromise proposition was commenced in the Senate this morning by Mr. Edmunds, who made an argument in favor of the bill. In his opening remarks he laid great stress upon the demand which he believed the people were making for some peaceful and equitable settlement of the Presidential difficulty other than those heretofore proposed, and expressed the firm conviction that the bill presented by himself and his associates of the joint committee would meet with popular approval. Then he explained the provisions of the bill at great length. Referring to the number of gentlemen who were to constitute the commission, he said that for some time it was debated whether nine would not be a good number, but that it was finally decided that it should be composed of 15 members, as provided in the bill. This, he believed, was an exceedingly wise provision, for the number named was large enough to embrace every species of intellect, and all sorts of learning, thought, and legislative experience, but at the same time so small that the business of the tribunal could be conducted with exactness and dispatch. Of course, he continued, the composition of the commission and the provisions of the bill had been and would continue to be severely criticised by the strict partisans on both sides. One party claimed that it granted too much, and the other that it granted too little, but he was sure that the masses of the millions who had voted for one candidate or the other would be satisfied with the proposition and would gladly abide by its decision. In this vein Mr. Edmunds continued for some time, his speech being an appeal to the people for support, not an argument which would bear the critical examination of legal minds. His address was listened to with marked attention, however, and is the general subject of comment and discussion to-night. The universally expressed opinion is that the bill will become a law, but that it will meet with very considerable opposition from both political parties there is no doubt. It is believed among some of the leaders that if a sufficient opportunity is allowed for thought and debate the sentiment of the country will go against the measure, and it may be defeated; but there is no prospect at this time that such opportunity will be given. Indeed, it is stated on good authority to-night that the gentlemen who favor the bill in the Senate will force a night session on Monday, and on Tuesday refuse to adjourn until after a final vote on the bill has been taken.

MR. EDMUNDS' SPEECH IN FULL.

Mr. Edmunds said:

MR. PRESIDENT: As a fitting commencement of the consideration of this bill, I ask the Secretary to read the twelfth article of the amendment of the Constitution of the United States which the bill proposes to execute. [The Secretary then read that article.]

Mr. Edmunds, resuming his remarks, said: Under this article of the Constitution, Mr. President, some eight or ten million of the citizens of the United States authorized by the laws to select a Chief Magistrate in the way prescribed in this article, have endeavored to execute that duty, and by a very evenly-balanced number of voices, when you take them as a whole, they are understood to have expressed their preference for two different persons representing opposing politics, of legislations, and of Government, greater or less in principle and greater or less in degree, that it is not necessary for me to refer to; and the contest has been so close, when measured by the constitutional standard of voting by States for Electors, that it becomes a matter of serious dispute, either rightly or wrongly, between these five millions of voting citizens upon one side, and five millions upon another—I expressit merely in round numbers for convenience—which of their respective candidates has been constitutionally elected; and, without any provision of law for the execution of what remains to be done under the Constitution in ascertaining what person has received the highest number of Electoral votes, being a majority of the whole, we are brought face to face with the question of what means are left for deciding the dispute. Undoubtedly a large portion of the people of the United States, on either side of the question, sincerely believe that their candidate has been elected, and seriously believe that if it be not so finally ascertained a great wrong will have been done, not only to their personal rights and wishes, but to the cause of constitutional government. In this state of things if nothing is to be done; if the Constitution does not point clearly the way we are to tread, so that right-minded men of all parties shall understand it alike, whichever of these candidates obtains the actual possession of executive power will necessarily be looked upon by the friends of the other as a usurper; and if there is any one duty greater than another imposed upon those who have the final execution of what remains to be done in their hands, it is that of, if possible, providing some means that when they are accomplished, no matter what may be the result, all men will say they have been taken in due course of law, and so that all such men will say, whether their wishes are attained, or are disappointed, it is right, just as just men in the administration of justice, who look upon the causes that they or their neighbors have tried and determined in a constitutional and legal way feel from day to day that a jury in this case or a Judge in the other has not decided rightly, yet they would defend with all their power the judgment that they believed to be wrong, because without that civil institutions cannot exist.

A RESPONSIBLE AND UNPLEASANT DUTY.

So then, Mr. President, it has appeared to us who have been charged with this most onerous and responsible and unpleasant duty, that, if the Constitution authorizes us to lay down a line of procedure that should be clear and definite in itself and should lead to any result—and I use the words with deliberation—that should lead to any result—no matter which one—through the calm and orderly progress of the administration of law, and through the calm and orderly judgment of a tribunal bound by a solemn obligation to decide according to the Constitution and laws, it would be a beneficial act for the Republic; and, if on the other hand, we should fail to do this, our posterity, under this form or some other form of government, (no man can tell which,) would feel that we had failed in the hour of great need in performing a plain duty. This, then, Mr. President, is the situation, and under this state of things the committee with almost absolute unanimity have reported this bill. Opposing political opinions, and opposing political considerations, local wishes, and partisan feeling have subsided on both sides; and what all of us, of all opinions, educations, wishes, and feelings unite in reporting to you as a just and upright and lawful way, we recommend to your consideration. What it is that we recommend I will state. The first section of the bill provides in the first part of it for the simple ceremony, for the necessary union of the two houses—or meeting, to state it more exactly—on the occasion of determining who has the highest number of votes of the Electors for President and Vice President of the United States. It then proceeds to provide for the case in which only one set of papers or returns, as they are called, shall have appeared, and in respect to those cases it provides substantially—and I do not know but literally—what the bill introduced by my honorable friend from Indiana [Mr. Morton] a year ago, and which passed the Senate, although was brought back on a motion to reconsider, provided—that no return from a State about which a question should arise, there being only one return, should be left out of the count unless the two houses should separately agree that it ought to be left out. The principle on which that goes is one that is perfectly satisfactory to my mind, although I do not know that it would have any special stress in the particular emergency which we are now called upon to confront. I only speak of this as my own individual idea—that the first section is not perfectly logical. My own individual opinion would have been that any question about such a paper ought to have been referred to this same tribunal (I use that phrase for convenience,) and that it should take the same fate as any other. I need not, however, go into the discussion of that, because I have concurred in leaving it as it stands, and as we know it had been found accentable to a considerable majority of the Senate, but (as I say) this criticism of it, so far as I know, has no practical application to the present matter that we have to decide. The principle of it understand to have been, from the discussion of last year and from the discussion in committee, that if the case were so doubtful that the members of the two houses, acting under such solemn responsibilities, could not agree that the paper was not the constitutional vote of the State, the presumption should go in favor of the State.

THE DIFFICULTIES ENCOUNTERED.

Then we come to the second section, which covers the difficulties that we have to encounter in the present condition of affairs. The second section provides that if more than one return or paper purporting to be a return from a State, shall have been received by the Senate, purporting to be the certificates of the Electoral vote given at the last return, all those returns shall be opened by the President of the Senate, just as the Constitution says, in terms, that all the certificates shall be opened by him in the presence of the two houses. They shall be read by the Tellers which the bill provides for the appointment of, according to the universal practice from the foundation of the Government; only, I believe always hitherto one Teller has been appointed on the part of the Senate and two on the part of the House of Representatives, and the bill provides that there shall be two Tellers—an equal number—appointed by each house. Having been read by the Teller, the bill then proceeds to declare that all these double disputed papers "shall thereupon be submitted to the judgment and decision as to which is the true and lawful Electoral vote of such State to a commission." You will observe, Mr. President, precisely the question that is to be sent to this tribunal for its consideration: it is to inquire which of the papers of the conflicting ones is the paper that the Constitution calls for, that is, the Electoral vote of a State in the Union. The Constitution says, as it need scarcely have said—but some language must have been employed—it is the constitutional vote of the electors of the State in the manner prescribed by the Legislature in the selection of Electors who have voted for President that is to be sought for, and it is the person who has the highest number of those votes—I am not now quoting the language of the Constitution, but what everybody understands it to mean—who is to be President. Therefore, the tribunal, or commission as it is styled in the bill more acurately, is called upon to determine one single question between two conflicting papers claiming to be the constitutional certificates; and that is, they are to determine which of them is in conformity with the Constitution, and which of them is not.

THE APPOINTMENT OF THE COMMISSION.

It then provides for the appointment of the commission—its method of solution; and I shall have something more to say upon the subject of what they are to decide when I come to a later part of the bill, which again refers to what they are to do. The bill then comes to the selection of the commission. It provides that each house, on the Tuesday preceding the first Thursday in February—which changes the day for this occasion to an earlier period than that fixed by the general law, which is the second Wednesday in February—on the Tuesday succeeding that day, which I believe in this case is the 30th of January, each House shall, by a viva voce vote—the open, public and solemn personal choice of every member of each House—no secrecy of the ballot, no private combination that must not at least openly display itself, but just as the solemn judgments that we give upon the yeas and nays upon public measures—just as the solemn judgments of courts are given with all present and each knowing what the opinion of the other is—we are called upon by our own sworn duty to the Constitution and to the law to exercise a personal—a public, a responsible duty in selecting five members from each house to compose a part of this commission. Nobody, probably, would criticise the propriety of this mode of selection, if you are to say that the commission is to be composed at all of members of either house for the whole world is to know how each individual Senator and how each individual member of the House of Representatives has performed his responsible duty in the selection of a person who is to become the sworn judge in as great a dispute as probably ever existed in the world under the law. These 10 Senators and members of the House of Representatives selected in that way, with five of the Associate Justices of the Supreme Court of the United States, are to compose a commission of 15.

The Judges of the Supreme Court of the United States, as we all know, are composed of nine persons, and in order that there might be a certain symmetry of equipoise of relation, it was thought, after much consideration by the commission, that it was advisable to take an equal number of Senators and an equal number of members of the House of Representatives, and an equal number of the persons composing the Justices of the Supreme Court to perform this commission, so five came naturally to be the number referred to. If it had been thought wise to have made the total number of the commission less, nine for instance, as had been suggested, then there would have been three Senators and three members of the House of Representatives, and three Judges of the Supreme Court; but it appears to us, after much consideration, that 15 was, on the whole, the best number, so large as to produce every variety of intellect, capacity, and learning, and as to produce confidence against any possible attempt that might be made, scarcely conceivable to be sure, to unduly influence any one or two or three of this whole number by any of the motives that sometimes, as we know in the history of the world, have been led to influence people who are called upon to discharge high trusts, and at the same time to leave the commission so limited in numbers as that it should be capable of prompt effective consultation, and deliberate and orderly procedure.

DISTRIBUTING THE COURT.

Then the next step was to ascertain in what manner these five gentlemen out of the nine, all, of course, all pre-eminent in legal learning and in legal experience; all, of course, pre-eminent in their knowledge and study of the Constitution and the laws of our country; all, of course, equal in that deep respect which they receive from the people of every part of the Union, as in every part of it and for every part of it they daily administer law, should be treated. Of course it was a difficult task, because to select a particular five by name might seem to imply that there was some reason, personal or other, that the other particular part—four—should not be selected; and so, in analogy to what has always been a wise system in this good Government of ours, it appeared to us that a distribution of these gentlemen to the various parts of the Republic would be a just reason for particular selections; so one name, the Justice of the First Circuit, comes from the far-off borders of New-England the north-eastern part of the country; another, the Justice of the Third Circuit, has his residence and exercises his judicial functions in the centre of the great commercial populations of our Union; a third, he who administers justice in the Eighth Circuit has his home and residence in the great north-west, and the fourth, the Justice of the Ninth Circuit, has had his habitation and has administered justice for many years, except, of course, when attending here and administering justice in the Supreme Court, on what has been said to be the golden slope—that great far off portion of our republic so rapidly growing in wealth and in everything that makes the material prosperity of a self-governing people. We name them to compose four. Then there was an odd number to be obtained in order to guard against prejudice, (and I beg Senators to observe my words,) to guard against prejudice in the minds of these ten millions of active voters in what has taken place—not to guard against prejudice in Judges, not to guard against political opinions, or other form of government, (no man can tell which,) would feel that we had failed in the hour of great need in performing a plain duty. This, then, Mr. President, is the situation, and under this state of things the committee with almost absolute unanimity have reported this bill. Opposing political opinions, and opposing political considerations, local wishes, and partisan feeling have subsided on both sides; and what all of us, of all opinions, educations, wishes, and feelings unite in reporting to you as a just and upright and lawful way, we recommend to your consideration. What it is that we recommend I will state. THE APPOINTMENT OF THE COMMISSION.

It then provides for the appointment of the commission—its method of solution; and I shall have something more to say upon the subject of what they are to decide when I come to a later part of the bill, which again refers to what they are to do. The bill then comes to the selection of the commission. It provides that each house, on the Tuesday preceding the first Thursday in February—which changes the day for this occasion to an earlier period than that fixed by the general law, which is the second Wednesday in February—on the Tuesday succeeding that day, which I believe in this case is the 30th of January, each House shall, by a viva voce vote—the open, public and solemn personal choice of every member of each House—no secrecy of the ballot, no private combination that must not at least openly display itself, but just as the solemn judgments that we give upon the yeas and nays upon public measures—just as the solemn judgments of courts are given with all present and each knowing what the opinion of the other is—we are called upon by our own sworn duty to the Constitution and to the law to exercise a personal—a public, a responsible duty in selecting five members from each house to compose a part of this commission. These 10 Senators and members of the House of Representatives selected in that way, with five of the Associate Justices of the Supreme Court of the United States, are to compose a commission of 15.

The Judges of the Supreme Court of the United States, as we all know, are composed of ment of the United States, directed to the President of the Senate, the certificates of the votes which have been given for President." Then it declared that the President of the Senate shall, in the presence of the Senate and House of Representatives, open all the certificates, and the votes shall then be counted. You will perceive, Mr. President, that if the makers of the Constitution had designed to repose in the President of the Senate the power to decide what was a vote, and to determine its disposition, as they had taken pains in every other part of the Constitution in the clearest language to say what the Senate might and might not do, what its powers should be, and those of the House of Representatives; as they had taken pains in the clearest way, and with the minutest carefulness of language, to say what powers the President of the United States should exercise, and what powers should not be exercised by any authority, and when, in respect of the judicial branch they had also, with the same industious diligence in conferring delegated powers, carefully enumerated every power of the Judiciary, how unfortunate it was, had they designed to confer that power upon that chair, that they had not used the two words that would have enabled them to say so. It would have saved a vast deal of dispute, and we can scarcely imagine it possible that a body of men, who in every respect had been so critically exact in the devolution of the functions and powers of this Government, should have remained by mere accident so silent upon perhaps the most important part for the perpetuity of the Republic in peace, of any one of the powers that the Constitution created or bestowed. I say, Sir, that it staggers human oreculity, that if that body of men had designed to turn the President of the Senate into a Judge in the most critical of all cases for the well-being of the Republic, and in a case where he was not personally interested, that he himself would be at first, and perhaps often afterward, as it happened, the very man who was to profit or to lose by his decision.

THE VOTES SHALL BE COUNTED.

It staggers human credulity that if they had intended to repose such a decided power in that chair they should not have said so. But, after all, we must be governed by what the Constitution does say, and I admit, if you can imply from it fairly and clearly that the power to open a certificate implies the power to determine upon the legal nature of its contents when it is opened, then the President of the Senate must have that power, because the power is delegated to him, and to no one else, to open all the certificates. It then proceeds to say that the votes shall be counted which are disclosed by the opening of the certificates. It does not say they shall be counted by him. If it had been intended that they should be counted by him, two words would have said so, and two very short words at that. But if it had said they should be counted by him, we should have been a great ways yet from that fundamental and prior question as to what is the legal nature of the thing that he is to enumerate—to count—not to decide. The Judge in a tribunal decides, the clerk counts. The language then, as everybody agrees, does not say that the President of the Senate shall have the power to count, even in the arithmetical sense of the term; much less does it say that he shall have power to decide anything. It says that he shall count all the certificates. But I suppose we go back a little and inquire, Does that imply it? I suppose that every body will admit that the power to open does not necessarily imply a power to count, because it is not necessary to count in order to open, and an implied power only arises when it is necessary that the so-called implied power should be exercised in order to the performance of the power that is given. The power that is given by the words of the Constitution is the power to "open." Now, the power to count is not essential to the power to open. You can open without counting. If the language had been reversed, and it had said that the President of the Senate should count these votes, the certificates being sent to him, of course the implication would have arisen that he must open the certificates, because he could not count them until he did open them. But it happens that the language is exactly the other way. He shall open them, and then the counting shall take place, without stating by whom in terms. Those who contend that it is an implied power from the power to open must show inevitable logic that the power to do the first thing being granted, it necessarily follows that the power to do the second is covered by implication. In short, the power to do one thing, implies the power to do two. I have not been able to see that that was a very clear, logical proposition. Plainly, it is not. Then let us go back a step and come to where I think the fundamental question really lies: The President of the Senate is to "open all the certificates." It may be said, and it must be said, that he is not authorized to open anything that is not a certificate. The Constitution only commands him to open "certificates," and so it is argued he must decide, therefore, which is a certificate, and his decision must be binding, because the Constitution has reposed in him the power to open certificates, and nothing else. How long would that stand the test of examination? The same article that the Constitution says that he is to open what the Electors send to him. On that same line of argument you extend the right to decide right back to the Electors. You say the Elector, then, in this Constitution, by the very same argument, is to decide what is the certificate. Or, if you go forward where do you find yourself? You find the very next clause is that if there be a failure of anybody to get a majority of all the votes, the House of Representatives shall elect. On the same argument you are bound to say, and you cannot avoid it—nobody can—that the House of Representatives is the sole and exclusive judge of when the contingency occurs that entitles it to act, and if one of these modes had received three-fourths of the votes, and you, Sir, under this claim of power in the Constitution, had decided that he had, and that they were all valid votes, and that he was the President, the House could retire into its own hall, and, in the very same language of the Constitution, turn around and say: "By the same authority we decide" on the same reasons exactly "that nobody has a majority and we will elect our President." Then if you would follow it a little further in the same line it says that in case of a failure to elect, the Vice President shall be President. Somebody announces immediately in and says, "I am the Vice President, everybody admits that I am elected. I declare under this power of the Constitution that the contingency has occurred where I am to act as President." I say to the man that the President of the Senate has appointed to be declared elected "Go your way, you are not President"; I say to the man, that the House of Representatives has elected somebody else—"Depart. The same Constitution that you live by also gives me the last chance at this, and I send you all away, and I am President because I determine whether the contingency has happened whether I am to act or not." And then you might come back the next day, Mr. President, to carry it clear through, and say that they were both disabled and unable to perform their duties, and you would act as President, and that is conclusive. Sir, to borrow a phrase from my learned friend from Ohio, [Mr. Thurman,] "That wont do." [Laughter.]

THE CONSTITUTION DISCUSSED.

To do an act which the Constitution demands is one thing; to decide a dispute is an entirely different thing. Whatever the Constitution demands you are to do. Whatever the Constitution commands the Executive he is to do. Whatever the Constitution authorizes to be decided the judiciary or some other tribunal fixed by law or by the Constitution itself is to decide. Those are the only three ways in which the Government can express itself, so that whatever you are to do; whatever the claims at the other end of the Capitol may be that they have a right to do; whatever the Vice President may say that he has a right to do under the Constitution when the President has not been elected; whatever you, the President of the Senate, have a right to do. When both of them are unable to perform the duties of their office, there still remains behind it all, in the very essence of government, the necessity of having a power that binds you all at the same time; to determine when and under what circumstances each of you shall bring your forces into play; and as the Constitution has not fixed that tribunal, it has declared that Congress shall pass every law which shall carry into execution every power which is vested anywhere in the Government. The question may be asked: Why did not the Constitution say so then? Is it did not say so because, after having defined the range of powers, and their nature, for every department of the Government, and commanded what should be done, if left, as all constitutions in all civilized governments everywhere have done, and must do forever to the law-making power, from time to time to carry all these great powers into effect by the regular measure of legislative procedure. I can scarcely state that so well. I am sure I cannot as it is stated by the Supreme Court of the United States itself more than 80 years ago, when just as now, and just as always in governments there arise great disputes touching the powers of government. This was a question of State rights, of the right of the Supreme Court of the United States to disregard and set aside the judgment of the great State of Virginia; and when arguments similar to those that I have been putting for want as what might be suggested against this bill and about the language of the Constitution were made, the court answered them in this way: "The Constitution unavoidably deals in general language. It did not suit the purposes of the people in framing this great charter of our liberties to provide for minute specifications of its powers and to declare the means by which those powers should be carried into execution."

Mark the words, Mr. President, "or to declare the means by which those powers should be carried into execution." It was foreseen that this would be a perilous and difficult, if not impracticable, task. The instrument was not intended to provide merely for the exigencies of a few years, but was to endure through a long lapse of ages, the events of which were locked up in the inscrutable purposes of Providence. It could not be foreseen what new changes and modifications of power might be indispensable to effectuate the general object of the charter, and restrictions and specifications which at the time might seem salutary, might in the end prove the overthrow of the system itself. Hence, its powers are expressed in general terms, leaving the Legislature, from time to time, to adopt its own means to effectuate legitimate objects and to mold and model the exercise of its powers as its own wisdom and the public interests should require. (Martin vs. Hunters, lessee, 1 Wheaton, 326.) If there is any one principle of constitutional law that is settled as deep as the foundations of the Government itself, it is that which I have just read. There is scarcely one—in fact I only remember one—provision of the Constitution of the United States that has been said to execute itself, and for which it was not necessary or proper that there should be the provisions of legislation to carry it into effect and to regulate the methods and manners by which results should be arrived at. I believe it was said in the case of Prigg against the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania on the subject of fugitive slaves, that as the Constitution recognized a slave as property, and as the fugitive clause in the Constitution gave the master the right to his property, if it should have escaped from him, that clause in the Constitution did execute itself, so far as the right of the master was concerned to recapture his property anywhere he could find it, if he could do so without violence and without a breach of the peace.

THE NECESSITY FOR LEGISLATIVE ACTION.

That was put upon the ground that it was simply a recognition of the right of property, just as, at the common law as under the laws of most of the States, no doubt a man would be entitled, if he could do it without violence or a breach of the peace, to recapture his children or his wife, who were illegally detained from him. But beyond that, I say I know of no instance in this wide variety of powers—legislative, executive, and judicial—anywhere where there is not the di necessity for legislative action to regulate and carry on the great objects of the exertion of the powers that are not by implication but expressly vested in some of the departments of Government, and even in that case to which I have alluded, where the court said that the Constitution did execute itself, they nevertheless held that that also was a proper subject of legislative action of Congress, and that Congress might regulate, as it had regulated, the manner in which and the means by which the owner of the slave should assert his right to his property. The President of the United States, by the express language of the Constitution, is the Commander in Chief of the Armies and Navies of the Republic, and yet from the beginning until now, without question as to the constitutional propriety of such legislation, the manner in which and the means by which he shall exercise the power of Commander in Chief of the Army has been regulated by law. The Constitution of the United States vests judicial power in one Supreme Court and in such inferior courts as Congress, from time to time, may establish, and yet one of the very first acts that Congress, under this Constitution, ever passed, was an act that regulated and guided and controlled from top to bottom the exercise of those powers that more clearly and expressly delegated to the judicial branch, and no man ever suspected that Congress was exceeding its power in providing by law for the means and ways of the performance of the great judicial functions, those which least of all it would be safe for a Republic, should it be unduly meddled with. So, Mr. President, it does appear to us, without my enlarging upon this branch of the discussion, and for the very few reasons that I have so feebly stated, that the idea that this bill can be assailed as an unconstitutional measure, even if you accept the Constitution has vested the power of performing the executive or ministerial function of counting the votes of which the Constitution says the person having the greatest number shall be President is not at all maintainable. You have only done in this bill as Congress has in respect to every other branch of the Government and for all time, year by year, have you been daily doing with the acceptance of everybody. It only provides for ascertaining, in a lawful and regular way, what is the subject upon which this executive function of counting the vote, finding out who has the highest number, rests. It might be contended with considerable force, even if the duty, as far as I have heard it claimed for you, Mr. President, rested in that chair, that we have not furnished you the means of justly performing that duty; and that would be true, unless it should be contended that the Constitution had reposed in you the functions of Congress and of the Judiciary, to hear, try, and determine all questions of law and fact, once for all; as in a given case, whether you should be President or Mr. Tilden United States or not. If the pretension goes as far as that, of course, this bill is against it. But if it only goes to the point that you are to exercise a commanded ministerial duty of counting a vote, then upon the principles that I have stated it would be entirely competent and the obsolute duty of Congress to provide you a means of finding out what is the vote you are to count, and compelling you, as it does courts, Presidents, everybody, to follow the judgment of whatever tribunal should have ascertained that fact for you, because it is only an act which you are to do, not a decision that you are to render.

THE DECIDING POWER.

But, as I have said, I only intended on this occasion to explain in as brief way as I could, exactly what the bill is, and in a general way, the grounds upon which it rests. The illustrations that might be still further made to show that this deciding power of which I am speaking, does not rest with you, and as I think to show equally that it does not rest with either House of Congress until Congress provides a law that allows it to rest there, are so numerous that the whole day might be spent upon them. There is one other topic which I will only just allude to at this present time, which, of course, bears upon it, and that is what I called the contemporaneous construction of the Constitution in such cases. It has been said by many persons, and it appears to be largely believed, if you can take the statements of newspapers, that for a great many years the occupant of your chair has, with the acquiescence of everybody, so construed the Constitution, and so it is implied that must be the true construction of the Constitution in the present case, that now for so many years, or until a few years back—15 or 20, or whatever the time may be—it had always been done. If that were true, it would be entitled to weight in the consideration of this question, perhaps to great weight; but a material inquiry, as it is with all cases of precedent, is to know whether it is true to begin with. Now, I deny emphatically that this is the history of the practice under the Constitution, and when I say that I do not mean to say that the President of the Senate has not counted the votes in the arithmetical sense, although I suppose as a matter of fact that from the time of John Langdon to that of Schuyler Colfax, the President of the Senate never counted one of them. I will take it for granted that as a matter of law he did do the enumeration, although I suppose, as a matter of truth in every instance, the tellers who sat at the Clerk's desk did all the counting. What did take place for the first 40 years of the Republic? There never was an instance in which a paper coming from a State under its great seal, and certefied by its Governor as to who had been elected Electors, or the certificates of the Electors themselves as to how they had voted, was ever drawn into question, and the thing that the Presidents of the Senate had to deal with was exactly the sort of thing that you had to deal with when, yesterday, you laid before us, under the great seal of the State of Maine, the credentials of a Senator, a public act of that great State in a condition of peace and order, with only one Government or pretended Government, with only one seal, and that the universal acquiescence of all parties, although it is full of parties. The reign of law had produced a result and there was nothing for you to decide if you had the power of decision. All that you had was to do, for the act of 1866 says that the Governor of the State shall certify to the President of the Senate who has been elected. Suppose you were to assume on such a act of papers as that that you had a right to decide whether that was the certificate of the Government and the Constitution says pretty much the same thing in this case, would you ever think of doing such a thing? I rather think not. But that is little of what I was saying that the precidents. On the first occasion when the language of the suggestion of the Constitutional Convention in order to put the Government into force. The Electors were recommended to send their certificates, not to the President of the Senate as the Constitution in explicit terms says but to the Secretary of the United States [sic Senate?] and that the Senate not yet having a Vice President, and not yet having a constitutional President, for the Constitution says that the Vice President shall be the President of the Senate, and it is only in his absence that a President pro tempore is to be appointed, a President of the Senate should be appointed for the sole purpose of opening and counting as the words are, the Etectoral votes. What did it mean? Is there anybody who hears me who believes that that constitutional Convention by those words, intended to command the President of the Senate, elected for the sole purpose of counting, to enter into, or have a right to enter into, an inquiry as to what States had ratified the Constitution, which inquiry should find any body? Suppose the Senate differed with Mr. John Longdon; supposing he had said, when the papers all came in: "There is one from Rhode Island," which had not yet ratified the Constitution, as we know historically; suppose there was a vote from Rhode Island for somebody, and Mr. Langdon had undertaken to say: "Certainly I take the vote of Rhode Island, she is in the Union," do you suppose there was a single Senator present who, as the saying is would have submitted to it for a moment? The Constitution said that the votes should be counted. The Constitutional Convention asked the Senate, as it did, to appoint him for the purpose of counting the votes. It did not appoint him for the purpose of judging the votes. If it had it would have said so. That was the first instance. But if you are to give the language its broadest possible interpretation fill it with all the hopes and wishes of the five millions of people who wish as I do, and what would you find. You would find that on that very day each house of Congress, by a resolution of its own, provided for the manner in which he should pronounce that result, and commanded him in what form he should make it known to the persons whom they said he had received the information that they had been elected and he obeyed the command. If he had this independent power that is talked about, vested in him by the Constitution as being the supreme Judge only in the presence of indifferent witnesses who have no more right to interfere than a witness in a case in the midst of proceeding of the Judge, would then have done that.

CONCLUDING REMARKS.

I do not think that the idea ever entered their heads. And as you sweep along down through the course of time of cases when there was no contest or dispute, but the merely formal reading and counting of papers, it is of very little consequence to inquire whether the President of the Senate read and counted them, or whether the letters read and counted them, or whether nobody read and counted them, so that you get at what everybody knew before hand was the result. But whenever and on the first occasion that any question arose as to what was the constitutional vote of a State, either arising from ineligibility or other questions about its Electors, from the condition of the State itself, which is exactly the same thing, for there the question is, is it the vote of a State? and that involves not only the elegibility of the elector the day of the meeting or the existence of the State, or the pursuit of the State law; it involves quite as much as the other. You find that the President of the Senate never hinted on the face of the earth, that he had such a power; and that each house in the absence of legislation assumed. I think there is great doubt about the correctness of their assumption, but they did assume, either by the expression of their judgment or by the dictates of their command, to determine what should be done. So then, Mr. President, it cannot be maintained that this bill is unconstitutional upon the ground that it takes away from the President of the Senate or the House of Representatives a power which the Constitution has vested in them, free from limit, and free from guide, and free from regulation; to be exercised according to their own opinion of what may be the public propriety of the occasion.

Having said so much, Mr. President, for the present I dismiss the subject, in the hope that the Senate will carefully consider whether it is wise, by stimulating doubts in their own minds, or by allowing their wishes to overturn their judgment, to send this Republic on the first Thursday in February, or the second Wednesday in that month, like the mountains which the poet has spoken of, thus were tumbling into the sea without a shore; or whether it is better that in the fair course of equal law a dispute shall be justly settled.

OPPOSITION IN PHILADELPHIA.

VIEWS OF PROMINENT LAWYERS AND BUSINESS MEN—THE PROPOSED COMPROMISE SUBVERSIVE OF THE WILL OF THE PEOPLE AND IN DIRECT VIOLATION OF THE CONSTITUTION.

Special Dispatch to the New-York Times.

PHILADELPHIA, Jan. 20.—The Republicans of this city, who comprise a large majority of the prominent men, have discussed with much earnestness the so-called compromise on the Presidential question during the past few days. As a result of this interchange of opinions, the conclusions arrived at have been widely separated, one party favoring a settlement at all hazards, while the other regard the proposed compromise as an unequivocal surrender of an invincible position by the Republicans. In fact, it is not held to be a compromise at all, but a giving up of the rights held by the greatest and best political organization that ever held power to a party which cannot be trusted. Those who entertain the latter opinion are in the majority and are composed of the best men, and those who do the thinking and close studying of the complex questions which agitate the country. The mercantile community, reflects its opinions in such gentlemen as E. R. Jeffries, Christian J. Hoffman, Samuel Bissham, and others. The sentiment expressed is that this is no compromise, but a settlement which is earnestly desired, because the sooner it is done business will revive. They do not fear that Hayes will not be returned as elected, because to a man they believe he is the legally elected President; but this mode of settlement to their minds will demonstrate the matter more fully.

Hon. Benjamin Harris Brewster, one of the most eminent jurists of this city, is of opinion that the committee are attempting a legal impossibility, and asks what right any body of men have to seek a compromise when that action is in direct violation of law. No doubt they would like to quiet the fears of timid men in the North and silence the tongues of reckless individuals in the South, but there is no such thing as a compromise. Congress has nothing whatever to do in the matter. The manner in which the Electoral vote shall be counted is clearly provided for by the Constitution. Suppose either party is dissatisfied with the choice of the committee—the opposition can make no claim to the constitutionality of the choice. Those who so desire may declare that no Executive has been legally elected.

Rufus E. Shapley, Esq., another counselor of prominence, while in a measure favoring the plan proposed, states that if it is the intention that the action of the committee shall be final, he doubts the constitutionality of the proceeding, and does not see how Congress can delegate its power to any body of men or be bound by its action.

Hon. Henry C. Carey, the well-known political economist, expressed his views very fully in the matter, and said that among the many members of the Republican Party with whom he had met, and with whom the question had been discussed, "the compromise" had called forth expressions of universal dissatisfaction. Indeed, it could not be regarded in the light of a compromise, but should be called a surrender. Mr. Carey had written a letter to Judge Kelley, in which he pointed out the folly of the matter inasmuch as it opened up the whole question again, and he thought that all good Republicans should be horrified at such a plan of settlement. He did not see how the Judges of the Supreme Court could go into the committee conscientiously and act upon such an unlawful measure. It is nothing more nor less than adding to the Constitution of the United States, in the most illegal manner and in defiance of all set rules for the government of the country, and furthermore, would result in the selection of Mr. Tilden as the next President. If this course is allowed to proceed there is no telling what may be the next movement, and it is the end of all popular election by the people. It is opening the flood-gates to chicanery, and setting at defiance the expressed will of the people. Every means should be used to prevent its consummation by the people at large, who have a desire to perpetuate our institutions. Article V. of the original Constitution of the United States shows how close is the power to make amendment. It requires a two-thirds vote of both houses of Congress and the ratification of two-thirds of the States, but here is the most important amendment ever proposed to our Constitution, which says how the ruler of the people shall be chosen, rushed through in a week. Only the weak and timid are in favor of a compromise, and therefore those who have the courage to stand out against such actions must be encouraged.

Hon. John W. Forney, editor of the Press, is of the opinion that this is a crisis which demands forbearance as well as fair play, and he quotes Gen. Dix's letter to Congressman Kasson regarding the powers of Congress, and forbids them to overrule the action of the Electoral College. The support given the measure in the House and Senate will do much to modify party opposition and neutralize animosity, he thinks. The opinions of the prominent members of the party should be entitled to great consideration, and while not favoring the plan at all, he is willing to submit to any settlement consistent with the laws of the land. Col. Forney favors moderation in the matter on the part of the Republicans, and believes that the result will be satisfactory.

THE SENTIMENT IN CONNECTICUT.

"UNCOMMON ANXIETY" OF THE DEMOCRATS IN THE LEGISLATURE TO RUSH THROUGH AN APPROVAL OF THE MEASURE—THE REPUBLICANS OF THE STATE OPPOSED TO IT.

From Our Own Correspondent.

HARTFORD, Saturday, Jan. 20, 1877.

In the State Senate, yesterday, Mr. Bishop, Democrat, of the Tenth District, offered a resolution very strongly indorsing the National Returning Board project, which the joint committee of the two houses have agreed upon, and it was adopted amid the press of business before the Republican Senators had time to realize what they were about. Then it was immediately transmitted to the lower house, and taken up in that body, where it suddenly appeared, of course, as a surprise to the Republicans; but a motion to table prevailed after some debate, and it was made the special order for 11 o'clock next Wednesday forenoon. The treatment of the resolution by the House Republicans was exceedingly mild, in view of the fact that a very large majority of the party here are wholly opposed to the plan proposed, so far as can be judged by promiscuous conferences and the general tone of conversation upon the street. The only reason urged for laying it over was to make the indorsement of the scheme more emphatic; but that reason would not have prevailed in the minds of members, probably, had not the Democrats in the course of the discussion showed what Dr. Woolsey styled "uncommon anxiety" when he spoke of Mr. Tilden's designs upon the Presidency. It is now probable that the resolution will fail altogether, as it should, and in its stead something be agreed upon which will fairly express the best views of Republicans with reference to the matter. In justice to the Republican members it should be said that very few of them had read the text of the plan, and it was unfortunate that such should have been the fact, because the occasion was one when there was needed upon the floor some well-informed member who would at the outset have exposed the whole scheme as one belonging outside of the constitutional prerogatives of Congress entirely. After the adjournment of the two houses the matter was canvassed thoughtfully, and the prevailing ignorance on the details of the plan was speedily enlightened, and it was generally considered that the party had escaped a most unfortunate committal which was designedly sought by the cunning and craft of the Democratic leaders. Such action as may be taken on Wednesday will no doubt fully rectify the error of yesterday on the part of the Senate, and by the intelligent action of the House give that body an opportunity to place itself right so far as its Republican membership is concerned.

The Hartford Times, the leading Democratic paper of the State, has given in its support to the measure, while Senator Eaton denounces the whole thing as a fraud. The Courant and Post do not approve the plan, and they fairly reflect Republican sentiment.

VIEWS OF THE REPUBLICAN PRESS.

WHAT REPRESENTATIVE NEWSPAPERS IN DIFFERENT SECTIONS THINK OF THE PROPOSAL.

From the Cincinnati Commercial.

We regard this report as the solution of the Presidential question. The pressure in favor of it will be overwhelming. Relief from suspense will be the occasion for general rejoicing. Let us have peace.

From the Troy Times.

It would seem best either to pass the bill absolutely or reject it absolutely. Patchwork tinkering cannot reach the real, fundamental vice of the measure, which lies in the principle on which it is based, and not merely in details.

From the Albany Journal.

We repeat, the just criticism upon the plan does not relate to its effect upon the present case, but to the fact that it proceeds upon a false assumption of power on the part of Congress, that it disregards the constitutional rule, and that it may lead to dangerous practices in the future.

From the New-Yorker Allgemeine Zeitung.

We consider the attempt at solving the Presidential problem by the methods of the compromise as utterly abortive. In making this attempt Congress is on the road to fly precipitately from the Constitution, and to consummate a coup, the effect of which will be an utter demoralization of our public life in the future.

From the Buffalo Commercial Advertiser.

If the plan of reference has been adopted, as reported, we do not see why it should not be acceptable to all fair-minded Republicans and Democrats alike. The proposed board of final reference, as to all disputed votes, is as fairly balanced politically as possible, and if Hayes and Wheeler cannot be counted in by a process absolutely impartial, non-partisan, and just, we do not desire to see them inaugurated.

From the Boston Traveller.

While, therefore, we admit the correctness of the result which inevitably must be reached by the proposed plan, and while we admit the good intentions of the framers of the plan, we cannot but protest that it is contrary to the letter and spirit of the Constitution; and it is not equitable, since it submits to arbitration a question which has been settled already, in giving a party which habitually rebels against the legal expression of the popular will a chance to turn defeat into victory.

From the Worcester (Mass.) Spy.

The first thing to be said of this scheme is, that it is extra constitutional. There is no authority or warrant for it in the National Constitution. It is a scheme of proceeding constructed outside of the Constitution, which may serve a present purpose while it establishes a precedent that may become dangerous. It usurps power not granted to Congress by the Constitution, and, therefore, is revolutionary in its tendency. Who can tell what consequences may flow from the establishment of such a precedent in the years to come?

From the Philadelphia Press.

In the absence of a clear comprehension of the workings of the bill there is a natural feeling of uncertainty as to whether it should be approved or condemned. So far as it involves concessions or sacrifices on either side, they have apparently been made by the Republicans. The Democrats had nothing to surrender. They were beaten at the polls, but their candidate has advanced such immense sums for the purpose of buying his way into the Presidential chair that he is anxious to retain a chance of gratifying his ambition by every device human ingenuity can devise and a lavish expenditure procure.

From the Philadelphia North American.

The proposed plan of accommodation submitted by the Joint Committee yesterday is outside of the Constitution, and ought not to be adopted. We want no precedents of departure from the plain rendering of the organic law. No matter whom it seats, he would not be the constitutional Executive. No experiments, gentlemen, and no cobbling of the organic law. If it does not cover the case, amend it. If it works distemper, abolish it. But do not step from the solid ground of common sense, and do not temporize. Stick to the Constitution, and abide the consequences.

From the Trenton (N. J.) Gazette.

The plan now proposed is a radical departure from these established and definite landmarks without any compensating advantages. It simply cuts the ship of State loose from safe anchorage and sets her adrift upon an uncertain sea. Under the constitutional plan a definite and final result would be promptly arrived at. Under the compromise plan the time and character of the result are both uncertain, and the country would be kept in a state of feverish and disastrous misgivings. But, above all, it is a weak temporizing with the vital principle of government. No nation that thus surrenders to clamor and gives unconstitutional limits for vague and limitless compromise in deference to the demands of expediency, can long survive.

From the Boston Advertiser.

The constitution of the tribunal to decide disputed questions arising in the count of votes is not only a great improvement upon that originally proposed, but it is as nearly faultless as the nature of the circumstance would admit. It meets the grand test of fairness between the two parties, and at the same time eliminates the slight element of chance, which was in many minds the strongest objection to the plan as first made public. Moreover, it can be said of the whole scheme, that it is conceived in the best possible spirit; that it preserves absolutely the rights of parties, and that its adoption is highly creditable to the gentlemen of both sides and of both houses who have agreed to it.

From the Indianapolis Journal.

Putting aside all questions of partisan politics, we cannot afford to allow the settlement of the Presidential question to drift beyond the 4th of March. It ought to be settled in the way provided by the Constitution; but, if not in that way, it had better be settled in some extra-constitutional way than not at all. The new plan has been devised and reported by a joint commission of Republicans and Democrats. It represents their aggregate wisdom and patriotism. The Journal believes it to be weak and faulty in some important respects, but if adopted by Congress it will receive the hearty support as furnishing the basis or a peaceable and conclusive determination of the pending controversy, forced upon the country by the revolutionary course of the Democratic Party.

From the Columbus (Ohio) State Journal.

Is it possible to touch solid bottom in such a quicksand of ifs, and unlesses, and provideds, and reservations and evasions as this? It seems absolutely hopeless. The only solid foundation rests upon the unbroken precedent of the first 10 terms under the Constitution, during all of which the Vice President, described usually as "the President of the Senate," held the custody of the votes, opened them, counted them, and declared the result, in the presence of the two houses acting as witnesses—the tellers simply "making lists" of the votes, as the Clerk does in either house while calling the roll, and having no more control of the vote than that officer. It seems necessary to remind gentlemen once more of the principle never before controverted in the history of the country, that "the two houses have no more control over the Electoral Colleges than the Colleges have over the two houses." The Committee on Counting the Vote, in assuming for the two houses the power to inquire into the election and qualification of the members of the Electoral Colleges, is guilty of a clear usurpation.

From the Cincinnati Gazette.

Sober people outside the unwholesome air of the capital are amased to hear of such propositions to set aside the National Constitution being entertained and actually agreed to by representatives of the two parties. The revolutionists of France hardly tore old institutions to pieces more rashly. What they are proposing to do is of immeasurably more importance than the question whether Hayes or Tilden shall be President. The nation can survive the Presidency of either. But after this revolution of the Constitution in the matter of electing the President, and this usurpation by Congress of power to say who shall be President, and even to job it out for outside persons to decide, it is not likely that we should have any more elections of Presidents by the people. No one can expect for the Constitution remain after this assumption by Congress of power to set it aside.

From the Utica Herald.

The Constitution stands in its plain simplicity against this artificial complexity. Plain words tell who shall open the certificates, and those who wrote them interpreted also who shall count the votes. In the last analysis, Clifford or some other partisan will decide the action of this commission. No possible reason exists why its findings will be more just or more satisfactory than those of the Presidents of the Senate. If the fifth Justice shall be Republican, so will the whole commission be; if he shall be Davis, it will be intensely Democratic. But the invention prolongs the uncertainty and aggravates the alarm. It multiplies the steps necessary to reach the end. It increases the chances for postponing the settlement beyond the 4th of March, and the compelling the excitement and cost of another Presidential canvass. Like all subterfages, it does not cure; it rather creates new evils. The commission is as likely to discover new difficulties as to solve the present problem. The straight and narrow way is to count the votes as our forefathers counted them.

From the Washington Chronicle.

If it is unconstitutional, if the Judges cannot be compelled to serve in such a matter, what a cruel farce is the plan of the committee. What a mischievous mouse after the tremendous labor of the mountain! Would it, if passed, have any binding weight upon the nation? Would it satisfy the people or country? Can the constitutional rights of the States be compromised by a joint committee of the two houses; the provisions of the Constitution invalidated by a law of Congress? Besides, what guarantee have they that the Judges will serve? They cannot be coerced. Is it probable that they will voluntarily accept a position of such arrogant authority at this moment; drag their ermine in the dirty pool of politics in a crisis like the present; assume a function and power prohibited to them as Judges by the Constitution, and which can only be assumed by the usurpation, under the pressure of a simple law, of a function and power belonging under the Constitution to another; risk their reputation and cripple their usefulness in their judicial duties, to perform the duties in the count as they may—wisely, justly, impartially, and independently—their motives will be suspected and impugned, and all without either honors or profit to them? What a plan!

From the Boston Commonwealth.

With the forms of law observed and the Constitution everywhere inviolate, as we believe, a scheme is now perfected, with the aid of prominent Republicans, by which a chance is offered to the defeated Democrats to secure the prize of the national contest. Admitting, as we will, that there have been irregularities in some States—but not alone in those more frequently called in question, and no more than attend every Presidential contest—and that party interests have been conspicuous on both sides, as in all heated canvasses—after all, the result, if this plan is adopted, will be much of the "prize-package" order—as one of the Senators fitly classed it—our next President will be chosen, pure and solely, of one of the Justices of the Supreme Court—he who may be accepted as a compromise candidate by two Republican and two Democratic Justices, the first four being designated by the bill! What advantage there is in a choice thus made over that of the President of the Senate, whom the Constitution designates as the determining officer—save that he is at present unknown—we fail to see. We should much rather prefer to keep such questions as far away as possible from our highest law expounders, and allow the party that succeeds to be judged by the American people at the next election.

CITY OPINIONS.

VIEWS OF THE SEVENTEENTH WARD REPUBLICANS.

A regular business meeting of the Seventeenth Ward Republican Association was held last night at No. 385 Bowery, the President, Mr. Julius Harburger, in the chair. Mr. A. E. Voss acted as Secretary. After the transaction of routine business, Mr. C. Otto Baess, Chairman of the Executive Committee, reported upon various subjects and then submitted the following, which was adopted amid much enthusiasm:

Whereas, The members of the Seventeenth Ward Republican Association, at their meeting, held on the 24th inst., deemed it no more than just, proper, and timely to express their high appreciation of the eminent and valuable services, the untiring, yet disinterested, devotion to the Republican cause, of THE NEW-YORK TIMES by adopting suitable resolutions to that effect, and

Whereas, These sentiments have found such ready and hearty response, as is shown by similar action on the part of so many other Republican organizations in this city and county; therefore,

Resolved, That the thanks of this association be herewith tendered to the other organizations referred to for having joined us in publicly recognizing the great merits of THE NEW-YORK TIMES, thereby "doing honor to whom honor is due."

J. E. Strass then offered the following, which was also adopted:

Whereas, The Constitution itself, as well as many precedents and long usage, clearly indicate that the duty and function of "opening and counting" the Electoral vote devolves upon the President of the Senate; and

Whereas, Any departure from this long-established practice means a concession to the revolutionary clamoring and threatening of Democratic demagogism; therefore

Resolved, That the members of this association express the hope that the Republicans in both Houses of Congress will not lapse into any weakness, but that they will insist firmly upon the continuation of a practice—in connection with the counting of the Electoral vote—which is founded upon constitutional law, and is recognized by precedent.

Resolved, That we indorse heartily the action of Senator Morton in withholding his name from the report of the joint committee of Congress.

THE PROPOSED TILDEN MASS-MEETING.

The Tammany Democrats who have held a number of conferences in the Everett House, in regard to a mass-meeting to manufacture public opinion on the settlement of the Presidential question, in favor of Tilden, held another meeting last evening, ex-Mayor Wickham in the chair. After some discussion it was determined to postpone further action in relation to the meeting, the members of the conference believing that the recent action of the Joint Committee of Congress on the Counting of the Electoral Vote will be ratified by both houses of Congress, and that in that event Tilden's chances for obtaining the Presidential chair will be greatly enhanced, if not assured. One of the members of the conference was of the opinion that the Republicans had greatly receded from the stand they had taken immediately after the election, and that the decision of the question as to who should be President was now a lottery with the chances in favor of Tilden. The meeting adjourned subject to the call of the Chair.

MR. WHEELER SILENT.

WATERTOWN, Jan. 20.—Hon. William A. Wheeler declines to express an opinion on the compromise bill.

THE GENEVA AWARD BILL.

ITS PROVISIONS—CLAIMANTS ALLOWED TO SUE IN THE COURT OF CLAIMS.

WASHINGTON, Jan. 20.—The bill to provide for the further disposition of the moneys received under the Geneva award, introduced by Mr. Kernan to-day, provides that all persons and corporations claiming to be entitled to any portion of the moneys received by the United States Government from Great Britain in payment of the Geneva award are authorized to sue for the same in the United States Court of Claims, within one year from the passage of this act, as all other claims are sued for in that court, and they shall be entitled to recover for all losses which were the basis for the Geneva award, or were considered by the Geneva Tribunal of Arbitration as the proper subject of indemnity. In calculating the amount of award, all such claimants may appeal under this act to the Supreme Court of the United States from the awards of the Court of Claims as all other appeals are made to said court. All judgments not appealed from or affirmed on appeal shall be paid out of the moneys aforesaid after three years from the passage of this act with 5 per cent. interest from the date of judgment. If the sum of the judgments is greater than the moneys aforesaid, such judgments shall be paid rateably. No claim which was provable under the acts organizing and continuing the Court of Alabama Claims, and was then presented and adjudged, shall be provable within this act. Claimants may testify in their own behalf.

MANAGEMENT OF THE CAMPAIGN.

SECRETARY CHANDLER'S PRIVATE SECRETARY UNDER EXAMINATION — TESTIMONY OF A SOUTHERN TELEGRAPH OPERATOR — EX-GOV. WELLS, OF THE LOUISIANA RETURNING BOARD, BEFORE THE HOUSE COMMITTEE.

WASHINGTON, Jan. 20.—The Committee on the Powers, Privileges, and Duties of the House in counting the Electoral vote had before them to-day Oswin D. Roberts, who testified that he is Cashier of the Second National Bank of New-York. He exhibited two certificates of deposit in the bank by Z. Chandler, dated Oct. 21, 1876; one was for $3,000 and the other for $2,000; they were made payable on his own order on the return of the certificates; the indorsement read: "Pay S. B. Packard or order. Z. Chandler." "Pay James E. Ayr. S. B. Packard." "Pay Winslow, Lanier & Co. James E. Ayr." The witness, in reply to a question by Mr. Lawrence, said he could not state how the fact of these deposits was made public; he did not know whether any transactions of money were made through his bank by leading Democrats for political purposes. In reply to Mr. Field the witness said, besides the certificates of deposit above referred to there was an account of Z. Chandler, as Chairman of the National Republican Committee; an account was also kept in that bank by Gen. McCormick.

G. W. Partridge, the private secretary of Z. Chandler, was asked by Mr. Field whether he had in his possession or under his control any letters or telegrams written or sent by Z. Chandler to any person in Florida, South Carolina, North Carolina, Louisiana, and Oregon, or any letters or telegrams received by him from persons in these States. The witness in reply produced copies of letters, which were privately examined by the committee, when two of the letters were read and put in evidence. They were written respectively by J. B. Stockton, dated New-Orleans, Nov. 11, to the effect that if steps were taken immediately, the affidavits of 10,000 or 12,000 Republican voters could be obtained showing that they were deprived of the exercise of the ballot by violence and intimidation. The writer was the Chief Deputy of Marsh

CURRENT LITERATURE.

"OUT OF THE MOUTH OF BABES."

My little niece and I—I read
My Plato in my easy chair;
And she was building on the floor
A pack of cards with wondrous care.

We worked in silence, but, alas!
Among the cards a mighty spill,
And then the little ape exclaimed,
"Well! Such a life! Look, Uncle Will!"

I gave a start and dropped my book—
It was the Phædo I had read
A sympathetic current thrilled,
Like lightning, through my heart and head.

I eyed with curious awe the child,
The unconscious Sibyl, where she sat,
Whose thoughtless tongue could babble forth
Strange parables of life and fate.

Yes, such is life! a Babel house,
A common doom hath tumbled all,
King, Queen, and Knave, and plain, and trump,
A motley crew in motley fall!

We rear our bones, no Pharaoh's tomb,
Nor brass could build an aure a name;
But, soon or late, a sad collapse,
And great the ruin of the same.

Ah, such is life! Oh, sad and strange
That Love and Wisdom so ordain!
Some are the Builder's hand have yet
One card against another lain;

Some when the house is tiny still;
Some when you've built a little more;
And some when patience hath achieved
A second, third, or higher floor.

Or should you win the topmost stage,
Yet is the strength but toil and pain—
And here the day voice rejoined,
"But I can build it up again."

My height of awe was reached. Can babes
Behold what reason seems in vain?
Ah, childhood is divine, I thought,—
Yes, Lizzie, build it up again!

THE CAPTAIN'S LAST LOVE.

BY WILKIE COLLINS.

I.

"The Captain is still in the prime of life," the widow remarked to me. "He has given up his ship; he possesses a sufficient income, and he has nobody to live with him. I should like to know why he doesn't marry."

"The Captain was excessively rude to me," the widow's younger sister added, on her side. "When we took leave of him in London, I asked if there was any likelihood of his joining us at Brighton this season. He turned his back on me as if I had mortally offended him; and he made me this extraordinary answer: 'Miss, I hate the sight of the sea!' The man has been a sailor all his life. What does he mean by saying that he hates the sight of the sea?"

I was entirely at the mercy of the widow and the widow's sister. The other members of our little society at the boarding-house hall had all gone to a concert. I was known to be the Captain's oldest friend, and to be well acquainted with all the events of the Captain's life. No polite alternative was left but to answer the questions that had been put to me.

"I can satisfy your curiosity," I said to the two ladies, "without violating any confidence reposed in me—if you only have patience enough to listen to a very strange story."

It is needless to report the answer that I received. We sent away the tea-things, and we trimmed the lamp; and then I told the ladies why the Captain would never marry, and why (sailor as he was) he hated the sight of the sea.

II.

The British merchantman "Fortuna" (on the last occasion when our friend the Captain took command of the ship) sailed from the port of Liverpool with the morning tide. She was bound to certain islands in the Pacific Ocean, in search of a cargo of sandal-wood—a commodity which, in those days, found a ready and profitable market in the Chinese Empire.

A large discretion was reposed in the Captain by the owners, who knew him to be not only thoroughly trustworthy, but a man of rare abilities, carefully cultivated during the leisure hours of a sea-faring life. Devoted heart and soul to his professional duties, he was a hard reader and an excellent linguist as well. Having had considerable experience among the inhabitants of the Pacific Islands, he had attentively studied their characters, and had mastered their language in more than one of its many dialects. Thanks to the valuable information thus obtained, the Captain was never at a loss to conciliate the islanders; and he had more than once succeeded in finding a cargo, under circumstances in which other Captains had failed. Possessing these merits, he had his fair share of human defects. For instance, he was a little too conscious of his own good looks—of his bright chestnut hair and whiskers, of his beautiful blue eyes, of his fair white skin, which many a woman had looked at with the admiration that is akin to envy. His shapely hands were protected by gloves; a broad-brimmed hat sheltered his complexion in fine weather from the sun. He was nice in his choice of perfumes; he never drank spirits, and the smell of tobacco was abhorrent to him. New men among his officers and his crew, seeing him studying in his cabin, perfectly dressed, washed and brushed until he was an object speckless to look upon, soft of voice and careful in his choice of words, were apt to conclude that they had trusted themselves at sea under a commander who was an anomalous mixture of a schoolmaster and a dandy. But if the slightest infraction of discipline took place, or if the storm rose and the vessel was in peril, it was soon discovered that the gloved hands held a rod of iron, that the soft voice could make itself heard through wind and sea from one end of the deck to the other, and that it issued orders which the greatest fool on board knew to be orders that saved the ship. Throughout his professional life, the general impression that this variously-gifted man produced on the little world about him was always the same. Some few liked him; everybody respected him; nobody understood him. The Captain accepted those results, and went on reading his books and protecting his complexion; and his owners shook hands with him, and put up with his gloves.

The Fortuna touched at Rio for water, and for supplies of food which might prove useful in case of scurvy. In due time the ship rounded Cape Horn, in the finest weather ever known in those latitudes by the oldest hand on board. The mate, one Mr. Duncalf—a boozing, wheezing, self-confident old sea-dog, with a flaming face and a vast vocabulary of oaths—swore that he didn't like it. "The foul weather's coming, my lads," said Mr. Duncalf. "Mark my words, there'll be wind enough to take the curl out of the Captain's whiskers before we are many days older."

During a fortnight more the ship cruised in search of the islands to which the owners had directed her. At the end of that time the wind took the predicted liberties with the Captain's whiskers, and Mr. Duncalf stood revealed to an admiring crew in the character of a true prophet.

For three days and three nights the Fortuna ran before the storm, at the mercy of wind and sea. On the fourth morning the gale blew itself out, the sun appeared again toward noon, and the Captain was able to take an observation. The result informed him that he was in a part of the Pacific Ocean with which he was entirely unacquainted. Thereupon the officers were called into the cabin. Mr. Duncalf, as became his rank, was consulted first. His opinion possessed the merit of brevity. "My lads, the ship's bewitched. Take my word for it, we shall wish ourselves back in our own latitudes before we are many days older." Which, being interpreted, meant that Mr. Duncalf was lost, like his superior officer, in a part of the ocean of which he knew nothing.

The Captain decided (the weather being now quite fine again) to stand on [illegible] press of sail, for four-and-twenty hours more, and to see if anything came of it.

Soon after nightfall something did come of it. The look-out forward hailed the deck with the dreadful cry, "Breakers ahead!" In less than a minute more everybody heard the crash of the broken water. The Fortuna was put about, and came round slowly in the light wind. Thanks to the timely alarm and the fine weather, the safety of the vessel was easily provided for. They kept her under short sail, and they waited for the morning.

The dawn showed them in the distance a glorious green island, not marked in the ship's charts—an island girt about by a coral reef, and having in its midst a high-peaked mountain, which looked, through the telescope, like a mountain of volcanic origin. Mr. Duncalf, taking his morning draught of rum and water, shook his groggy old head, and said, (and swore,) "My lads, I don't like the look of that island." The Captain was of a different opinion. He had one of the ship's boats put into the water; he armed himself and six of his crew who accompanied him, and away he went in the morning sunlight to visit the island.

Skirting round the coral reef, they found a natural breach, which proved to be broad enough and deep enough not only for the passage of the boat, but of the ship itself if needful. Crossing the broad inner belt of smooth water, they approached the golden sands of the island, strewed with magnificent shells, and crowded by the dusky islanders—men, women, and children, all waiting in breathless astonishment to see the strangers land.

The Captain kept the boat off, and examined the islanders carefully. The innocent, simple people danced and sang and ran into the water, imploring their wonderful white visitors by gestures to come on shore. Not a creature among them carried arms or any sort; a hospitable curiosity animated the entire population. The men cried out, in their smooth, musical language, "Come and eat!" and the plump, black-eyed women, all laughing together, added their own invitation, "Come and be kissed!" Was it in mortals to resist such temptations as these? The Captain led the way on shore, and the women surrounded him in an instant and screamed for joy at the glorious spectacle of his whiskers, his complexion, and his gloves. So the mariners from the far north were welcomed to the newly-discovered island.

III.

The morning wore on. Mr. Duncalf, in charge of the ship, cursing the island, over his rum-and-water, as "a beastly green strip of a place, not laid down in any Christian chart," was kept waiting four mortal hours before the Captain returned to his command, and reported himself to his officers as follows:

He had found his knowledge of the Polynesian dialects sufficient to make himself in some degree understood by the natives of the new island. Under the guidance of the chief he had made a first journey of exploration, and had seen for himself that the place was a marvel of natural beauty and fertility. The one barren spot in it was the peak of the volcanic mountain, composed of crumbling rock; originally, no doubt, lava and ashes, which had cooled and consolidated with the lapse of time. So far as he had seen, the crater at the top was now an extinct crater. But, if he had understood rightly, the chief had spoken of earthquakes and eruptions at certain bygone periods, some of which lay within his own earliest recollections of the place. Adverting next to considerations of practical utility, the Captain announced that he had seen sandal-wood enough on the island to load a dozen ships, and that the natives were willing to part with it for a few toys and trinkets generally distributed among them. To the mate's disgust, the Fortuna was taken inside the reef that day, and was anchored before sunset in a natural harbor. Twelve hours of recreation, beginning with the next morning, were granted to the men, under the wise restrictions in such cases established by the Captain. That interval over, the work of cutting the precious wood and loading the ship was to be uninterruptingly pursued.

Mr. Duncalf had the first watch after the Fortuna had been made snug. He took the boatswain aside (an ancient sea-dog like himself) and he said in a gruff whisper: "My lad, this here ain't the island laid down in our sailing orders. See if mischief don't come of disobeying orders before we are many days older."

Nothing in the shape of mischief happened that night. But at sunrise the next morning a suspicious circumstance occurred, and Mr. Duncalf whispered to the boatswain: "What did I tell you?" The Captain and the chief of the islanders held a private conference in the cabin, and the Captain, after first forbidding any communication with the shore until his return, suddenly left the ship alone with the chief, in the chief's own canoe.

What did this strange disappearance mean? The Captain himself, when he took his seat in the canoe, would have been puzzled to answer that question.

"Shall we be a long time away from the ship?" he asked.

The chief answered mysteriously: "Long time or short time, your life depends on it, and the lives of your men."

Paddling his light little vessel in silence over the smooth water inside the reef, the chief took his visitor ashore at a part of the island which was quite new to the Captain. The two crossed a ravine and ascended an eminence beyond. There the chief stopped, and silently pointed out to sea.

The Captain looked in the direction indicated to him, and discovered a second and a smaller island, lying away to the south-west at a distance of under two miles. Taking out his telescope from the case by which it was slung at his back, he examined the place through his glass. Two of the native canoes were lying off the shore of the new island; and the men in them appeared to be all kneeling or crouching in curiously-chosen attitudes. Shifting his range a little, the Captain next beheld the figure of a tall and solitary man—the one inhabitant of the island whom he had discover. The man was standing on the highest point of a rocky cape. A fire was burning at his feet. Now he lifted his arms solemnly to the sky; now he dropped some invisible fuel into the fire, which made a blue smoke; and now he cast other invisible objects into the canoes floating beneath him, which the islanders reverently received with bodies that crouched in abject submission. Lowering his telescope, the Captain looked round at the chief for an explanation. The chief gave the explanation readily. His language may be interpreted in these terms:

"Wonderful white stranger! the island you see yonder is a holy island. As such it is Taboo—an island sanctified and set apart. The honorable person whom you notice on the rock is an all-powerful favorite of the gods. He is by vocation a sorcerer, and by rank a priest. You now see him casting charms and blessings into the canoes of our fishermen, who kneel to him for fine weather and great plenty of fish. If any profane person, native or stranger, presumes to set foot on that island, my otherwise peaceable subjects will (in the performance of a religious duty) put that person to death. Mention this to your men. They will be fed by my male people and fondled by my female people so long as they keep clear of the Holy Isle. As they value their lives let them respect this prohibition. Is it understood between us? Wonderful white stranger, my canoe is waiting for you. Let us go back."

Understanding enough of the chief's language (illustrated by his gestures) to receive in the right spirit the communication thus addressed to him, the Captain repeated the warning to the ship's company in the plainest possible English. The officers and men then took their holiday on shore, with the exception of Mr. Duncalf, who positively refused to leave the ship. For twelve delightful hours they were fed by the male people and fondled by the female people, and then they were mercilessly torn from the flesh-pots and the arms of their new friends, and set to work on the sandal-wood in good earnest. Mr. Duncalf superintended the loading, and waited for the mischief that was to come of disobeying the owners' orders, with a confidence worthy of a better cause.

IV.

Strangely enough, chance once more declared itself in favor of the mate's point of view. The mischief did actually come, and the chosen instrument of it was a handsome young islander, who was one of the sons of the chief.

The Captain had taken a fancy to the sweet-tempered, intelligent lad. Pursuing his studies in the dialect of the island at leisure hours, he had made the chief's son his tutor, and had amused himself by instructing the youth in English by way of return. More than a month had passed in this intercourse, and the ship's lading was being rapidly completed, when, in an evil hour, the talk between the two turned on the subject of the Holy Island.

"Does nobody live on the island but the Priest?" the Captain asked.

The chief's son looked round him suspiciously. "Promise me you won't tell anybody!" he began very earnestly.

The Captain gave his promise.

"There is one other person on the island," the lad whispered; "a person to feast your eyes upon if you could only see her! She is the priest's daughter. She was taken to the island in her infancy, and has never left it since. In that sacred solitude she has never looked on any human beings but her father and her mother. I once saw her [illegible] care not to attract her notice, or to approach too near the holy soil. Oh, so young, dear master, and oh, so beautiful!" The chief's son completed the description by kissing his own hands in silent rapture.

The Captain's fine blue eyes sparkled. He asked no more questions, but, later on that day, he paid a secret visit to the eminence which overlooked the Holy Island. The next day and the next he stole away to the same place. On the fourth day fatal destiny favored him. He saw the nymph of the island through his telescope standing alone upon the cape on which he had already discovered her father. She was feeding some tame birds, which looked like turtle-doves. The glass showed the Captain her pure white robe fluttering in the sea breeze, her long black hair falling to her heels, her slim and supple young figure, her simple grace of attitude as she turned this way and that, attending to the wants of her birds. Before her was the blue ocean; behind her was the lustrous green of the island forest. The Captain's vivid imagination supplied the inevitable defects of the glass. He looked and looked until his eyes and arms ached. And when she flitted lightly back into the forest, with her birds after her, the Captain shut up his telescope with a sigh, and said to himself, "I have seen an angel!"

From that hour he became an altered man; he was languid, silent, interested in nothing. General opinion decided that he was going to be taken ill.

A week more elapsed, and the officers and crew began to talk of the voyage to their market in China. The Captain refused to fix a day for sailing. He even took offense at being asked to decide. Instead of sleeping in his cabin, he went ashore for the night.

Not many hours afterward, just before daybreak, Mr. Duncalf, snoring in his cabin on deck, was aroused by a hand laid on his shoulder. The swinging lamp, still alight, showed him the dusky face of the chief's son convulsed with terror. By wild signs, by disconnected words in the little English which he had learned, the lad tried to make the mate understand him. Dense Mr. Duncalf, understanding nothing, hailed the second officer, on the opposite side of the deck. The second officer was young and intelligent. He rightly interpreted the terrible news that had come to the ship. The Captain had broken his own rules. Watching his opportunity, under cover of the night, he had taken a canoe, and had secretly crossed the channel to the Holy Island. No one had been near him at the time but the chief's son. The lad had vainly tried to induce him to abandon his desperate enterprise, and had vainly waited on the shore in the hope of hearing the sound of the paddle announcing his return. Beyond all reasonable doubt, the infatuated man had set foot on the shores of the tabooed island.

The one chance for his life was to conceal what he had done until the ship could be got out of the harbor, and then (if no harm had come to him in the interval) to rescue him after nightfall. It was decided to spread the report that he had really been taken ill, and that he was confined to his cabin. The chief's son, whose heart the Captain's kindness had won, could be trusted to do this, and to keep the secret faithfully for the Captain's sake.

Toward noon the next day they attempted to take the ship to sea, and failed for want of wind. Hour by hour the heat grew more and more oppressive. As the day declined there were ominous appearances in the western heaven. The natives, who had given some trouble during the day by their anxiety to see the Captain, and by their curiosity to know the cause of the sudden preparations for the ship's departure, all went ashore together, looking suspiciously at the sky, and reappeared no more. Just at midnight the ship (still in her snug berth inside the reef) suddenly trembled from her keel to her mast-heads. Mr. Duncalf, surrounded by the startled crew, shook his knotty fist at the island as if he could see it in the dark. "My lads, what did I tell you? That was a shock of earthquake."

With the morning the threatening aspect of the weather unexpectedly disappeared. A faint hot breeze from the land, just enough to give the ship steerage-way, offered Mr. Duncalf a chance of getting to sea. Slowly the Fortuna, with the mate himself at the wheel, hail sailed, half drifted, into the open ocean. At a distance of barely two miles from the island the breeze was felt no more, and the vessel lay becalmed for the rest of the day.

At night the men waited their orders, expecting to be sent after their Captain in one of the boats. The intense darkness, the airless heat, and a second shock of earthquake (just felt in the ship at her present distance from the land) warned the mate to be cautious. "I smell mischief in the air," said Mr. Duncalf. "The Captain must wait till I am surer of the weather."

Still no change came with the new day. The dead calm continued, and the airless heat. As the day declined another ominous appearance became visible. A thin line of smoke was discovered through the telescope, ascending from the topmost peak of the mountain on the main island. Was the volcano threatening an eruption? The mate for one entertained no doubt of it. "By the Lord, the place is going to burst up!" said Mr. Duncalf. "Come what may of it, we must find the Captain to-night!"

V.

What was the lost Captain doing? and what chance had the crew of finding him that night? He had committed himself to his desperate adventure, without forming any plan for the preservation of his own safety, without giving even a momentary consideration to the consequences that might follow. The charming picture that he had seen through his telescope had haunted him night and day. The image of the innocent creature, secluded from humanity in her island solitude, was the one image that filled his mind. A man, passing a woman in the street, acts on the impulse to turn and follow her, and in that one thoughtless moment shapes the destiny of his future life. The Captain, seeing the canoe on the beach, acted on a similar impulse when he took the paddle and shaped his reckless course for the tabooed island.

Reaching the shore while it was still dark, he did one sensible thing—he hid the canoe so that it might not betray him when the daylight came. That done, he waited for the morning on the outskirts of the forest.

The trembling light of dawn revealed the mysterous solitude around him. Following the outer limits of the trees, first in one direction, then in another, and finding no trace of any living creature, he decided on penetrating to the interior of the island. He entered the forest.

An hour of walking brought him to rising ground. Continuing the ascent he got clear of the trees, and stood on the grassy top of a broad cliff which overlooked the sea. An open hut was on the cliff. He cautiously looked in, and discovered that it was empty. The few household utensils left about, and the simple bed of leaves in a corner, were covered with fine, sandy dust. Night birds flew blundering out of inner cavities in the roof and took refuge in the shadows of the forest below. It was plain that the hut had not been inhabited for some time past.

Standing at the open doorway and considering what he should do next, the Captain saw a bird flying toward him out of the forest. It was a turtle-dove, so tame that it fluttered close up to him. At the same moment the sound of sweet laughter became audible among the trees. His heart beat fast; he advanced a few steps, and stopped. In a moment more the nymph of the island appeared, in her white robe, ascending the cliff in pursuit of her truant bird. She saw him, and suddenly stood still, struck motionless by the amazing discovery that had burst upon her. The Captain approached smiling, and holding out his hand. She never moved; she stood before him in helpless wonderment; her lovely black eyes fixed on him spell-bound; her dusky bosom palpitating above the fallen folds of her robe; her rich, red lips parted in mute astonishment. Spell-bound on his side, feasting his eyes on her beauty in silence, the Captain after a while recovered himself. He ventured to speak to her in the language of the main island. The sound of his voice, addressing her in the language that she knew, roused the lovely creature to action. She started, stepped close up to him, and dropped on her knees at his feet.

"My father worships invisible deities," she said, softly. "Are you a visible deity? Has my mother sent you?" She pointed as she spoke to the deserted hut behind them. "You appear to me," she went on, "in the place where my mother died. Is it for her sake that you show yourself to her child? Beautiful deity! come to the temple—come to my father."

The Captain gently raised her from the ground. If her father saw him, he was a doomed man. Infatuated as he was, he had sense enough left to announce himself plainly in his own character, as a mortal creature arriving from a far-distant land. The girl instantly drew back from him with a look of terror.

"He is not like my father," she said to herself; "he is not like me. Is he the lying demon of the prophecy? Is he the predestined destroyer of our island?"

The Captain's appearance of the sea showed him the only sure way out of the awkward position in which he was now placed. He appealed to his personal appearance.

"Do I look like a demon?" he asked.

Her eyes met his. A half-smile trembled on her lips. The Captain ventured on asking what she meant by the predestined destruction of the island. She held up her hand solemnly and repeated the prophecy. The Holy Island was threatened with destruction by an evil being, who would one day appear on its shores. To avert the fatality the place had been sanctified and set apart, under the protection of the gods and their priest. Here was the reason for the taboo and for the extraordinary strictness with which it was enforced. Listening attentively to his charming companion, the Captain took her hand and pressed it gently.

"Do I feel like a demon?" he whispered.

Her slim brown fingers closed frankly on his hand. "You feel soft and friendly," she said, with the fearless candor of a child. "Squeeze me again. I like it!"

The next moment she snatched her hand away from him. The sense of his danger had suddenly forced itself on her mind. "If my father sees you," she said, "he will light the signal fire at the Temple, and the people from over yonder will come here and put you to death. Where is your canoe? No! It is broad daylight. My father may see you on the water." She considered for a moment, and, approaching him, laid her hands on his shoulders. "Stay here till nightfall," she said. "My father never comes this way. The sight of the place where my mother died is horrible to him. You are safe here. Promise to stay here till night-time."

The Captain gave his promise. Freed from anxiety so far, the girl's mobile Southern temperment recovered its native cheerfulness—its sweet gayety and spirit. She admired the beautiful stranger as she might have admired a new bird that had flown to her to be petted with the rest. She patted his fair white skin, and wished she had a skin like it. She lifted the great glossy folds of her long black hair and compared it with the Captain's bright, curly locks, and wished she could change color with him from the bottom of her heart. His dress was a wonder to her. His watch was a new revelation. She rested her head on his shoulder to listen delightedly to the ticking as he held the watch to her ear. Her fragrant breath played on his face, her warm, supple figure rested against him softly. The Captain's arm stole round her waist, and the Captain's lips gently touched hers. She lifted her head with a look of pleased surprise. "Thank you," said the child of nature simply. "Kiss me again; I like it. May I kiss you?" The tame turtle-dove perched on her shoulder as she gave the Captain her first kiss, and diverted her thoughts to the pets that she had left, in pursuit of the truant dove. "Come," she said, "and see my birds. I keep them on this side of the forest. There is no danger, so long as you don't show yourself on the other side. My name is Aimata; Aimata will take care of you. Oh, what a beautiful white neck you have!" She put her arm admiringly round his neck. The Captain's arm held her tenderly to him. Slowly the two descended the cliff, and were lost in the leafy solitudes of the forest. And the tame dove fluttered before them, a winged messenger of love, cooing to his mate.

VI.

The night had come, and the Captain had not left the island. Aimata's resolution to send him away in the darkness was a forgotten resolution already. She had let him persuade her that he was in no danger so long as he remained in the hut on the cliff; and she had promised at parting to return to him, while the priest was still sleeping, at the dawn of day.

He was alone in the hut. The thought of the innocent creature whom he loved was sorrowfully as well as tenderly present to his mind. He almost regretted his rash visit to the island. "I will take her with me to England," he said to himself. "What do I care for the opinion of the world? Aimata shall be my wife."

The intense heat oppressed him. He stepped out on the cliff toward midnight, in search of a breath of air. The first shock of earthquake (felt in the ship while she was inside the reef) shook the ground he stood on. He instantly thought of the volcano on the main island. Had he been mistaken in supposing the crater to be extinct? Was the shock of earthquake that he had just felt a warning from the volcano, communicated through a submarine connection between the two islands? He waited and watched through the hours of darkness with a vague sense of apprehension, which was not to be reasoned away. With the first rays of daybreak he descended into the forest, and saw the lovely being whose safety was already precious to him as his own, hurrying to meet him through the trees.

She waved her hand distractedly, as she approached him. "Go!" she cried; "go away in your canoe before the island is destroyed!"

He did his best to quiet her alarm. Was it the shock of earthquake that had frightened her? It was not only the shock of earthquake, it was something more ominous still which had followed the shock. There was a lake near the Temple, the waters of which were supposed to be heated by subterranean fires. The lake had risen with the earthquake, had bubbled furiously, and had then melted away in the night. Her father, viewing the portent with horror, had gone to the cape, to watch the volcano on the main island, and to implore, by prayers and sacrifices, the protection of the gods. Hearing this, the Captain entreated Aimata to let him see the emptied lake, in the absence of the priest. She hesitated; but his influence was all-powerful. He prevailed on her to turn back with him through the forest.

Reaching the furthest limit of the trees, they came out upon open, rocky ground that sloped gently downward toward the centre of the island. Having crossed this space, they arrived at a natural amphitheatre of rock. On one side of it the Temple appeared, partly excavated, partly formed by a natural cavern. In one of the lateral branches of the cavern was the dwelling of the priest and his daughter. The mouth of it looked out on the rocky basin of the lake. Stooping over the edge of the basin, the Captain discovered, far down in the empty depths, a light cloud of steam. Not a drop of water was visible anywhere.

"Does that mean nothing?" said Aimata, pointing to the abyss. She shuddered, and hid her face on the Captain's bosom. "My father says," she whispered, "that it is your doing."

The Captain started. "Does your father know that I am on the island?"

She looked up at him with a quick glance of reproach. "Do you think I would tell him, and put your life in peril?" she asked. "My father felt the destroyer of the island in the earthquake; my father saw the coming destruction in the disappearance of the lake." Her eyes rested on him with a loving languor. "Are you indeed the demon of the prophecy?" she said, winding his hair round her finger. "I am not afraid of you, it you are. I am a girl bewitched; I love the demon." She kissed him passionately. "I don't care if I die," she whispered between the kisses "if I only die with you!"

The Captain made no attempt to reason with her. He took the wiser way—he appealed to her feelings.

"You will come with me to my own country," he said. "My ship is waiting. I will take you home with me, and make you my wife."

She sprang to her feet, and clapped her hands for joy. Then she thought of her father, and sat down again in tears.

The Captain understood her. "Let us leave this dreary place," he said. "We will talk about it in the cool glades of the forest, where you first said you loved me."

She gave him her hand. "Where I first said I loved you!" she repeated, smiling tenderly and thoughtfully as she looked at him. They left the lake together.

VII.

The darkness had fallen again. The ship was still becalmed at sea.

Mr. Duncalf came on deck after his supper. The thin line of smoke, seen rising from the peak of the mountain that evening, was now succeeded by ominous flashes of fire from the same quarter, intermittently visible. The faint, hot breeze from the land was felt once more. "There's just an air of wind," the mate remarked. "We will try for the Captain while we have the chance."

One of the boats was lowered into the water—under command of the second mate, who had taken the "bearings" of the tabooed island by daylight. Four of the men were to go with him, and they were all to be well armed. Mr. Duncalf addressed his final instructions to the officer in the boat.

"You will keep a lookout with a lantern in the bows. When you get a-nigh the island, you will fire a gun and sing out for the Captain—"

"Quite needless," interposed a voice from the sea. "The Captain is here!"

Without taking the slightest notice of the astonishment he had caused, the Captain paddled his canoe to the side of the ship. Instead of ascending to the deck of the Fortuna, he stepped into the boat. "Lend me your pistols," he said quietly to the second officer, "and oblige me by taking your men back to their duties on board." He looked up at Mr. Duncalf, and gave some further directions. "If there is any change in the weather, keep the ship standing off and on, at a safe distance from the land; and throw up a rocket from time to time to show your position. Expect me on board again by sunrise."

"What!" cried the mate. "Do you mean to say you are going back to the island—in that boat—all by yourself?"

"I am going back to the island," answered the Captain, as quietly as ever, "in this boat—all by myself." He pushed off from the ship, and hoisted the sail as he spoke.

"You're deserting your duty!" shouted the mate, with one of his loudest oaths.

"Attend to my directions," the Captain shouted back, as he drifted away in the darkness.

Mr. Duncalf—violently agitated for the first time in his life—took leave of his superior officer, with a singular mixture of solemnity and politeness, in these words:

"The Lord have mercy on your soul! I wish you good evening."

VIII.

Alone in the boat, the Captain looked with a misgiving mind at the flashing of the volcano on the main island.

If events had favored him he would have removed Aimata to the shelter of the ship on the day when he saw the emptied basin of the lake. But the smoke of the Priest's sacrifice had been discovered from the main island; and the chief had sent two canoes with instructions to make inquiries. One of the canoes had returned; the other was kept in waiting off the cape, to place a means of communicating with the main island at the disposal of the priest. The second shock of earthquake had naturally increased the alarm of the chief. He had sent messages to the priest, entreating him to leave the island. The priest refused. He believed in his gods and his sacrifices—he believed he might avert the fatality that threatened his sanctuary. Yielding to the holy man, the chief sent reinforcements of canoes to take their turn at keeping watch off the headland. Assisted by torches, the islanders were on the alert, (in superstitious terror of the demon of the prophecy,) by night as well as by day. The Cap ain would have risked certain death if he had ventured to approach the hiding-place in which he had concealed his canoe. He waited and watched. It was only after Aimata had left him as usual, to return to her father at the close of evening, that the chances declared themselves in the Captain's favor. The fire-flashes from the mountain, visible when the night came, had struck terror into the hearts of the men in the canoes. They thought of their wives, their children, and their possession on the main island, and they one and all deserted their Priest. The Captain seized the opportunity of communicating with the ship, and of exchanging a frail canoe, which he was ill able to manage, for a swift-sailing boat, capable of keeping the sea in the event of stormy weather.

As he now neared the land, certain small sparks of red moving in the distance informed him that the canoes had been ordered back to their duty. Steering by the distant torchlights, he reached his own side of the island without accident, and, guided by the boat's lantern, anchored under the cliff. He climbed the rocks, advanced to the door of the hut—and was met, to his delight and astonishment, by Aimata on the threshold.

"I dreamed that the anger of the deities had parted us forever," she said; "and I came here to see if my dream was true. Oh, how I have been crying, all alone in the hut! Now I have seen you I am satisfied. Kiss me, and let me go back. No, you must not go with me. My father has his doubts: my father may be out, looking for me. It is you that are in danger, not I. I know the forest as well by dark as by daylight. You shall see me again at daybreak."

The Captain detained her. "Now you are here," he said, "why should I wait to place you in safety until daybreak? I have been to the ship; I have brought back one of the boats. The darkness will befriend us—let us embark while we can."

She shrank back as he took her hand. "My father!" she said, faintly.

"Your father is in no danger. The canoes are waiting at the cape. I saw the lights as I passed."

With that reply he drew her out of the hut, and turned his face toward the sea. Not a breath of the breeze was now to be felt. The dead calm had returned—and the boat was too large to be easily managed by one man alone at the oars.

"The breeze may come again," he said to her. "Wait here, my angel, for the chance."

As he spoke the deep silence of the forest below them was broken by a sound. A harsh, wailing voice was heard, calling "Aimata! Aimata!"

"My father!" she whispered; "he has missed me. If he comes here, you are lost."

She kissed him with passionate fervor; she held him to her for a moment with all her strength. "Expect me at daybreak," she said, and disappeared down the landward slope of the cliff. He listened, anxious for her safety. The voices of the father and daughter just reached him from among the trees. The Priest spoke in no angry tones; she had apparently found an acceptable excuse for her absence. Little by little the wailing sound of their voices told him that they were on their way back together to the Temple. The silence fell again. Not a ripple broke on the beach, not a leaf rustled in the forest. Nothing moved but the reflected flashes of the volcano on the black sky over the main island. It was an airless and an awful calm.

He went into the hut and laid down on his bed of leaves, not to sleep, but to rest. All his energies might be required to meet the coming events of the morning. After the voyage to and from the ship, and the long watching that had preceded it, strong as he was, he stood in need of repose.

For some little time he kept awake, thinking. Insensibly the oppression of the intense heat, aided in its influence by his own fatigue, treacherously closed his eyes. In spite of himself, the weary man fell into a deep sleep.

He was aroused by a roar like the explosion of a park of artillery. The volcano on the main island had burst into a state of eruption. Smoky flame-light overspread the sky, and flashed through the open doorway of the hut. He sprang from his couch—and found himself up to his knees in water.

Had the sea overflowed the land? He waded out of the hut, and the water rose to his middle. He looked round him by the lurid flame-light of the eruption. The one visible object within his range of view was the roof of the hut. In every other direction the waters of the horrid sea, stained blood-red by the flaming sky, spread swirling and rippling strangely in the dead calm. In a moment more he became conscious that the earth on which he stood was sinking under his feet. The water rose to his neck; the last vestige of the roof of the hut disappeared. He looked round again, and the truth burst upon him. The island was sinking—slowly, slowly sinking into volcanic depths, below the utmost depth of the sea! The highest object was the hut, and that had dropped, inch by inch, under water, before his own eyes. Thrown up to the surface by occult volcanic influences, the island had sunk back under the same influences to the obscurity from which it had emerged!

A black, shadowy object, turning in a wide circle, came slowly near him as the all-destroying ocean washed its bitter waters into his mouth. The buoyant boat, rising on the sea as the earth deserted it, had dragged its anchor, and was floating round in the vortex made by the slowly-sinking island. With a last desperate hope that Aimata might have been saved as he had been saved, he swam to the boat, seized the heavy oars with the strength of a giant, and made for the place (so far as he could guess at it now) where the lake and the Temple had once been.

He looked round and round him—he strained his eyes in the vain attempt to penetrate below the surface of the seething, dimpling sea. Had the panic-stricken watchers in the canoes deserted their post without an effort to save the father and daughter? Or had they both been suffocated, before they could make an attempt to escape from their cavern? He called to her in his misery, as if she could hear him out of the fathomless depths, "Aimata! Aimata!" The roar of the distant eruption answered him. The mounting fires lit the solitary sea far and near over the sinking island. The boat turned slowly, and more slowly, in the lessening vortex. Never again would those gentle eyes look at him with unutterable love! Never again would those fresh lips touch his lips with their fervent kiss! Alone, amid the mighty forces of nature in conflict, the miserable mortal lifted his hands in frantic supplication—and the burning sun glared down on him in its pitiless grandeur, and struck him to his knees in the boat. His reason sank with his sinking limbs. In the merciful frenzy that succeeded the shock, he saw her afar off, alive again in her white robe, an angel poised on the waters; beckoning him to follow her to the brighter and the better world. He loosened the sail, he seized the oars, and the faster he pursued it, the faster the mocking vision fled from him over the empty and endless sea.

IX.

The boat was discovered the next morning from the ship. All that the devotion of the officers of the Fortuna could do for their unhappy commander was done on the homeward voyage. Restored to his own country, and to skilled medical help, the Captain's mind by slow degrees recovered its balance. He has taken his place in society again—he lives and moves and manages his affairs like the rest of us. But his heart is dead to all new emotions; nothing lives in it but the sacred remembrance of his last love. He neither courts nor avoids the society of women. Their sympathy finds him grateful, but their attractions seem to be lost on him; they pass from his mind as they pass from his eyes—they stir nothing in him but the memory of Aimata.

"Now you know, ladies, why the Captain will never marry, and why (sailor as he is) he hates the sight of the sea."—Belgravia.

PUBLIC CURIOSITY.—Actions which have no public character should be sacred from public curiosity. It is not that a man should not be responsible even for his private actions, but that he should be responsible to the right tribunal. My own family have an interest in some of my actions; my friends in others, and my colleagues or subordinates in a third class. In each case it is most desirable that I should be in contact with the opinions of those who are both concerned in my behavior and have the means of judging. In each case, interference by the unqualified and unconcerned is generally mischievous. No wise friend ever meddles between man and wife, or between father and children. The reason is not only that the meddling will be resented, but that in such delicate questions none but the immediate parties to the dispute are really qualified to have any opinion. When that incoherent mass of hasty and half-informed judgment called public opinion is brought to bear upon such matters, the effect is far more demoralizing. The man's actions are determined not by his instincts and affections, but by reference to the question, What will people say? He aims at respectability instead of virtue. He loses that fine sense of self-respect, which is the most essential safeguard of all lofty motive. He conforms to the vulgar standard set up by impertinent intruders, and acquires, in place of a conscience, a little store of popular platitudes. If he is a public official, he will thrive in proportion as he can flatter the public taste. A gentleman (as we are told in the papers) has lately been winning popularity in America because he dressed himself in coarse clothes and chewed tobacco. Mere vulgarity passes itself off for honesty; for people forget that the easiest kind of hypocrisy is a superficial brutality of manners. The person in question was christened "Blue Jeans," as Hosea Biglow's hero hoped to be called "Old Timbertoes." That, in the words of the best American humorist, is what the people likes—

Suthin' combinin' morril truths with phrases such as strikes.

When such a practice is common, the charlatan has a start in the race for honor. The public learns to resent as an insult to itself the honorable reserve which refuses to invite the ignorant and uncultivated to sit in judgment upon matters beyond their ken. Public life under such conditions becomes offensive to men of delicate, sensitive natures; and the independence of spirit which is the greatest of political virtues becomes a disadvantage or is supplanted by a coarse affectation of brutality. True greatness of public character is rooted in the purity and tenderness of domestic life. But the direct tendency of impertinent intrusion is to give an advantage to the charlatans and hypocrites—always too abundant in the world—who are ready to lay bare for public inspection their most private affairs, and to advertise their domestic virtues. The spurious article in such a case is a more paying commodity than the genuine, and a willingness to submit to degradation is a direct qualification for success. The evil great in its bearing upon public men—is certainly not less in its influence upon those teachers of mankind who are most sensitive, most easily spoiled by self-consciousness, and often the subjects of the most impertinent intrusion. For one writer who is now hurt by abuse, a dozen are ruined by injudicious flattery; if the flattery begins to affect their private life, it will become more poisonous than ever. The late biographer of an eminent writer told how his hero had once risen at night to practice some dancing steps for the amusement of his children. The story, pretty enough in itself, was unconsciously spoiled by the addition that the said writer turned to his friend, and remarked that the story would look well in his biography. If even the expectation of posthumous adulation could produce an act so painfully jarring because indicative of such morbid self-consci resolt England. As Saint-Evremond made no more hearty efforts in the second than he had done in the first negotiation, the poor poet met only with fresh mortification. He fell ill; and, according to the ideas of his time, he had no other thought than that of making a good end; and, as he never did things by halves, they found him in a hair shirt. His sick-nurse said to the Abbé Poujet, who came to give him ghostly consolation. "Do not worry him; he is rather silly than wicked." It seems that Poujet did worry him, and therein only followed the example of Boileau, of Racine, of Louis XIV., and, as we have seen, of Madame De la Sablière. Molière was the only one who stood out.—Fraser's Magazine.

WHITE, OF SELBORNE.—Gilbert White, the father of English natural history, and the most charming writer upon the subject which the language has produced, was born in 1720, and died in 1793. He was curate, (not vicar, as has been said,) of the parish of Selborne, in Hampshire. Here he lived the life of a scholar and of a country parson. Selborne was a somewhat secluded spot, little visited by the fashion and tame of the time. The naturalist and poet had, therefore, all the more leisure to observe the arrivals of the birds, and to note the peculiarities of vegetable, animal, and even human life, existing in the little realm of Selborne. White was a great naturalist, but it is chiefly on account of his delightful, almost unequaled, gift of description that he is read now, and will, doubtless, always be read. He will describe the cackling of fowls in a barnyard in such a way that chickens become most novel and wonderful creatures. In describing an idiot boy he had known twenty years before, who was fond of honey, and was a skillful bee-catcher, he seems to give his gentle prose almost a buzzing or humming sound. This boy, in the Winter, dozed away his time by the fireside in his father's house, but in the Summer he was alert and in quest of his game in the fields and on sunny banks. White says: "Honey-bees, humble-bees, and wasps were his prey wherever he found them; he had no apprehensions from their stings, but would seize them nudis manibus, and at once disarm them of their weapons, and suck their bodies for the sake of their honey-bags. Sometimes he would fill his bosom between his shirt and his skin with a number of these captives; and sometimes he would confine them in bottles. He was a very Merops apiaster, or bee-bird, and very injurious to men that kept bees, for he would slide into their bee-gardens, and sitting down before the stools, would rap with his finger on the hives, and so take the bees as they came out. He has been known to over-turn hives for the sake of honey, of which he was passionately fond. When metheglin was making he would linger round the tubs and vessels, begging a draught of what he called bee wine. As he ran about he used to make a humming noise with his lips, resembling the buzzing of bees. The lad was lean and sallow and of a cadaverous complexion, and except in his favorite pursuit, in which he was wonderfully adroit, discovered no manner of understanding." The literary excellence of this is wonderful. Yet White never appeared to wish to be literary; in some of his happiest passages he seems to be only transcribing a fact in the plainest and simplest language. He does not dilute his pictures with thin reflections which the reader should be allowed to make for himself. Thus when he speaks of the coins of Marcus Aurelius and the Empress Faustina, found at the bottom of Wolmer Pond, where they had been left by the Romans, and which finally came into circulation at Selborne, he says: "The owners at first held their commodity at a high price, but, finding that they were not likely to meet with dealers at such a rate, they soon lowered their terms and sold the fairest as they could. The coins that were rejected became current and passed for farthings at the petty shops." A modern essayist would not have lost the chance to point the humorous and poetical suggestions of the incident. But White, being full of such facts, passes on to the next. Gilbert White took a lifetime to make his "Selborne." He has given to it the calmness, the benevolence, the content of his long life. It shows him as a man of culture and books, as well as of the fields. He was of a gentle, yet independent mind, giving to other subjects the same earnestness of vision with which he looked upon the external world. His quiet, orderly and delicate nature is impressed upon every page of his work. He performs his parish duties. He talks with the farmers and villagers about the bird and plant life which he is studying. He takes his walks. He rises in the morning to look at his sun-dial, or to record the fall of the rain. The book is full of the spirit of a man whose main joy is in the discovery of some long-concealed mystery of the life of birds, whose most poignant regret is to find that the honey-dew has defaced his honeysuckles.—Scribner's Monthly.

ANECDOTES OF BRILLAT-SAVARIN.—He was traveling with two ladies whom he had promised to escort as far as Melun. They had started early in the morning, and arrived at Montgeron with threatening appetites. But, alas! at the inn where they put up there seemed absolutely nothing left to eat, owing to the ravages of three "diligences" full of travelers, to say nothing of post-chaises. Only an excellent leg of mutton turned before the fire in the most approved of fashions. Unhappily, it belonged to three Englishmen, who had brought it with them, and who were sitting up stairs drinking champagne and awaiting its arrival. "But, at least," said Brillat-Savarin to the cook, "you could dress us some eggs in the gravy." The cook assented, propounding the more than questionable doctrine that the gravy belonged to him of right as his perquisite. While he was engaged in breaking the eggs, Brillat-Savarin approached the leg of mutton and drew a large pocket-knife on fell designs intent; therewith he inflicted twelve deep wounds on the unresisting meat, which soon gave up the last drop of its vital juice. By and by the French party was making a delicious breakfast on œufs brouillés au jus, with cups of steaming coffee and cream; and laughing merrily at the thought that they had the substance of the leg of mutton, while the luckless English were endeavoring to masticate the fibrous tissue, which was all that remained of it. One other traveling experience of Brillat-Savarin's must be given, if only to show that he had a son worthy of him. At a country inn at which he put up he found four turkeys being roasted, and forthwith demanded one for his own dinner; when, to his surprise, he learned that they had all been bespoken for a gentleman. "For one gentleman?" demanded Brillat, in an incredulous tone. "Yes, Monsieur," "He has, doubtless, a large party with him?" "On the contrary, he is alone." "Do you happen to know his name?" "I think it is a M. Brillat-Savarin." "It must be my son," exclaimed the astonished father, and desired to be shown into the room where his offspring was dreaming of coming pleasures. After the first greetings the sire demanded an explanation, which he received in the frankest terms. "The fact is, Sir," began this true chip of the old block, "there is a particular slice of the turkey of which I am extremely fond, and which, whenever I am in your company, you eat. Being alone, I determined to regale myself on my favorite morsel without stint." This was a defense which the father could especially appreciate by the token that, being an extremely good-natured man, he looked with a friendly eye on the weaknesses of our common humanity. A friend once said to him, "The despair of my life is that I can never get my fill of oysters." "Come and dine with me," answered Brillat-Savarin, "and you shall have your fill." The friend, a M. Laperte, came punctual to his time, and was soon engaged in an interesting conference with the oysters. Brillat-Savarin looked on quietly for an hour, by which time M. Laperte had given good news of 31 dozen, and was proceeding as fresh as ever to discuss the thirty-second dozen, when his host, wearied with long inaction, said, "My poor friend, not to-day will destiny allow you to eat your fill," and rang for the soup. M. Laperte did ample justice to the excellent dinner which followed. Brillat-Savarin's veracity was never impeached, so that after reading his narrative one may well credit the story that the Emperor Heliogabalus was in the habit of taking 400 oysters, 100 ortolans, and 100 peaches for his breakfast every morning. Brillat-Savarin gives one or two other instances of the capacity of the human stomach. Thus, General Bisson drank eight quart bottles of wine every morning at breakfast; neither the clearness of his mind, nor the cheerfulness of his temper seeming to be impaired thereby. Gen. Sibuet, a gallant officer, who died on the field of honor in 1813, at the passage of the Bober, was equally gifted with the power of making a meal of himself. He was 18 years old, when he strolled one evening into the kitchen of Genin, who kept one of the best inns at Belley. A magnificent turkey was at that very moment being taken off the spit, and young Sibuet's mouth watered. "I have just dined," he said to the landlord, "and yet I could eat that turkey whole." Several countrymen were seated at the kitchen fire, eating chestnuts and drinking white wine. Said one of them, a substantial looking farmer, in the corrupt provençal of the country: "Ses vous mezé, s'u payo; è ses vosecaca en rotaz, i-zet vo ket pairéet may ket mazerai la resta," which, being interpreted, means, "If you eat it, I will pay; but if you give in on the road, you shall pay, and I shall eat the rest." The challenge was accepted, and the future General, as became him, set methodically to work. The two wings and a drumstick disappeared with such alarming rapidity that "Hai!" called out the farmer in agony, "se vaie praou qu'izet fot; m'es, Monche Chibouet, poez kaet zu daive paiét, lessé m'en à m'en mesiet on mocho." ("Ains! I see well that it is all over but, Monsieur Sibuet, since I am to pay, suffer me at least to eat a morsel myself.")—Cornhill Magazine.

PRINCE KAUNITZ.—Kaunitz was in his forty-third year when called upon to rule the destinies of the vast Empire of Austria. From that moment he held a position as Prime Minister such as no man had occupied since the days of Prince Lobkowitz. The Empress conferred upon him the title of "Prince of the Empire," the Star of the Golden Fleece, and with her own hands decorated him with the Order of St. Stephen, with the permission, never granted before to any subject, of wearing it in diamonds. Kaunitz proved himself worthy of the confidence and predilection of his sovereign. He was the real founder of the greatness of the Hapsburg-Lorraine dynasty, in its foreign relations, as likewise in its home government, introducing method into the chaos of Austrian finance, paying off the public debt, and restoring the credit of the State. His projects for the aggrandizement of the Empire were as vast as its extent. He wished to re-establish Poland under an hereditary King, to restore the old Kingdom of Hungary in all its power and splendor, with the free navigation of the Danube, and to connect Austria proper with her outlying provinces by obtaining possession of Bavaria. This scheme he twice endeavored to effect, once in 1777, at the extinction of the old electoral line of Bavaria, and again in 1784. On both occasions he was foiled by Frederick the Great; in the first instance by the war of the Bavarian succession, and the second time by this monarch establishing the league of the German princes. The timid exaltation of the House of Brandenburg, which had hitherto been promoted as a counterpoise to the House of Bourbon, seemed likely to destroy the equilibrium of the German Empire, and imperil the supremacy it had hitherto enjoyed among the other nations of Europe. The attention of Kaunitz was naturally directed toward this new phenomenon in the political world, and he formed the bold and seemingly extravagant plan of humoling Prussia through an alliance with France. It is at critical moments like these that a great man suddenly steps forth, and while the crowd are discussing what is best to be done, does it. Shrewd and wary, he took advantage of circumstances in this instance, rather than made them. When the question of the old and new alliance was discussed in the conference council, the Prince had to vote the last. All the Ministers, without exception, propounded with great warmth the necessity of keeping up the old balance of the maritime powers. Kaunitz sat, seemingly uninterested in the debate, mending pens, pointing pencils, and making his repeater strike the hour. At length, when his colleagues had exhausted their logic, Kaunitz spoke, and exhibited such complete mastery of the subject, such confidence in his own powers of conviction, in a word, such unique diplomacy, that his opinion at once gained the day. The important money question had not been forgotten in the new alliance. The subsidy paid by France was enormous. According to the Livre rouge it amounted, from the year 1757 to 1769, to not less than 82,652,479 livres. From that time Kaunitz rarely consulted any of his colleagues; he ruled Austria and Europe by his celebrated maxim—In diplomacy everything is possible. His knowledge of mankind was profound. Though naturally proud and aristocratic in his ideas, he hesitated not to raise from the lowest rank men whom he employed in the most important duties. He knew so well how to choose them that he was seldom disappointed in their qualities. "The art of putting the right man in the right place," Talleyrand profoundly observes, "is perhaps the first in the science of government." Kaunitz objected strongly to subordinates with independent views of their own, and used to say, "One ought not to multiply troubles; I undertake to battle with the work, but not with the man who does it." He never read or wrote dispatches himself, as it was one of his maxims, "Not to do anything he could have done by another."—Tinsley's Magazine.

A MIRACLE BY PAGANINI.—He was a wonderful fellow, and some called him the devil. He was even imprisoned and had his violin taken away from him because he was supposed to be such a dangerous character. One day, a great lady in Rome said to him, "Signor Paganini, I understand that you can execute an air on one string of your violin."

"Madame, you have heard the truth," replied the great virtuoso.

"Will you allow me and my friends to hear you?"

"Certainly."

So the great lady gave a reception, at which Paganini was invited to perform his violin trick. After actually playing the prayer from Rossini's "Moses in Egypt" on one string, Paganini was thanked by his hostess, who said, "Now, Signor Paganini, as you do wonders on one string, can you perform on no string at all?"

"Most assuredly," answered Paganini.

"Will you, for me?"

"With pleasure."

A day was set, the great lady invited a number of friends to assist at the miracle, and when all were assembled, Paganini failed to appear. News came soon after that he had that day left Rome. This was his performance without any string, and his retort to the social queen who had treated him as a mountebank rather than as an artist. Poor fellow! he wasted away before death. In fact, the hundred steps he daily mounted to his palace at Genoa were enough to kill a man in his state of health. His body lay in the palace seven weeks after death, because the clergy refused to allow it Christian burial. In his last moments Paganini had either refused to see a priest, or had not received absolution, and this was the punishment! I believe that eventually the body was taken out of Italy for burial.—Scribner's Monthly.

THE DEBT OF RUSSIA.—At the close of the Crimean war Russia had at least £100,000,000 of paper roubles in circulation, as an almost purely fiduciary currency. Her coffers were exhausted, the land was impoverished, and trade nearly at a standstill. In the exercise of ordinary prudence such a country should have rested for at least half a generation before launching into further debt. All the more was this a necessity in the case of Russia, a country suffering under deficits which had been chronic almost since the time of Peter the Great, and whose paper-roubles had never been redeemed since Catherine II. gorged the land with them. This paper money formed so serious an obstacle to the growth of national wealth, and hence to the formation of credit companies, that again and again efforts were made to accomplish the impossible, either to raise the value of the rouble by issuing other interest-bearing credit documents for its redemption, or to fix by decree its exchange value against gold or silver. As late as 1863 a combination of these two measures was tried with a view to check a panic similar to that which terrified speculators all over Europe in the middle of last October. The Polish insurrection and its costly ruthless repression had necessitated the issue of more paper, until the Imperial Bank was unable to keep up the exchanges—the Government itself hardly able at enormous sacrifices to provide the means of paying interest on its then small foreign debt. A loan was therefore raised, and part of it applied as a temporary backing to the rouble notes, the exchangeable value of which was fixed at a graduated scale as against silver over a series of months, in the foolish hope that par would then be reached and maintained. As soon as the borrowed money was exhausted, of course the whole artificial fabric crumbled to pieces, and the notes were once more a drag on trade, and a source of loss to the Government. This is but a sample of what has been natural to Russia for a century and a half, and yet it was on such a foundation as this that Russia began to pile up her modern foreign debt, to become a great improver, a far-reaching conqueror and trader. Is it not an astonishing thing that she could have pursued this course almost for 20 years and still be apparently strong, still trusted; that all through there should have been no visible hitch? Several things have favored the longevity of this airy credit, however, which lessen our wonder. In the first place Western Europe, and especially we in England, have been very superstitious about Russian wealth. It has been a sort of fatalistic creed among the moneyed classes here that Russia would go on paying always, simply because she did not default upon her foreign debt in the time of the Crimean war. It was of no use reminding these people that, whereas she had then only a little over £500,000 to pay, she has now nearly £100,000,000 on her foreign debt alone, and that the total charge for interest, internal and external, has been growing year by year, until it is estimated at £15,500,000 for the present year. Circulating paper roubles, interest-bearing Treasury bonds, internal debt, foreign debt, railway and land bank bonds, the total debt of Russia cannot now be much less than £500,000,000, of which some £240,000,000 to £250,000,000 is foreign interest-bearing debt, distributed in England, France, Holland, and Germany.—Fraser's Magazine.

PUBLIC ACCOUNTS OF ATHENS INSCRIBED ON MARBLES.—The measures taken by the Athenians for the scrutiny and record of the public accounts show the same methodical care and vigilance which they exercised in the custody of the treasures of the State. Specimens of the laws regulating these accounts, as well as the accounts themselves, are given in the inscriptions published in the second volume of Böckh's Public Economy of Athens. It is to be regretted that the fragmentary condition of these renders it very difficult to make out the system adopted in keeping these accounts. It seems certain that bills were drawn on the Athenian Treasury by Generals on foreign service; and, in accounting for the produce of these bills, the rate of exchange in the place where they were negotiated would have to be allowed for before a final balance between receipts and expenditure could be struck. Again, much foreign money was received into the Athenian Treasury through the payment of tribute, or through other transactions with foreign States; and in the public accounts this money would have to be converted into its countervalue in Athenian drachmæ. The profit or loss on exchange in each of these cases would form an item in the account. The navy with which Athens had to maintain her powerful maritime supremacy necessarily involved a constant outlay in the building and fitting out of ships of war, and by a happy chance we possess a few relics of the ledgers and registers of the Board of Admiralty, by which the dock-yards and arsenal at the Piræus were administered. In other words, we possess a number of fragments of inscriptions relating to the state of the navy in the latter half of the fourth century, B. C., which were found in the ruins of a Byzantine building in 1834, and have been published by Böckh in the third volume of his Public Economy of Athens. Nearly all these marbles are fragments of inventories, similar in character to the treasure lists, and forming an exact and minute register of the ships and stores handed over from one Board of Admiralty to their successors. In these curious returns are entered the name of each ship and of its builder and its actual state of completeness or deficiency in respect to masts, spars, rigging, anchors, cables, &c. Ships or gear found to be unfit for service are condemned, and the proceeds of their sale are noted. The fitting out of war ships was one of the public burdens, leitourgiæ, imposed on the richer Athenian citizens. We learn from one of these inscriptions that to encourage promptitude in the discharge of this duty, special honors were decreed to those who soonest fitted out a trireme; a gold crown of the value of 500 drachmæ—about £20—was the first, a crown of interior value the second prize, and so on. On the other hand, all defaulters who owe money to the State on account of ships are duly noted. The date of these documents ranges from B. C. 380 to 323. From the Athenian Board of Admiralty we will pass to their Office of Works. Of the archives of this board we possess only three documents sufficiently complete to be worth noticing here, but these three are of very high interest. There is, first, the survey of the Erechtheum, made by a special commission, who were appointed by a decree of the people, B. C. 409, and while the Temple was still building. In this elaborate report, which may be likened to a blue-book such as a modern parliamentary commission draws up in pursuance of an order from the House of Commons, the exact state in which the building is found by the surveyors is noted with a minuteness which could have left no room for future subterfuge or procrastination; for every block of marble which carries any ornament is specified as either finished and in position, or as partially finished and not yet in its place on the building. In connection with this survey we must take the fragments of another inscription, which records, item by item, the expenses of burning the Erechtheum. This document is of peculiar interest to the student of ancient art, because it contains a statement of the sums actually paid for the sculptural decorations of the Erechtheum, with the names of the artists by whom they were executed. These sculptors, none of whose names are otherwise known to us, were evidently employed under the direction of the architect to execute certain figures and groups in a continuous composition, designed by some master hand. We can hardly doubt that this composition was the frieze mentioned in the survey as having a background of dark Eleusinian marble, and of which the fragments were discovered on the Acropolis some years ago, and were first recognized as belonging to the Erechtheum by Rangabé. The prices paid to the artists for these several figures are certainly not high, if we assume that the charge entered in each case represents the sum due. The prices range from 120 drachmæ (rather less than £5) downward to 60 drachmæ. A group in which a young man was represented guiding two horses, cost 240 drachmæ. It must be borne in mind that the figures in this frieze were only two feet in height, and that being attached to the background, they are not sculptured in the round. It would be interesting to compare the prices paid for sculpture in this account with the prices paid by Messrs. Armistead and Pullip to the skilful hands who carved the frieze round the Albert Memorial. Many other curious entries will be found in this record. A carpenter employed in making the roof was paid at the rate of 5 obols—about 6 pence—a day. Two talents' weight of lead, forming the cramps of the statues, cost 10 drachmæ. The cost of fluting one of the columns of the temple, as calculated by Rangabé from the entries, was 400 drachmæ. This work of fluting was executed by small gangs of workmen, not exceeding seven in number, and hence may have been piece-work. The third architectural document which I have to notice here is a contract for repairing and strengthening the Long Walls which connected Athens with the Piræus. The date of this contract is fixed by Rangabé to the administration of Lycurgus, B. C. 334–330. The precision and minuteness of its specifications make this document a model for all future Boards of Works to study.—Contemporary Review.

LORD ELDON'S FONDNESS FOR HIS PROFESSION.—The instincts of his genius naturally led him to read for the Bar. He cared little for literature or the fine arts; he was ignorant of science; he had no taste for those subjects which appeal to the imagination. All the hopes and aspirations of Lord Eldon were engrossed and bounded by the study of the law. Coke upon Littleton, law journals, reports of causes, judicial proceedings, and the like, were his one and only favorite branch of literature. To stand up in court and plead an up-hill case when a young man, or in after-life to listen to counsel from the serene heights of the Bench, were the two greatest pleasures of his existence. Unlike many of his brethern, he was indifferent to sport, seldom went to the opera or the theatre, and regarded society as a bore. Thus, in his earlier days, when unknown to fame, and struggling for the patronage of solicitors, he was kept free from many of the temptations that ordinarily beset the legal student. While his friends were coming out, or dancing at balls, or wandering from one country house to another in quest of sport and amusement, young Scott was poring over the pages of those luminaries—household names in the Temple and Lincoln's Inn—who were to make him in after-life the formidable advocate and the weighty Judge. That curious ottoman in the House of Lords has been pressed by more than one man whose rise to the dizzy heights of power has been due to none of the advantages of birth and fortune, but by few whose success has been more self-made or more worthily deserved than that of "plain John Scott."—Temple Bar.

THE FAREWELL OF THE OLD YEAR.

When the moments of friendship are numbered,
How oft it appears
That the love which in laughter has slumbered
Awakes now in tears!

We are friends that have journeyed together
Long time, you and I;
Through sunshine and stormiest weather,
But the Old Year must die.

And awhile in your hearts will awaken
A bitter regret;
And the paths that your feet have forsaken
You cannot forget.

Yet I pray you to mourn not my going,
Though we have been friends;
What am I but one billow, whose flowing
Has touched shore, and ends?

And the tale of my joy and my sorrow
Lives but as the trace
Of the waves, that the tides of the morrow
In turn shall efface.

Yet I leave you, as waves leave their treasures
Of coral and shell,
A gift, passing sorrows and pleasures,
Our friendship to tell.

I leave you the friendships, whose growing
Has been from my birth;
There is naught that the tide brings in flowing
Can equal their worth.

For as shells from the murmurs of ocean
Steal echoes that last,
So in friendship is stored the emotion
Of years that are past.

PEDESTRIANISM.

WINTER WALKS—NEWBURG TO POUGHKEEPSIE ON THE SNOW.

Our athletic relative, the Englishman, enjoys an advantage we need more than he, but one which we can never get. He can pursue out-door sports the year round with safety and comfort. Although his climate is wet and gloomy much of the year, it is free from those extremes of heat and cold that here attend out-door sports with dangerous physiological conditions. Our waters are frozen, our earth is covered with treacherous snow, our air is extremely inhospitable, during at least four months of the year. We then must resort to the dull, dusty gymnasium or brave the weather if we would stir the blood from its sluggishness. But two modes of exercise are now available to those who have no wood to chop or stones to break: they must either skate or walk. As a spectacle, fine skating is as beautiful as perfect dancing; and as an exercise it is sufficient, even more than sufficient for the most vigorous system. But clear ice is too scarce and lasts too short a time to satisfy the public need in this matter. Walking, therefore, must be regarded as our chief privilege for Winter; and its advantages should be impressed upon the public, and the conditions best suited to its pursuit should be studied and explained until we are willing to accept it, often in uncongenial circumstances, in place of the attractive sports pursued during the Summer.

If an ignorant savage were asked, "When is it best to walk?" he would say, "When it is too hot or too cold to ride." But when it is so hot that sun-strokes are common, we ride; when so cold that we freeze, we ride; when so rainy that we get wet, we ride; when so dry that we get dusty, we ride; when so pleasant that all nature walks forth, then, too, we ride with unshaken perseverance. With us it is always best to ride. Now, although riding in a comfortable vehicle having pure air is better than walking in a north-east snow-storm at the temperature of zero, or in a furious cold wind, or in a deluging rain, or in a tropical heat, yet even our Winter climate presents many days and conditions between its extremes when walking is healthier and pleasanter than riding in even the best circumstances. It seems scarcely possible that any sane man should choose to ride in a street car filled with foul air, to stamp his feet mile after mile to keep from freezing, to be wedged till he sits as a slice of disgust between discomforts, when if walking all that time he could be enjoying pure, at least purer, air, the glow of warm blood, the freedom of motion, and the self respect of a voluntary agent. In the Winter the city man seems to forget that he was once a boy with legs able to skate all day and then coast half the night.

In the Summer he seems to find a remnant of himself at the old homestead, when he loiters about the pond or down—not up—the long hill. If he could stay there longer he might find still more of youth; but business not permitting the presence of this charming visionary, he returns to the street and is lost again till the next escape. Now, Old Winter is not an ogre devouring all who venture to leave the hearth. He often wears the brightest smile, and offers the most exhilarating draught of the whole year. And the country is not a dreary waste where freezing death waits at the drifted cross-roads. Let a man go out to the shining hills, the bare woods, the clear ice, and he will find again youth, health, and hope.

Some judgment is required to choose a favorable place and time for a Winter walk. Unless the snow be so hard as to bear the pedestrian, he will keep to the roads. The most prudent walker will not wade very far through deep snow covering uneven ground. That the roads may be available they must be traveled and well packed by teams. This makes it desirable to visit places thickly inhabited, rather than the wilds that win one in Summer. The roads between prosperous villages are the best courses. The most favorable time is the second or third day after a fall of snow. Then the roads are packed, and yet not icy from thawing and freezing. Moreover, they are free from the ruts that sleigh runners wear after some days of travel. Each half of the road or track is then a smooth path of firm, trodden snow, without the granular, icy powder that is like the worst of sand under foot. This ice-powder, or grain, is likely to cover the track after considerable travel during cold weather. The snow or ice is ground up and lies loose on the surface unless the temperature is warm enough to allow it to be packed by the pressure of the hoofs and the runners. In a word, the best time for a country walk in Winter is when the following conditions are fulfilled: When the roads have just been well packed; when the sun shines; when the temperature ranges from 20° to 30°, and when the air is still. But good walking will be found even in cloudy weather, when the temperature is very low or is above melting for a part or even most of the day, and when there is a light wind. A cold, or even moderately cold, high wind is the worst atmosphere that can be met; for it passes through the clothes, and exposes one to the danger of sudden cooling from a state of perspiration. If the snow is new and the roads just packed, a continuous thaw of even a day and night injures the walking by making the snow yielding to some depth; but if the snow is old and icy by hard packing and frequent thawing and freezing, a much longer thaw is required to injure the footing for a walker. Since a storm of either snow or rain ruins the roads, both for the present and for some time to come, it is best to plan short walks that may be completed in two or three days, and that keep one within easy reach of some public conveyance, to take one home if a storm comes up unexpectedly. In this connection, pedestrians will find the Government weather reports of great use.

The outfit for a Winter walk differs a little from what is needed in Summer. The labor of walking on snow is greater than that of walking even on rough, bad ground. It is therefore important to dispense with superfluous weight, and cumbersome gear of any kind. The best coat is a short double-breasted pea-jacket, or roundabout, thick and warm. This kind of coat, when unbuttoned, admits the air to the body and is comparatively cool; at the same time, when buttoned closely to the waist and the neck, it is very warm, and gives all the protection needed when resting under shelter. Sufficient woolen underclothing should be worn to suit the weather; but one must remember that he is not expected to lie around on the rocks, or under the trees, to watch the sunset. He will be continually on the march, and will be protected from the weather by a house and a fire at the end of every walk. The shoes are very important. At this season a water-tight porous shoe would be a welcome invention. It is impossible to wear rubber in any form; the confinement of the perspiration soon ruins the feet with blisters and chafing. The objection makes it doubtful wisdom to render the leather shoe water-tight with preparations of oil, wax, and pitch. Some prefer to run the risk of getting their feet damp, or even wet, if they have a change of socks and shoes when they rest. For this object carry an extra pair of woolen socks and a pair of moccasins in your pockets. Grease the shoes—no boots are to be worn—enough to keep them soft for the feet. Always wear woolen socks. In very cold weather a light medium calf shoe will be the best, as the cold prevents the snow from melting on the foot, and the roads are perfectly free from water. To avoid the great trouble of slipping, one of two or three devices may be adopted. Have rubber soles put on your shoes by some rubber dealer. Another way is to stick on a sole and a heel of buckskin with some shellac varnish as thick as cream. Such a sole will wear a week, and is a good preventive of slipping. Or some strong cloth or felt may be attached in the same way, or with some of the leather-cement sold by shoe-finders. Half a dozen small hob-nails driven into the sole around the toe, are an excellent toe-cork to prevent slipping. They are not quite so desirable at the heel, because they favor the collection, or "balling" of snow. Finally, those who are accustomed to wearing a muffler about the neck, may carry a small scarf or a silk handkerchief. Very few will forget their wristlets and mittens.

On the morning of Jan. 13 I alighted from the train that brought me to Newburg, for a walk on the banks of the Hudson. The thermometer said it was only 14° above zero; but the sun on the glistening snow suggested that was a white lie; and the still air playing in my ears gave them a little pinch, and whispered, "not cold." Sleigh-bells rang to the quick step of fast horses; bright robes dashed past, giving only a glimpse of red cheeks. I soon got from the streets to the open suburbs, where the walks are cleared by snow-plows. The lawns and flower-beds of the elegant residences were sleeping, to be bright in the Spring. The cosy comforts peeped out of the windows, or came nearer in the sleighs full of furs and folks. At the Balm Tree I took the river road, leading north-east, and soon left the sidewalk for the country road. From the hill are seen the numerous picturesque houses, presenting inviting gables, roofs, and porches; the steamboats of Newburg; the bay, and the river a field of ice, running to West Point, and above these the mountains furred with a leafless forest. The air was crystal clear, and almost intoxicating with life-giving properties. But it was too cold to stand long, and I soon turned northward and gladly pushed on. The river, in full view for two or three miles on this river road, presents many interesting bays and points. Rocky knolls bear a squad of cedars, guards wrapped in their dark cloaks. Here and there in the army that holds a hill a portly tree stands alone in official magnitude. The road leaves the river at the Dauntzkammer and winds about the hills and through patches of wood. The snow was deep and Winter was present everywhere. Now and then a rabbit's track or a squirrel's was all that told of life in nature. But the teams came and went, dragging muffled creatures apparently in the grasp of apoplexy.

"Will you have a ride, Sir?"

"Very much obliged, Sir, but I prefer to live."

Ride, indeed! Not in such an air, on such a road, and with such spirits as they give to these who will walk.

Marlboro, eight miles from Newburg, is a clean village at the head of a deep, rocky gorge emptying a stream into the river. Two mill-races, two cascades, the dams, had been transformed into glistening ice. In the depths the rocks were piled in hurricane stalagmites that gleamed in the sunlight. The rolling knolls to right and left, the wide river in front, and the hills of Dutchess County were all dazzling with light. From the Marlboro hill are seen the tops of the Catskills, the Berkshire hills in Massachusetts, and portions of Connecticut. All around are rolling hills covered with orchards, vineyards, and various fruit trees. The farm-houses had that pinched effect that comes with Winter, when all the house but the kitchen corner is closed against the storms, and the human tracks, towels, flues, churn, and pans collect in the smallest possible area on a large farm. Not a fowl was to be seen or heard; they dislike the snow and cold as much as anybody, and, accordingly, cultivate close intimacies in the stable. The road ran by drifts of snow six feet deep; but the track was good, and gave one a comfortable assurance of salvation from too long a sojourn in that bleak region.

Milton did not then appear the charming Summer resort it is esteemed. The orchards, the gardens, the brooks, the groves, the ponds were all wrapped up in themselves and offered no invitations to saunter in their seclusion. Just after sunset I reached Lewisburg, opposite Poughkeepsie. The river seemed new and magical as I walked over its depths on the ice, reddened here and there by the flaming furnaces. The last flush of a rosy sky faded from the Highlands, the cold became more piercing, and the night made civilization as welcome as the day had made the expanse of snow, the keen Winter air, the bright sun, and the toil, the glow, the spirits of a Winter walk.

LABELING LIVE TROUT.—Numerous experiments and continued observations, made under the auspices of some of the practical pisciculturists belonging to the association, have developed results full of interest and of much practical value. For instance, in reply to queries as to the probable age of the mammoth trout found in the Rangeley lakes, Prof. Agassiz emphatically declared that "no man living knew whether these six and eight pounders were ten or two hundred years old." To get some light upon this question, Mr. Page conceived an ingenious device, which he at once proceeded to put in execution. Platinum wire was obtained, cut into one and a half inch lengths, flattened at one end, and various numbers were stamped on the surface from ½ to 4, also the numbers 70, 71, 72, to denote the year. As trout were captured they were weighed, one of these tags was passed through the skin just under the adipose fin and securely twisted, and then the fish was liberated. In the course of the two or three years named a large number of these trout were thus labeled. Of course, the chances that any of them would be caught seemed infinitesimally small, yet in 1873 one of them reported. In June of that year, Mr. Thomas Moran, the artist, captured a fine, vigorous trout weighing 2¼ pounds. Upon taking him from the landing net the platinum tag flashed in the sunlight. Upon examination, the mark, "½—71," was discovered, thus establishing the curious fact that this particular fish had gained 1¾ pounds in two years.—Scribner for February.

THE DAILY LIFE OF PRINCE KAUNITZ.—When in Vienna the Prince kept an open table, covers being usually laid for 18 or 20 guests. His own diet was remarkably simple, although the table was exquisitely supplied with every delicacy. In the evening he habitually received a select circle of friends, who had carte blanche to introduce any stranger distinguished by rank or talent. The guests were left much to themselves; for even when the Emperor Joseph was present the Prince withdrew early to his private apartments. He never permitted any one to interfere with his daily routine of business. The whole of his time was devoted to deep thought and strenuously-sustained work. All his domestic arrangements, his daily diet, his incessant care of his health, were merely intended as means to maintain the ease and freedom of mind and body necessary to a diplomatist. Visits of simple etiquette he never paid, nor was he often to be seen at the grand State dinners given at the court. Much of his time was spent in his cabinet with his Secretary, Xaver Raidt, to whom he is said to have dictated maxims and ideas which have not yet seen the light. He was the head of the literary society of the Imperial capital. To men of letters he showed every kindness and courtesy, placing them before his titled guests; for he rightly considered genius merited a higher homage than that required by the mere accident of birth. Nor did the Prince confine his regard to empty attention; literary men received most substantial tokens of his patronage whenever the occasion necessitated; especially historians, to whom he showed a marked preference. He loved to see himself surrounded by witty and intellectual guests. As he advanced in years he would show open annoyance if his company were wanting in these respects, saving aloud to the Countess Clary, who performed the honors of his house for him, "Alas, what dull people you have invited to-day!" Sometimes he met his match. One evening at a dinner he asked the Marquis Lucchesini, the clever friend of Frederick the Great, "Monsieur le Marquis, dites-moi à quoi sert la mathématique?" "Pour mésurer les hauteurs, votre altesse," readily replied the nobleman. Prince Kaunitz spoke slowly and deliberately, looking fixedly before him, after the custom of the Emperor Charles V. Sporting topics, and what is termed "the road," had great interest for him. Among his many noble qualities, a remarkable love of animals was included. A large French poodle, his constant companion, followed him everywhere, even to court and to cabinet. Each day he rode horses from his magnificent stud, which comprised some of the finest breeds in Europe. This exercise he usually took in the riding-school, lighted up by a profusion of lamps; only in the very warmest weather did he venture into the park, for he never enjoyed fresh air; in fact, it did not agree with him. During the oppressive heat of the dog-days, when not a breath was stirring, he would sit for a few moments in the small parterre near his official residence, or walk the few steps from there to the Hofburg; but on both occasions he always covered his mouth with a lace pocket handkerchief. In his wardrobe were several suits of clothes, regulated according to the temperature of the day, with a number of black silk cloaks and muffs, lined with costly furs, in which he wrapped himself, as the weather might require. Strange to say, this apparently unhealthy mode of life agreed with him. He was never ill, and reached the fine age of 84 years.—Tinsley's Magazine.

SPORTING IN MADRAS.—Here we may expect to meet with the choice game-bird of the country, the florikin, (Sypheotides auritus.) It is of the bustard family, nearly the size of a hen, the plumage beautifully mottled and barred with dark and light shades of brown and black, the male sometimes wholly black; the chin is white, and there are two or three white feathers in the wings. The male, too, is distinguished by a tuft over each ear, three or four inches long, of three bare-shafted feathers ending in small oval webs. Its chief food is grasshoppers, and it is often difficult to flush, running long distances through the grass, or lying so close as to allow being stepped over without rising; its flesh is held to be the most delicate and best-flavored of all Indian game-birds. Choosing a large open space of grass, we advance in a line with beaters on either side and dogs working in front, invisible in the tall growth; presently there is a dash and whimper, and up flies the expected game, a satisfactory shot; and while reloading, another springs up and mounting high flies fast away. But this delicate quarry is prized by other foes than the sportsman, and a probable cause of its scarcity and lurking habits is the pertinacity with which hunting hawks will quarter ground like this with keen downward glance that discerns the least movement in deepest herbage. As the florikin is speeding away, a chestnut-headed, gray-backed merlin dashes arrow-like from behind a tree and swoops upon it. Eluding the attack by a hair's breadth, the bird dives quickly into the thick grass, and the hawk, recovering itself with light upward sweep, would have followed but for our advance. Though marking exactly the spot, we traverse it again and again, but the frightened bird will not rise, till at last it flutters up from the very jaws of a dog. We proceed to beat the remaining ground, and bag another brace, which is fair success in these districts, where florikins are scarce, though plentiful further north. While beating, an agitation among the dogs indicates a danger hardly known to sportsmen at home. Two or three, with raised ears and uneasy yelp, are surrounding some object in the group; we approach and see a large cobra, with head erect and thrown back, swaying to and fro as a dog comes too near, and as we come up the grim spectacled hood expands and a fierce hiss is heard—signs of instant attack, only prevented by a charge of shot. It seems much distended, and after some hesitation and muttterings of "the good snake!" (for so the natives commonly designate the cobra, and rather scruple to molest it, and should they kill one frequently beg its pardon,) one of the beaters stirs it up and discloses inside another snake, almost half its own size, apparently not long swallowed.—Fraser's Magazine.

CRIME IN FRANCE.

THE SAGACITY OF THE PARIS DETECTIVES.

A MURDERER'S CONFESSION—WHY HE CUT HIS MISTRESS IN PIECES—HOW THE CRIME WAS DISCOVERED—MRS. GEN. ANDERSON'S SUIT AGAINST A JEWELLER—HOW SHE WAS ROBBED OF A VALUABLE RING—A FAMOUS DIVORCE CASE REVIVED.

From Our Own Correspondent.

PARIS, Friday, Jan. 5, 1877.

The case of the woman cut in pieces has once more verified the sagacity of the Paris Detective Police, and shown that the traditions of Vidocq are not entirely lost. One morning all Paris was startled to hear that fragments of a female, tied up in two packages and attached to stones, had been found in the Seine, and the Police set themselves at work to establish the identity of the victim and to trace out her murderer. The disfigured head of the woman, shorn of its hair, was found in one of the bundles, tied up in a piece of well-worn calico. It was exposed for some days at the Morgue, and all Paris was invited to pass by and see it. When it could no longer be kept, a wax figure exactly like it was exposed upon the marble slab of the Morgue. The dead woman was recognized 129 times, each time the identity being established by several witnesses; but of the women lost to the view of their friends all were traced out but one. Some of them were found living in Bordeaux or Marseilles; some were traced to Belgium or Geneva; some were found to have died and been regularly buried; many were found living in Paris, within an hour's walk of their friends, hiding away for reasons of their own; but all were found out in some way but one. That one was Marie Le Manach, the widow Bellangé, of the town of Mans. Bellangé was an industrious shoemaker, but his wife was noted for her disorderly conduct. She made frequent visits to Paris, where she remained for some time, and when the shoemaker died, leaving her a few hundred dollars, she went to the capital to live. On applying at an intelligence office for work, she fell in with the clerk, who learned that she had some money. In a few days the two were living together as man and wife. The clerk in question was Billoir, the man now accused of murder, an ex-Sergeant in the Army, a broken-down man, with what little intellect he had rumed by the abuse of absinthe, and a man unable to work. He was one of those unfortunate creatures who think that they were born for better things, who envy the rich, yet have not the energy to earn a decent living. Billoir wore the ribbon of the military medal, and was known at the café which he frequented with his mistress as the decoré. Marie Le Manach's legacy from the shoemaker amounted to about 50 cents a day, to which was added the wages earned by herself. Having this before him, Billoir could not keep the place of clerk in an intelligence office, which was beneath his dignity, and he therefore set up as a rentier. I should say that he also had a pension amounting to about four cents a day. At night Billoir and his mistress frequented the Café Charles, where the latter was noted as a slattern, for the impropriety of her conduct and appearance, and for her malicious tongue. Suddenly the two disappeared, but nothing was thought of it until Saturday, when the illustrated papers came in with cuts of the "woman cut in pieces." "Tiens!" said one, "that looks like la femme du decoré!" The others examined it, and found a certain resemblance. "By the way," remarked another, "what has become of him?" On comparing notes, it was found that his last appearance was a few days before the discovery of the murdered woman.

This was the beginning of the discovery and the Police went systematically at work, but M. Jacob insisted upon going minutely into all of the supposed recognitions. When he had no more doubts, he had the vaults of the house opened, and there found the woman's hair and portions of the viscera. When told of these proofs against him, Billoir continued to protest his innocence, and M. Jacob made up his story. When it was done he read it to Billoir, tracing out all the details of his crime, and, although he continued to deny his guilt, he was seen to grow pensive. When M. Jacob visited him on Wednesday, Billoir said, as the Commissaire was leaving: "You are a very good fellow, M. Jacob, and I am going to tell you all about it." The crime was then revealed. Billoir had been deceived by the woman Bellangé with respect to her fortune, for instead of having an income of 50 cents per diem she was spending so much per diem of her small capital. She got the last of it a few months ago. Evidently something had to be done, neither having any work, and they began to look for places. The woman went to the intelligence office, said Billoir to M. Jacob, where she met one of her cronies, and came home beastly drunk. The first thing she did was to break a gilt drinking glass which he cherished as a souvenir. He turned round, furious with rage, and gave her a vigorous kick just as she was stooping to pick up the pieces of glass. His foot struck her in the breast—she fell heavily—gasped two or three times, and breathed no more. Billoir remained for 24 hours with the body, concocting plans, so far as his besotted intellect would permit, for evading human justice. On the second day he resolved to cut the body in pieces. In his coal-bin he had a box of sawdust, and, spreading this upon the floor, he cut the body open with a razor, forcing the vertebræ apart with a hammer and chisel. He then wrapped the parts up in compact bundles and carried them two miles to the Seine. The scene does not vary materially from that drawn by M. Jacob, and one cannot help wondering what must have been the feelings of this man as he heard the story of his crime read to him. All his low cunning must have deserted him then, and during that night he must have come to the conclusion that escape was out of the question. This is a great triumph for the detective Police. The only question now remaining is that of premeditation, and M. Jacob is carefully sifting Billoir's story of the cause of the woman's death. If it be true, he may get the benefit of "extenuating circumstances," and thus save his head from the guillotine; but if premeditation can be proved he will surely be executed. Since the affair of Troppman and the murder of the Kink family at Pautin, no crime has so excited the Parisian public.

While near the Palais de Justice, I may as well step across the way to the new Tribunal de Commerce, and look at a case just decided there. The complainant was an American lady. Last year, Mrs. Robert Anderson, widow of the General, and now a resident of Paris, sent a quantity of jewelry to be cleaned and repaired to the house of M. Leclerc. That gentleman is an authority in the jewelry world, and is one of the head men in the jewelers' corporation. Whenever any jewels are to be examined by the courts, in cases of litigation, M. Leclerc is sent for to fix their value, just as, in the case of crown diamonds or precious stones of great value, our compatriot, Mr. Reed, is called in as an appraiser. Among the rings which were sent to Leclerc by Mrs. Anderson there was one to which she attached a great value, because it was the ring Gen. Anderson had given her after their betrothal. She had always worn it and esteemed it highly. Long after their marriage, when such things could be discussed between them, the General had told his wife what the ring had cost him; but she valued it more for its associations than for its intrinsic worth, and it was a ring that made little show beside others that she sent to the jeweler's. But all the rings came back save this one, which was lost or stolen in the shop. Leclerc could not deny the loss, and offered to pay for the ring. As an expert he had estimated its value at 164 francs. Why the extra four should have been added is hard to say, for ce n'est pas un chiffre, as the French remark, but it looks very much like the odd shillings and pence that men add to hundreds of pounds when they draw a worthless check. The odd figure was certainly impressive, and probaby every jeweler will say that it shows with what accuracy the expert added up the different values in the ring.

Mrs. Anderson laughed at the proposal. She said that the ring was worth 3,000 francs at the lowest estimate, and demanded that sum. Leclerc resisted and was cited before the tribunal. In order to show the general character of the ring, she showed that it was composed of two sapphires, one ruby, one topaz, and another stone, all of the first water, and of certain dimensions. Leclerc would not swear that the stones were either smaller than Mrs. Anderson had stated, or that they were false, but tried to impress upon the court the value of his judgment as an expert. In all matters pertaining to gold he was infallible, he thought, but the Judge thought that this might be the case and yet leave a margin for fallibility in the matter of precious stones. Mrs. Anderson had claimed 3,000 francs, on the other hand, which was probably the price she would have to pay for such a ring; but he added, to the great disgust of M. Leclerc, that jewelers generally made about 100 per cent. profit, and hence he thought that it would be about a fair thing to estimate the real value of the ring at 1,500 francs. Leclerc was condemned to pay this sum to Mrs. Anderson, together with the costs of court.

Just opposite there is another and more important tribunal, which has just been occupied again with another phase of the famous case of which I have had so frequent occasion to speak. A few months ago a child was born to Prince Bibesco and his wife, late Mme. De Beaufremont, in Saxony, where the divorce was pronounced and the subsequent marriage ceremony performed. Since then, Prince De Beauffremont has been incessant in his attacks upon his ex-wife. He even went to Belgium, where the De Chimay property is located, and sued for an order of sequestration against the property of the Princess. But, though the demand was taken into consideration, the order has not been granted, and Prince De Beauffremont is trying to push it in other courts. Here, however, he had a different object in view—a disavowal of paternity. Still claiming Mme. De Bibesco as his lawful wife, as she is by the laws of his country, he asks the courts to pronounce her infant daughter, born since she ceased to cohabit with him, an illegitimate child. Mme. De Bibesco did not appear, of course, but the tutor of the child, M. Husson, appeared to defend the case, and demanded a delay in the proceedings until the Court of Cassation had delivered its judgment upon the appeal of Mme. de Beaufremont, regarding the legality of her second marriage. The Prince had an easy case, for the court immediately recorded his disavowal of paternity and pronounced the child illegitimate, having been born out of the bonds of wedlock.

A DARING ROBBERY.

AN EXPRESS CAR BOARDED AND ROBBED WITHIN THE LIMITS OF CHICAGO—THE OCCUPANTS GAGGED—THREE MEN ARRESTED ON SUSPICION.

From the Chicago Journal, Jan. 18.

A daring attempt was made to rob the express car attached to the train on the Chicago, Alton and St. Louis Railroad, which left the Madison Street Depot at 9 o'clock last night. Shortly after leaving the depot, when the train had reached the Burlington crossing, where the tracks of the Chicago, Burlington, and Quincy Railroad cross those of the Chicago and Alton, the engineer saw four men board the platform of the express car, and rap upon the door thereof for admission. What happened after that the engineer only knows from what he heard. The four ruffians lost no time in demonstrating the object of their sudden and startling call. The door of the car was opened slightly when the fellows burst in. There were at this time two men in the car—the baggage master, John Malcom, and W. F. Bevier, agent for the United States Express Company. No sooner did the fellows get inside of the car than they whipped out revolvers and demanded an unconditional surrender. This demand was followed up by the ruffians seizing the two men and throwing them upon the floor of the car. They then rifled their pockets of whatever valuables they contained, and, obtaining possession of the safe keys, two of the fellows went to the safe, while the other couple took care of the prostrate men.

The safe was gutted of its contents in about two minutes. In it was a package containing $12,000 in greenbacks addressed to the railroad company's agent at Bloomington. This money belonged to the railroad company, and was being forwarded to Paymaster Larrabee, to be disbursed on the Jacksonville and Missouri Division of the line. Besides this package there was an express pouch containing jewelry and money valued at $137. The robbers took the packages from the safe and laid them on the treasure box, but in the hurry of their flight forgot the more valuable packages, and seized the large parcels containing only a little over $100. They got off the train at the railroad bridge over the South Branch. Shortly after the fellows left the train, one of the brakemen entered and found the men bound with ropes. They were released, but the robbers had fled.

An event so startling naturally caused a flurry in the Police Department. Early this morning the Police were alive and engaged in what at first seemed to be a fruitless effort to capture the men. But finally they struck a clue; though what the clue was no reporter has been able to find out. The men left the train at the railroad bridge over the South Branch. This may have had something to do with the fact that all of the officers in the Second Precinct station could conveniently be spared for detective duty, were hurried down to the Twelfth Street Station to aid Sergt. O'Donnell and his men in their search for the thieves. About 10 o'clock three men were arrested and locked up, charged with being the fellows who robbed the car. One of them is James Scanlon, a noted thief and dangerous character. Word was sent to Superintendent Hickey of the capture, and he telegraphed to Capt. Ellis to "hold the men."

A GRAND JURY EPISODE.

The San Francisco Call thus describes an unusual incident of a grand jury session: "The Alameda Grand Jury finished their labors last Saturday and were discharged. Among the indictments ignored was one against George Walker Kelly for grand larceny. He had been charged with stealing a horse from in front of a store in Livermore, about two months ago. The prisoner was unusually interesting and intelligent for one of his years—only 13—and so impressed the charitable jury before whom he was arraigned.

At the time of his arrest it was publicly noted that the youthful prisoner had run away from his home in Kansas, about two years before, without cash, but a worth of capital; and after being led off by the ear at many stations along the overland road, finally reached Virginia City, where he labored one year at the business of selling newspapers and blacking boots. This city was his objective point when he left home, and that the two months since he left Virginia for San Francisco on foot, but was captured on the back Francisco on foot, but was captured on the back of a horse about two miles west of Livermore, Alameda County, and until last Saturday was detained in the Alameda County Jail. The story the boy told, and the appearance he presented, were so much in his favor that the Grand Jury not only ignored the bill against him, but one of them gave the lad a suit of clothes, and another took him home as his son."

A BRACE OF VETERANS.

The Milwaukee Wisconsin of the 17th inst. has this personal mention: "The Soldiers' Home at the present time contains a brace of inmates who bear wonderful histories. Capt. William Weir is the principal of the two. He is known as a veteran of many wars, having served under Gen. Scott in the Mexican war, in the United States Army. His military career began with 1840, and in 1841 he served at Fort Winnebago, in Co. I, First Regiment, known as the Gen. Taylor Regiment, and also rendered famous as containing on its roll the name of Jefferson Davis. He has had an excellent experience on the frontier, and in the late rebellion he was Captain of Company C, in the Thirty-third Wisconsin Volunteers. The record of this regiment is already well-known. Capt. Weir shared its privations, hardships, and honors to the last. His health is now on the decline, and he contemplates a trip to the South. John Dean, his comrade in age and experience, began active life in the Black Hawk war, but has also passed through numerous other conflicts and the civil strife. Both of these men are honored far and near, and are passing their old age in the peace that their activity, patriotism and bravery have assisted to win and their country to maintain."

FORTY-FOURTH CONGRESS.

SECOND SESSION.....Jan. 20.

SUMMARY OF THE DAY'S PROCEEDINGS.

In the Senate the credentials of William Pitt Kellogg as Senator of the United States from Louisiana were presented and temporarily laid on the table. Several petitions were presented asking for the adoption of a sixteenth amendment to the Constitution, prohibiting the several States from disfranchising persons on account of sex; also one from citizens of this State remonstrating against the passage of the bill concerning commerce and navigation, and the regulation of steam and sailing vessels. A resolution presented by Senator Dorsey, and having reference to the school fund of the Five Tribes was adopted. Senator Morrill's joint resolution declaring the present a fit time for the adoption of measures leading to the resumption of specie payments, was referred to the proper committee. Senator Withers made a speech relative to the sending into Virginia an armed force of 30 United States soldiers, and was replied to by Senator Morton. Senator Edmunds then got the floor and delivered a speech in favor of the joint committee's bill relative to counting the Presidential vote, which speech is printed in another column.

In the House, Mr. Willis of New-York, made a sheech on the resolutions relative to the powers of the House in counting the Electoral vote, commencing his remarks with a most palpable untruth. Having thus made his point, the Representative continued at some length to "lay down the law" as interpreted by Tilden and his party. The House then went into Committee of the Whole on the Indian Appropriation bill. Mr. Tarbox then relieved himself in part of a political outburst, and Mr. Banks made a witty reference to the compromise then under discussion in the other end of the Capitol. The day's discussion was closed with a speech oy Mr. Chittenden.

SENATE.

Mr. MORTON, of Indiana, presented the credentials of William Pitt Kellogg, as Senator of the United States from the State of Louisiana, for the term of six years from March 4, 1877. He asked that they be read and laid on the table; so ordered. The credentials are signed by Stephen B. Packard, Governor of Louisiana.

THE RIGHT OF FEMALE SUFFRAGE.

Mr. SARGENT, of California, presented the petition of male and female residents of California, asking the adoption of a sixteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States, prohibiting the several States from disfranchising persons on account of sex. Referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections. In presenting the petition Mr. Sargent said he was not aware of any law in the polls would purify elections and give us a better class of public officials. The State would be benefited by conferring the right of suffrage upon women. This movement was growing year by year, and had already passed the period of ridicule both in this country and in England. Petitions of a similar character were presented by Messrs. McCreery, Dawes, Hamlin, Sherman, Thurman, Christiancy, Morrill, Windom, Mitchell, Frelinghuysen, Wright, Cockrell, Cameron, of Pennsylvania, Kernan, Allison, Bogy, and Morton, all of which were referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

THE TAXATION OF BANKS.

Mr. WRIGHT, of Iowa, presented a petition of citizens of Iowa in favor of the removal of the tax on bank circulation and capital. Referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. CONKLING, of New-York, presented a petition of citizens of New-York, remonstrating against the passage of the Senate bill concerning commerce and navigation and the regulation of steam and sailing vessels. Referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. KERNAN, of New-York, introduced a bill for the further distribution of the moneys received under the Geneva award. Referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

THE INDIAN SCHOOL FUND.

Mr. DORSEY, of Arkansas, submitted a resolution instructing the Committee on Indian Affairs to inquire whether there is any reason to believe that any portion of the school fund of the five tribes inhabiting the Indian Territory has been diverted to other uses, whether any debts have been incurred by said tribes, and what legislation is necessary on the subject. Agreed to.

SPECIE PAYMENTS.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont, presented a joint resolution of the Vermont Legislature, declaring that the present time, while business is depressed; while the values of all kinds of commodities are low, and large amounts of currency are lying idle; while the balance of trade is in our favor, and large amounts of gold are flowing into our country from foreign countries, presents a favorable opportunity for the adoption of measures leading to the resumption of specie payments. They favor the passage of a law, which by a gradual reduction of the currency, a gradual accumulation of gold in the Treasury and in the national banks, and a strict economy in the administration of public affairs, will make it practicable a sure and easy permanent resumption of specie payments by the 1st day of January, 1879. Referred to the Committee on Finance.

THE MILITARY IN VIRGINIA.

Mr. WITHERS, of Virginia, called up the Message of the President in regard to the occupation of Petersburg by the military on the 7th of November last, the day of the Presidential election. He spoke against the authority of the President to send troops into a State, unless called upon by the State authorities to do so, as provided in the Constitution. He quoted from the decisions of the Supreme Court, and argued that the Government of the United States could claim no powers not granted to it by the Constitution.

Mr. MORTON, in reply, argued that the President had the right to quarter troops in any State, providing that private rights were not injured. Pending discussion, the morning hour expired and the matter was laid over.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

The House resumed the consideration of the resolutions reported by the Committee on Privileges relative to the powers of the House in counting the Electoral vote, and was addressed by Mr. WILLIS, of New-York. He said that before the election no man would have believed that even Grantism could have Mexicanized freedom. No man would have believed that in the short space of eight years the people who had, in 1776, asserted their independence, had become so poisoned and infected with bad government as to unlearn all the first principles of its memories. After the election the papers all announced the election of Samuel J. Tilden—the Democratic papers with joy and praise; the Republican with acquiescence and submission. But when the unprincipled Republican Party leaders had recovered from the stupefaction of their defeat, they were and hatched a conspiracy to capture enough votes in the Southern States to elect Hayes. The men who attempted to hatch the conspiracy were known to be strangers to honor, but they would soon recognize that there was a public before whom their plots would fall to the ground. The Republican Committee which had come down South at the instance of President Grant, had encouraged the conspirators in their work of infamy. They had gone into conclave with those men, and had given them to understand that the Army of the United States Government would sustain them in any wrong they might commit on a bleeding people. But he declared that the American people would never submit to it. A conspiracy under the auspices of a Cæsar or a Napoleon might be borne, but submission to a conspiracy under the auspices of a Returning Board composed of scalawags and office-holders, implied a degradation to which Anglo-Saxon manhood would never fall. He criticised the action of the President in sending troops to the Southern States, deploring the lot of the Republic when its defenders should become its oppressors. He also criticised the Returning Board of Louisiana, declaring that all its acts were illegal, inasmuch as it had not filled a vacancy which had occurred in it. He argued in favor of the power of the House in counting the Electoral vote. He thought that no one could successfully deny the right and power of the House to object to the vote of any State. In a certain emergency, the Constitution provides that the House should elect a President, and it was fortunate that it such emergency should arise the present House would elect a majority candidate. The majority of the House was in harmony with a more than 250,000 majority of the people. He wanted to see the candidate of the people elected. He did not want to see any one elected by a legal quibble. In the case of Oregon, Watts was undoubtedly ineligible and Cronin might be legally elected. But where was the man that would claim that that vote should be counted for Tilden? He [Mr. Willis] would deem himself unworthy of a seat in Congress should he undertake such a purpose. The people were sovereign, and the people of Oregon had given their voice for Hayes and Wheeler.

At the end of Mr. Willis' speech, Mr. SEELYE, of Massachusetts, obtained the floor, but yielded to a motion for the House to go into a Committee of the Whole on the Indian Appropriation bill, pending which Mr. PAYNE, of Ohio, gave notice that he would on Tuesday next call up for consideration the bill reported from the Joint Committee on the Electoral Vote, the debate to continue Tuesday and Wednesday, and that he would call the previous question on Wednesday night.

The House then, at 2 o'clock, went into Committee of the Whole, Mr. Hatcher, of Missouri, in the chair, on the Indian Appropriation bill. (The appropriation recommended by the bill is $4,370,759 12.)

Mr. WILSHIRE, of Arkansas, addressed the committee in opposition to the doctrines that the President of the Senate has a right to count the Electoral vote.

Mr. TARBOX, of Massachusetts, rising to make a political speech.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa, made the point of order that the gentleman must confine his remarks to the bill before the committee.

Mr. TARBOX replied that upon the question as to whether there was to be a country or not depended every other question whether there should be any need of making appropriations for the support of the Indians.

The CHAIR said that he would wait until the gentleman from Massachusetts had proceeded further before he made his decision.

After further remarks by Mr. TARBOX, Mr. WILSON renewed his point of order, but the Chair ruled that he could not say in advance whether the gentleman from Massachusetts would not make a connection between his political utterances with the bill before the committee.

Mr. TARBOX then resumed, saying that if ever a spirit of moderation should prevail among the people and in the public council, such a time had now arrived. The simple question was, "who had been elected President?" and there was no power under heaven to reverse the verdict which the American people had given at the ballot-box. The institutions of the country could endure even a corrupt and infamous Administration and not be utterly crushed out. That had been shown. But the injunction into office of rulers who were not entitled to it by a fair and honest election was the overthrowal of free government. The constitutional right of duly-elected Presidents to rule was infinitely greater than the divine right of kings. The conscience and the sentiment of the people revolted at any attempt at compromise on this question, or the settlement of it by the Executive—as if it were permissible for the Executive to determine as to who had been elected President.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa, again raised the point of order that Mr. Tarbox must confine his remarks to the pending bill.

The Chair again decided that he could not foresee whether the gentleman's speech had not reference to the bill under consideration, and his decision was upheld by Mr. Banks, of Massachusetts, who said that no one could tell but that the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. Tarbox] might make a suggestion in his speech to refer the whole Presidential question to a council of the Chiefs of the Indian tribes. [Laughter.]

Mr. TARBOX proceeded with his speech, and said there was a very general belief throughout the country that there was a conspiracy of bad men to defeat the will of the people by false returns. The Chairman of the National Republican Committee had announced the day after the election that the Republican candidates for President and Vice President had been elected by a majority of one. How did he know that? His assertion or prophecy had been based on his own knowledge of the base character of the men who in the States of Louisiana, South Carolina, and Florida, had the control of the ballot-boxes and the manipulation of the returns. He [referring to Mr. Chandler,] had known that when those men realized that the votes of those States were necessary to the election of Hayes, they would, regardless of honor, of right, or of the public will, manage to give him the votes of those States. He criticised the action of Secretary Chandler and of the President in the matter, and said that the men whom the President invited to go to those States were the steadiest of partisans; not so with those who went there at the request of the Chairman of the Democratic National Committee. At this point of the speech Mr. Tarbox's time expired, and he got leave to print the rest of it.

Mr. CHITTENDEN, of New-York, then took the floor and expressed his conviction that if the legal element in the House (201 out of 293 members being lawyers) was allowed the discussion of the Presidential question, it would last for the rest of the century. But the people did not enjoy these eternal discussions. The country had been scourged by war and debt, had been sunk into the deepest pit of commercial and political demoralization, and the people were crying out for wise counsels and for patriotic and practical statesmanship to lift the nation on to better life. The people thanked God for the report of the Concurrent Committee, and would conform to it with a unanimity scarcely matched since the election of Washington in 1789. The people were not to be misled by such nonsense as his colleague [Mr. Willis] had indulged in to-day. They had had quibbling enough, and they proposed to act, and immediately, in accordance with eternal justice. He rejoiced to believe that the people were on the edge of a new revelation, that the daybreak of better times had come, and that the intelligence and patriotism of the people would rule the hour, and that every member who dared to speak and act as a partisan, would be put down and cast away. The election corruption was no new thing. It has prevailed as much in the choice of a Roman Consul as it did in New-Orleans. His colleague, [Mr. Willis] knew perfectly well that there never had been more corrupt elections than had been submitted to in the State and City of New-York. He believed that the last election, in at least three Southern States, had been an absolute farce. He believed that the cheating on both sides had been so absolutely universal that it was impossible to determine where the real truth lay. It was, therefore, worse than boys' play for any one to indulge in threats under such circumstances.

The time allowed for general discussion having closed, the consideration of the bill by paragraphs was proceeded with. Without disposing of the bill, the committee rose, and the House, at 4:55, adjourned.

AMERICAN AND FOREIGN SHIPPING.

ENTRANCES AND CLEARANCES AT THE CUSTOM-HOUSE DURING LAST YEAR—THE COASTWISE TRADE.

The Collector of the Port of New-York has just made up his statements of the foreign and coastwise traffic for the past year, from which are compiled the following summaries. The first table gives the comparative numbers of foreign and American vessels engaged in foreign commerce.

	—AMERICAN.—		—FOREIGN.—
	Entrances.	Clearances.	Entrances.	Clearances.
January	165	232	138	241
February	154	170	157	152

PANIC IN A SCHOOL-HOUSE.

AN ALARM OF FIRE AND A RUSH FOR THE STAIRS—COOL CONDUCT OF TEACHERS.

From the Cincinnati Commercial Jan. 19.

The practicability of the drill exercise for the purpose of emptying school-rooms in order and safety in case of fire, was shown in a false alarm of fire which was raised in the Thirteenth District School in this city yesterday. The janitor put on a rousing fire in the furnace, set the iron flue red-hot and created a panic among the children. In the Primary Department, in the upper part of the building, there was a panic, and the rush of the little children for the stairways created a noise that frightened the older children below, and caused a similar panic there. In the rush on the stairs of the Primary Department children, one little girl, it appears, was thrown down, and suffered a broken leg. Mr. August Bode, Principal of the school, furnishes the following account:

Yesterday morning, shortly after 11 o'clock, there was a little stampede in the Thirteenth District School, on Findlay, near Vine, caused by the cry of "fire," uttered by a nervous little girl in the Fourth Reader, who happened to see the stove-pipe get red-hot. As soon as the cry was heard the whole class rushed for the doors, and there being four doors in the room the teacher had no means to stem the current of excited children. The adjoining rooms hearing the cry, and being also provided with three or four doors, stampeded too, but no panic was limited to five room. In the remaining 18 rooms the teachers succeeded in keeping the young ones in their seats, and they went on with their lessons almost uninterrupted. Happily, none of the stampeding children, although rushing down from the third floor, were injured. This was mostly owing to the energy of the teachers, who, though not able to check the stampede, succeeded in retarding the movements sufficiently to prevent accidents.

The news spread through the district, causing quite a commotion, and a rush of mothers, fathers, &c., making it more difficult to keep them from coming in than it had been to keep the children from coming out. The Principal thought it advisable under the circumstances to dismiss the lower grades, to assure the parents that nothing had happened to their little ones. The work in the other rooms continued as usual, and even the two rooms in which the alarm originated were, ten minutes afterward, again fully organized and busy at their lessons.

A SHIPWRECKED MAN'S SUIT.

The San Francisco Call of Jan. 12 says: "The attention of the United States District Court was occupied yesterday with the trial of the libel suit of Thomas Murray against George F. Fake to recover $10,000 for injuries suffered by plaintiff while on board the steam-ship Ventura, on the 20th day of April, 1875. It appears from the complaint that the defendant was master of the vessel, and received the plaintiff as passenger for Santa Barbara. It is alleged that on the evening of the 20th of April the steamer ran upon the rocks at Point Sur, and became a total wreck, and that on account of such wreck the plaintiff was seriously injured in person and goods. His baggage, consisting of one trunk containing clothes of the value of $200, was totally lost, and in escaping from the steamer he was subjected to cold which resulted in sickness. The loss of the vessel was owing entirely to the gross negligence and unskillfulness of the master. The Captain, in his defense, admits the wrecking of the vessel, but claims that no blame was attached to any one."

LAW REPORTS.

WATERY REAL ESTATE.

A CURIOUS STORY CONNECTED WITH A SUIT FOR $25,000 DAMAGES—HOW A LAW FIRM WAS FORMED AND BROKEN UP—LOTS MAPPED OUT UNDER THE WATER OF THE BAY AND SOLD.

A rather interesting story forms part of the history of the case of John D. Monell against John D. Higgins, a decision in which was given by Judge Joseph F. Daly, in the Special Term of the Court of Common Pleas, yesterday. It appears that about five years ago the defendant endeavored to establish his son Frank in the law business. The latter met with Monell, who is a rather elderly lawyer, and they formed a partnership and opened an office in this City. Monell was a man of plausible address and pretty well versed in practice. The defendant, as he says, advanced $2,500 to his son for the purpose of helping him along. This money, as is claimed, was invested in the purchase of elegant office furniture for the law firm of Higgins & Monell. For a time everything seemed to thrive. Young Higgins claimed afterward that Monell's business was not a legitimate one, but was devoted to the getting up, and sale of bogus lots of real estate. Monell also acred, as is claimed, as the accommodating Notary of the Sachs in their enormous fraudulent real estate transactions in New Jersey, the exposures of which created so great an excitement about three years ago. Frank Higgins claimed that he became disgusted with Monell on finding out this state of affairs, and that he broke up the firm in consequence. Monell denied this; but, no matter what the true story of the firm's dissolution, John D. Higgins stepped in, after his son left the firm, and seized the furniture, safe, and books of the office. He claimed that these belonged to him, having been purchased with his money. Criminal proceedings on both sides followed this step, and after they had subsided Monell brought the present action to recover $25,000 for the damage caused by the breaking up of his business. Before the suit proceeded very far, however, a suit was brought against Monell and another which let in quite a flood of light on some transactions in water lots, in which Monell seems to have figured very prominently. The suit referred to was brought by James Shea and Ellen Kiley who had been the owners of the steam-boat Pope Catlin. They claimed they had been induced to exchange their boat for bogus lots in New Jersey, claimed to be owned by one Michael Larkin. Monell was said to be a confederate of the latter, and was the attorney who made the searches and furnished an abstract of the title of the lots. In this abstract of title the lots were put down with reference to a map filed in the office of the Clerk of Hudson County, N. J. An investigation was had, and resulted in the ascertainment of the fact that such a map had really been filed among the records, and, as was asserted, that this had been done by Monell himself. On this map several hundred lots, beautifully arranged in all the glory of red and black ink shading, were apparent. The lots were properly numbered and laid out into blocks. Everything about the map itself seemed satisfactory, but a comparison of it with the contessedly genuine ones on record disclosed the fact that the lots purporting to have been sold to Shea and Mrs. Kiley were in reality about 1,500 feet away from the shore—under the water of New-York Bay, and, of course, could not be owned by Larkin. After the discovery of these facts, Shea's suit was vigorously prosecuted, and was brought to trial. On the trial Larkin claimed that he had been deceived by Monell into purchasing the lots, but that he had disposed of them to Shea and Mrs. Kiley without knowing they were under water. Monell claimed that he had been deceived by the map in the office of the Register of Hudson County, and that the chain of title seemed complete. Mr. Shea, it will be remembered, was discharged because the Sheriff's liability had been discharged by reason of the plaintiff's negligence.

A case containing machine silk twist, valued at $700, was stolen from the sidewalk, Wednesday evening, in front of the office of the New-York and New-England Express Company, at the corner of West Broadway and Duane street. The case was consigned to Belden Bros. & Co., No. 510 Broadway, for a Boston firm. Detective Maloney, of the Seventh Precinct, arrested Ellen Smith, of No. 103 Madison street, and George Davis, of Myrtle avenue, Brooklyn, on suspicion of being implicated in the robbery, and they were arraigned before Justice Wandell, at the Essex Market Police Court, yesterday. They were held in $5,000 bail.

IMPORTANT DECISION IN BANKRUPTCY.

Judge Blatchford rendered an important decision yesterday in the matter of the bankruptcy of Steinweg & Plaut. The latter, it appears, effected a composition in bankruptcy which was confirmed on March 6, 1875. C. F. Dambman & Co. were one of their creditors, and at the time refused to take the composition notes, they claiming that other creditors obtained more. They, however, took no proceeding to interfere with the carrying out of the composition until April 11, 1876, when they filed a petition in the United States District Court asking that the settlement be set aside for the reason that others were preferred, and that signatures had been fraudulently obtained to the compromise paper. An order of reference was granted to the clerk to take proof thereon on notice to the debtors and their creditors. No steps were taken under the petition and order, and no notice was given of it until Dec. 14, 1876, when the petitioners caused a day to be fixed for the hearing and issued notices of the reference. The debtors then being for the first time apprised of these proceedings, applied to the court for a dismissal of the same, on the ground that the creditor had been guilty of delay in not prosecuting them at once; that by reason of such negligence the debtors had incurred new obligations which would be imperiled by the proceedings attempted to be instituted; and also that the debtors, in case the compromise were set aside, could not be restored to their former position. Attempts were made to excuse this delay on the part of the attorney for the petitioning creditors. The court, however, held that the same was inexcusable and granted the motion dismissing the proceedings. Blumenstiel & Ascher appeared for the debtors, and Rudolph Samter for the petitioning creditor.

A CHILD BURGLAR.

Timothy Maloney, a boy 8 years old, was charged at the Tombs Police Court yesterday with having broken the plate glass window of the confectionery store of B. F. Adams, No. 62 Fulton street, about 1 o'clock yesterday morning, and stealing $20 worth of candy, a portion of which was found on him while he was attempting to escape. He confessed his guilt when arrested. He was arraigned on the charge of burglary, and an effort was made on the part of his counsel, who called the boy's mother, to show that the boy was only 7 years old, and could not, therefore, under the law, be held on a charge of burglary, but the mother's own statement showed that he was over seven years of age, and he was held for the action of the Grand Jury. A great effort was made to enlist the sympathy of the court for the boy, but it appeared from statements made by Mr. Adams that he belonged to a bad gang, who had broken Mr. Adams' windows three times and stolen candies, and that the damage on the last occasion amounted to nearly $300. Judge Otterbourg said that a boy who could do such an act after midnight was better in the care of the law than at home, and that he would leave the disposition of the case with District Attorney Phelps.

KINGS COUNTY SURROGATE'S COURT.

The following is a record of the business transacted in the Kings County Surrogate's Court during the past week before Hon. W. L. Livingstone, Surrogate:

Wills Proved.—Francis Kelly, of the town of New-Lots; Lars Brolander, Thomas West, John B. Beckermann, Robert Merrill, Robert C. Chumasero, and Bridget Shirr, all of the City of Brooklyn.

Letters of Administration—Were granted in the estates of the following named deceased persons, viz.: Robert H. Hance, of Rumson, Monmouth County, N. J.; Dennis Shine, Henry Ralphs, Nicolas Gerken, Susannah Teck, formerly Susannah Irwin; Louisa J. De Nyse, To sonby M. Chartres, Dorotha Niedhard, formerly Dorotha Biermann; Henry Sohl, Joseph O'Neil, Jacob B. Jones, Kenneth Melin, John Elvin, Catharine Heller, James H. Hughes, Jacob F. Hitzeiberger, Robert Burton, Noah T. Lewis, Walter W. Creech, all of the City of Brooklyn.

Williamson and Maria Williamson, to Eliza Williamson, all of the town of New-Lots.

WHERE THE CITY MUST BE SUED.

Some time ago the Mahopac Land Company commenced a suit against the City, and applied to Judge J. F. Barnard at Poughkeepsie for an injunction to restrain the Department of Public Works from drawing any water from Lake Mahopac. The motion was opposed by the City on the ground of the title of the people

The report that the Republican surrender, which is dignified with the title of the Electoral bill, will be hurried through the Senate with all possible speed is not at all surprising. Mr. EDMUNDS' speech, yesterday, is equivalent to a confession that the merits of the bill will not endure the thorough discussion which the importance of the questions involved clearly demands. He does not assign reasons; he cites, simply, a sentiment that is delusive and a patriotism that is fictitious. He does not grapple with objections; he exaggerates the grounds of fear and encourages a hopefulness for which there is slight foundation outside of his own mind. What more likely, then, that a measure thus inherently weak shall be guarded jealously from the criticism that would expose its defects and bring to bear upon it the intelligent judgment of the people? It must be rushed through Congress, or in its present shape it will fail. If from any cause time be obtained for an expression of the popular will, we believe that the declarations against the measure will be so overwhelming as to compel its advocates to essentially change its provisions.

Mr. THURMAN'S argument in support of the power which is to be vested in the proposed tribunal has not the merit either of candor or ingenuity. It will act in "a semi-ministerial, and not in an executive capacity," in determining the result, he is said to have contended in the Democratic caucus yesterday. But this is a puerile evasion of the real difficulty that controls those who profess to delegate to a commission a duty which the Constitution makes binding elsewhere, and to clothe the commission with an authority which Congress itself does not possess. In the first place, it is evident that unless the commission be both judicial and executive—judicial as regards the investigation of circumstances connected with the election of Electors, and executive as regards the practical enforcement of the result arrived at by the majority of the Judges in the commission—nothing would be gained by its intervention. It must be invested with the widest latitude, or its creation will be a farce. And its decision must be binding upon Congress, or the whole of the labor which is to be imposed upon the commission will be wasted.

When brought face to face with this fact, the more outspoken Democrats reveal the secret of whatever distrust exists among themselves in regard to the measure. They are frank enough to confess that they are unwilling to part with the power they claim for the House, solely because they don't know whether the exercise of this delegated power will, in the end, operate favorably or disastrously to Democratic interests. If they could be sure that the effect of the unconstitutional action of an extra-Constitutional commission would be to seat Mr. TILDEN in the Presidency, their other scruples would vanish. If, on the other hand, they incur the obloquy incident to yielding the power which, according to their view, belongs to the House, and after all lose the Presidency, their anger would know no bounds. There is a charming simplicity in the declaration attributed to a Democratic Senator upon this point. The condition of the party's acquiescence in a declaration of the commission adverse to the Democratic candidates is, he says, that the fifth Judge to be selected be not a Republican, or that the action of the tribunal be not determined by a party vote of its members. On this principle, the commission will be valueless as a peace-maker.

The contingency thus foreshadowed is worth thinking about by those who assign the business exigencies of the country as a reason for the acceptance of the measure before the Senate. The anxiety of the traders and manufacturers—of all, in truth, who suffer from the prolonged depression of industrial and trading interests—is sufficiently intelligible. Equally so is their readiness to accept any settlement of the present political difficulties which seems to offer a chance of the improvement they naturally desire. Timidity, however, is seldom a safe guide when partisan complications are concerned. There is, no doubt, a time to yield as well as a time to resist, but the former rarely occurs in the midst of intense political excitement. The folly of supposing otherwise was again and again exemplified during the conflict with the Slave power. Each recurring "compromise" was supported on the ground that business interests required it, and the effect of each surrender was to beget new demands. Courage is essential to true wisdom, and the mere possibility of obtaining a satisfactory settlement of existing troubles is not a reason for exposing the country to the risk of a great wrong in the name of law.

It is a wholesome sign that the press generally refuses to accept inquiries into the affairs of life insurance companies by committees appointed in their own behalf, as a substitute for the exhaustive investigation which the Insurance Department is bound to make. The value of opinions as to management expressed by citizens of large experience and high standing is unquestionable. But it is necessarily limited to the range over which the direct personal supervision of the gentlemen in question extends. They must accept without question many of the statements submitted to them, and their knowledge cannot be expected to extend to the details of the business by which its true condition must be judged. Hence, the reasonableness of the demand that the Superintendent at Albany shall not allow these volunteered examinations to take the place of the exhaustive scrutiny which is in every case needed for the restoration of public confidence. The companies that cry out most loudly against his interference are the companies that should first receive his attention.

THE UNCONSTITUTIONAL PLAN.

From a constitutional point of view, the position of the Republican Party in relation to the count of Electoral votes is impregnable. The lawfully-attested returns from the States give the Presidency to HAYES. The returns from the States that have been disputed are favorable to him. The only possible chance of altering the result turns upon the exercise of an authority at variance with the Constitution and fatal to the rights of States in matters over which their jurisdiction is, within certain limits, complete. To effect any change beneficial to Mr. TILDEN, it is necessary to usurp powers that belong exclusively to the Returning Boards, and to reopen a scrutiny which has been legally closed. The proceedings of the House investigating committees, and especially the proceedings of Mr. MORRISON'S Louisiana committee, leave no doubt as to the purpose they are intended to serve. They can accomplish nothing for their party except by sitting in judgment upon the Returning Boards, violating the conditions of the authority exercised by the boards, and so manipulating the returns as to impart efficacy to the frauds that have been eliminated. The arrest of members of the Louisiana board for refusing to acknowledge the pretensions of the House committee indicate the intent of that body. Under the guise of investigating circumstances connected with the election, it is asserting a right to "go behind the returns" and make out a case for the rejection by the House of the Electoral vote as declared by the Returning Board.

The line of action marked out for the House by the more extreme of the Democratic leaders implies the same disposition to assail the Louisiana Electoral vote. The bogus count made by the Democratic committee of the State, and indorsed by the bogus Legislature which sustains the pretensions of NICHOLLS to the Governorship, forms the basis of a contestant Electoral vote. Its worthlessness is too apparent to admit of serious argument. But in conjunction with the Morrison attack upon the Returning Board, and the majorities assigned to the Republican Electors, it might serve as a pretext for a refusal by the House to acquiesce in the reception of the vote of the State. Then would come the contingency contemplated by Mr. CLARKSON N. POTTER, and other champions of the extraordinary powers claimed for the House. An attempt to exercise these powers would fail, of course. Firmness in the discharge of his constitutional duty by the President of the Senate, with the support which he would be entitled to look for at the hands of the Senate, would obviate serious difficulty. The great body of the people are on the side of the Constitution and the law, and both being in this case favorable to the authority of the President of the Senate, his declaration of the result would be accepted as decisive. The Democratic extremists might proclaim their discontent till they were hoarse, but the election of HAYES would be effectually removed from the field of controversy.

In anticipation of this result, and under the influence of the opposition which the schemes of the Democratic ultraists encountered from more moderate members of their own party, the House sanctioned the proposal for the appointment of a committee to act in conjunction with a Senate committee in devising arrangements for the final count. From the first two things were clear: The composition of the Senate committee forbade the expectation that it would uphold the simple method of conducting the count which the Constitution suggests and long usage has sanctioned; the temper evinced by the House majority, and by the Speaker in nominating the controlling proportion of its committee, showed that the intention was to agree in presenting only such a scheme as should in its working confer upon the Democratic candidate advantages which he could not otherwise hope to obtain. The question therefore arises, To what extent has the latter purpose been fulfilled? On its face, the plan is a surrender of the vantage ground which the organic law and tolerably consistent experience have conferred upon the Republicans in the present aspect of the contest. Any possible gain accruing to them from what we are told is an "amicable adjustment of difficulties," is more than counterbalanced by the sacrifice of a tenable position and the creation of a precedent that may hereafter multiply difficulties of a more formidable character. On the other hand, the Democrats profit by the removal of the check which the Constitution presents to the consummation of their schemes for excluding the Louisiana vote, and by leaving wide open the question whether the judicial members of the commission may not go beyond technical points and judge of the qualifications of the Electors in a way that would be fatal to one of the clearest rights of the States.

This interpretation of the motive and aim of the majority in the House is not flattering. It assumes that with them partisanship is stronger than patriotism, and that their real object is to effect a bargain in the name of compromise, under which their liability to loss shall be represented by a cipher, while their chances of gain are increased considerably. Whether they carry out their alleged desire, and insist upon naming the five Judges to whom the determination of the controverted votes shall be referred, or not, they may well rest satisfied with the vagueness of the terms employed to define the duties and powers of the commission. They understand the jealousy with which the country would regard any attempt to invest the commission with authority wide enough to secure a revision of the counts which underlie the certificates of the Electors, and for this reason the function is not specifically indicated. The bill as reported virtually provides for the exercise of the power without making that exercise obligatory. This is the next best thing for the Democrats. There are supporters of the measure who declare that if the provision we refer to is susceptible of a construction under which the commission may assert the power claimed for the House, and go behind the election of Electors, they will oppose it as a dangerous innovation. Let them bring the question to an issue by trying to amend the bill in this respect. Let them propose to set all doubt at rest by defining the limits within which the inquiries of the commission shall be confined, and by explicitly forbidding the exercise of the power objected to. We shall then know whether the suspicious evasiveness of this portion of the bill is or is not a condition exacted by the Democrats as part of the price of their support. The necessity for some decisive test is not lessened by the declaration with which a certain member of the Senate Committee is credited—that every sentence of the bill has been so carefully balanced, and so nicely adjusted, that it must be accepted as it is or not at all. In our judgment the bill as it stands will do more harm than good. The evils that may flow from it far outweigh any possible benefit which it may produce. But, at any rate, we are entitled to know what its promoters really mean with reference to the powers to be vested in the commission.

HOW TO EARN A HOME.

If ever a politico-economical history of this country be written, the most remarkable fact which should attract the investigator, should be the success of the "Building and Loan" Associations of Philadelphia. Our attention has again been called to these remarkable enterprises, originated and exclusively carried on by the working men themselves, by a new annual report of one among numerous others, the "Artisans' Building and Loan Association." This report is the seventh annual statement, and is particularly interesting, as showing the working of these societies in the hardest business year since 1857. During the past year in New-York, as we well know, various savings banks have yielded to the times or have failed to really earn even a 6 per cent. profit; life insurance companies have broken down, and the oldest banks have often had to draw on their surplus to pay 8 or 10 per cent. dividends. Private individuals have had exceeding difficulty to make both ends meet, and many a merchant has drawn on his capital for his yearly expenses. How have the working men of Philadelphia managed their little loan and building companies, designed especially to secure each member a home, during this depressed year? So far as is known, not a single company—though millions of capital are invested in them—has failed.

In this particular company, which, so far as we know, is no way distinguished from the others, during seven years of business, with a property accumulated now of over $275,000 in bonds and mortgages, only six members have lost their houses, (partly paid for,) and have been compelled to leave them in the hands of the association. That is, six members have paid each year toward their homesteads about the same sum they would have to pay for rent in a tenement house, and then, unable to meet their monthly dues, have been obliged to deed their properties to the society. This is certainly a remarkable show. Moreover, during the past year the working men in this Artisans' Association have done a business of $91,597, at an expense of only $846 34. They disbursed for loans on bonds and mortgages $48,800, and made a total gain in premiums of $12,581. There are 3,263 shares in the company, and the large number canceled or forfeited during the year—642—shows how hard pressed many of the members were, and that they could not wait for their profits. There are now, however, in the various series 449 shareholders, and the aggregate property is valued at $308,161. With all the difficulties of the year, the depreciation of real estate, the lack of business, and the necessity for working men to consume their savings, this association was enabled to make an average profit of 12 per cent. Few banks in this City have done so well.

It should be remembered that this business success represents an important economical change—the gradual obtaining of homes by working men through their own savings and ingenuity. The great bulk of these members, by paying monthly premiums and installments on loans, in sums not much larger than they would otherwise pay for rent, are now fee-holders, and will soon have homes unincumbered. They are raised in the economical and political scale by the fact that they own their own houses, and all their business faculties are improved and many good habits implanted by the process through which they acquired them. There is no mystery about the Philadelphia building associations, though one would think there must be, from the difficulty of transporting them to New-York. Were there leaders of the working classes here of any sort of intelligence, they would long ago have tried a similar system in this City. Instead of uttering frothy declamations against "property," they would have attempted to make their brethren property-holders. This great economical movement has sprinkled the suburbs of Philadelphia with mechanics' and working men's homes. It has invested millions of money in the safest way, and rendered our sister city a model town for the condition of the working classes. A similar movement ought to do much here, but it must come from the working men and be managed by them. It must be no gift from a more fortunate class.

The secret of its success is first its economy. The expenses of the "bank" we are describing were $346 the past year. Look, in contrast, at the savings banks of this City—apart from salaries and incidentals. The magnificent and costly buildings of many of them must be an enormous burden on the depositors. Such palaces cannot be built without the earnings being diminished, which ought to come to the poor who are stockholders. Then, in the building associations, money is turned over and over, loaned and reloaned with the best security, and to persons who have the strongest moral inducement to repay. The long experience, too, of the working classes of the Pennsylvania city has taught them how to manage these loans, and how to arrange the machinery of the various "series" of shares, with their installments, fines, and ultimate redemption, in the ways which shall be at once safest and most profitable. It is a business which the leaders of the Philadelphia artisans have well learned. The obvious objection that New-York has not a sufficiency of cheap land to make a field for the labors of such associations is met by the reply that land need not necessarily be divided into plots of 100 feet by 25, and that small lots in Westchester, Long Island, and New-Jersey, within half an hour of the City, can be obtained as cheap as in the suburbs of our sister city. What is needed is the intelligence and the economy which should begin and carry out the experiment.

NEW TERRORS OF DIVORCE.

Some years ago a literary man identified with the Pacific slope disagreed so unfailingly with his wife, whom, with more romance than reason, he had married forty-eight hours after first seeing her, that he sought and obtained a divorce on the ground of irrepressible discordance of disposition. He was quite happy over his release until he had learned, many months later, that she was intending to lecture through the West on the subject of her late husband's defects and peculiarities. After the divorce he had flashed into considerable reputation, which was no doubt the cause of the ex-wife's new and unexpected enterprise. She carried it out, too; delivering her marital discourse in divers cities and towns, and getting reported in the newspapers. It is not likely that she made much money by her public recitals; but she had a far higher satisfaction than gold can give—the satisfaction of revenge—inestimably precious to the soul of a woman who believes herself slighted or aggrieved.

It may be readily imagined that the husband did not enjoy the dissection. Where is the man who would enjoy it? Certainly not in literature, whose representatives are proverbially thin-skinned. The disunited author might have endured downright abuse, thinking that the public would consider it merely the scolding of an angry and malevolent woman. But he could not be stoical or indifferent to a remorseless analysis of what she declared to be his weaknesses and peccadilloes. She assailed him where we all feel most vulnerable—on the side of his privacy. She entered into details of his home life; she pronounced him a sham; she held him up to ridicule; she rendered him wretched by puncturing his self-love with satirical needles so long as she could induce any one to hear her or to print what she said. There is no reason to believe that she was exact in statement. Probably she did not care to be; her object was not so much to tell the truth as to insure annoyance, and in this she was signally successful. She made her former liege feel more than once, it is to be presumed, that existence was onerous and the feminine tongue a poisoner of the surest peace. She wanted revenge, and she got it in overflowing measure.

The unfortunate example of that audacious and spiteful woman is to be imitated, it seems. Several divorced wives in different parts of the country, according to newspaper announcement, are preparing to lecture on the evils and woes of matrimony, drawing their illustrations, of course, from their own experience, and presenting their recent lords as terrible warnings. These lords happen to be in public or semi-public life—many of their acts and characteristics are known—consequently, even general allusions and examples will be understood as referring to them. What an opportunity is thus afforded for direful retaliation! Where is the woman of average capacity, smarting under actual or imaginary wrong, who could not, as a public lecturer, make her quondam husband wish that he had never been born? The ability of neglected or irritated wives to inflict torment as private lecturers has been deeply felt and widely advertised. Who shall measure their torturing power after they have thrown off connubial restraints and mounted the rostrum to proclaim their injuries and describe the injurer?

Intrepid indeed must be the man who could contemplate such a possibility without blenching. Does not the prospect of a divorced wife lecturing upon marriage, and him who has been married, inevitably add new and unspeakable terrors to divorce? What are the new horrors lent to death by obituaries or biographies compared with this? The frequency of divorce in this country has been the source of grave apprehension and profound regret among many good people, and they have puzzled their brains to devise means of preventing it. Here is a means ready to hand—a means which no philosopher would have hit upon. No thanks to lecturing wives that have been or are to be. Their purpose may be ill, but their effect must be good; illustrating the principle, so often demonstrated, of general beneficence from particular harm. The natural dread of any husband that his consort might, after release from conjugal vows, take to lecturing on her wedded experiences and her knowledge of him, would render him heroically patient of any differences of opinion, taste, or temperament that might be developed between them. Such dread would be apt to make him conservative as well as amiable, causing him to hesitate long and reflect soberly before taking a step which should enroll his relinquished spouse among the anti-matrimonial orators of the lyceum. The fear of something after divorce, and infinitely worse than divorce, should make divorce most terrible.

The question of marriage is already beset with difficulties and dangers, and the contingency of feminine discourses following upon separation would be a seriously deterring cause. If these should become common, as they threaten to, contracts would be drawn up with a special clause providing that, in the event of divorce, the woman shall solemnly bind herself not to speak in public on any topic connected with her late unhappy experiences of her late unhappy condition with her late unhappy spouse. Years of ordinary intimacy cannot so reveal men and women to one another as a few months of marriage. This is almost the sole state in which shams and shifts are wholly laid aside, and the denuding of the innermost being which it involves should insure the sacredness of silence. The last words of those who have loved and parted have long been treasured, idealized, and sung. The time may be coming when such words shall be few and simple, but eloquent in their fewness and simplicity; when the heart's tragedy shall be thus expressed: "Farewell, my once adored, my much detested now; remember, no lectures!"

A CURIOUS SCRAP OF HISTORY.

Among antiquaries and historians there has for a long time been some discussion as to what nation first saluted the American flag. As in this case salutation was recognition, the point has some historical importance. To-day, the Stars and Stripes receive the respect and salutation of every civilized nation on the globe. There was a time when the flag was a novelty in commerce, and when it was only natural that men should look upon it as representing an experiment in affairs which was most likely to end in ruin. Who was the first to give recognition to that parti-colored bunting, the emblem of a new sovereignty in the West? Mr. B. F. PRESCOTT, candidate for Governor of New-Hampshire, and present efficient Secretary of State in that Commonwealth, has answered this question in a manner which reflects credit upon his patriotic industry and satisfactorily disposes of all doubts.

In the State-house at Concord, N. H., there hangs an antique portrait of one JOHANNES DE GRAEF, whilom Governor of St. Eustatius, one of the Dutch West India Islands. The picture was presented to the State of New-Hampshire in 1837, by one F. W. CRAGIN, residing in Surinam, South America, but a native of New-Hampshire. It was said to be a portrait of the first foreign magistrate who formally recognized the flag of the American Republic. The painting represents the Dutch Governor in his official dress, erect and dignified, and holding in his hand the American dispatches which announced the birth of the new Republic. There is extant a tradition that the flag was first saluted by a French Admiral, in Quiberon Bay, coast of Brittany, as it was borne at the mast-head of the Ranger, commanded by PAUL JONES. And it is certain that that redoubtable sea-rover did first carry to sea the flag of stripes and stars which was authorized by Congress June 14, 1777, and which date corresponds with that of PAUL JONES' commission. But the legend which attaches to the portrait of JOHANNES DE GRAEF moved Mr. PRESCOTT to send to The Hague for documentary evidence concerning the career and actions of that eminent worthy. The result of the inquiry is embodied in a pamphlet in which we have ample proof that the first salute to the American flag was given from a Dutch fort in the harbor of St. Eustatius, by order of the Governor, JOHANNES DE GRAEF, Nov. 16, 1776, and that the ensign so honored was displayed from the peak of the brigantine Andrew Doria, of Baltimore, Maryland, in the American colonies.

In the Dutch archives, or "Nederlandsche Jaerbocken," at The Hague, Mr. JAMES BIRNEY, United States Minister at that point, found the record in which is preserved this interesting scrap of history. From this veracious and official narrative we learn that after the breaking out of the rebellion in the American colonies, there was a general belief that in the West Indian harbors other than British, American privateers found comfort, assistance, and supplies. Mr. CHRISTER GREATHEAD, Commander of the British Island of St. Christopher, heard that a certain North American brigantine had been supplied at St. Eustatius, and that the brigantine Andrew Doria, manned by a hundred men or thereabouts, and carrying fourteen double-fortified four-pounders, had entered the Dutch fort of Orange, and that the said fort had replied with thirteen shots, the same being the number corresponding to that of the revolted colonies. In high dudgeon, the worshipful Commander GREATHEAD addressed a letter to Commander JOHANNES DE GRAEF, remonstrating against this insult to "his Britannical Majesty." To this DE GRAEF replied, under date of Dec. 23, 1776, denying that any piratical vessels had received aid or comfort at St. Eustatius. As to the salute to the Andrew Doria, the sturdy Dutch Governor said: "I flatter myself that, if my masters exact it, I shall be able to give such an account as shall be satisfactory." There was other correspondence on the subject, and Commander GREATHEAD collected several affidavits to show that the commandant at the Dutch port of Orange hesitated as to what reply to make to the audacious salute of the North American brigantine, but, at the express command of DE GRAEF, he did fire thirteen shots in honor of the Stars and Stripes as they floated from the peak of the Andrew Doria. Among these affidavits was one from JOHN TROTMAN, who swore that he was a pupil of Dr. JOHN WITHERSPOON, one of the members of the Continental Congress, from the Province of New-Jersey; that he was an impressed seaman of the Andrew Doria, and that the salute was fired as alleged; and, further, that the errand of the brigantine at St. Eustatius was to buy clothing and other necessary articles for the use of the Continental Army.

These proofs were transmitted to Sir Knight YORK, English Ambassador to the Dutch Republic, and he laid them before the High and Mighty States General, with the statement that he had been ordered to "demand of the High and Mighty Government a formal disavowal of the salute rendered to the aforesaid brigantine by the fort of Orange, in St. Eustatius, and the discharge and recall of the Governor, DE GRAEF." To this Count VON WELDEREN, the Dutch Ambassador, replied in behalf of the States General that an examination should proceed in the case, and that the Government would "cut off from it all delays and all tediousness; and to this purpose their High and Mighty have given up the ordinary form used in such cases." The upshot of it all was that Commander DE GRAEF was cited to appear before the States General to answer. He impleaded the tediousness of the voyage and his liability to seasickness. The order for his return was made more peremptory. But there was neither steam-ship nor ocean cable in those days; and when, in 1778, the Governor reached Holland, France had acknowledged the independence of the American colonies. Other nations soon followed. The offense off DE GRAEF was no longer a solitary one, and the complaint against him was lost sight of and forgotten.

It was fitting that the first salute to the American Republic in a foreign port should have been given by Holland, so long the refuge of constitutional liberty and republicanism in Europe. The sturdy Dutch Governor who thus early took the responsibility is long since dead. Only a casual inquiry recalls his name and gives new interest to his darkening portrait in New-Hampshire. The craft whose brilliant bit of bunting was the symbol of a new sovereignty has sailed into oblivious seas; the Dutch Republic has vanished from the map of Europe. But the Flag is known and honored in every land beneath the sun.

THE ROMAN CHURCH AND LIBERTY OF CONSCIENCE.

A small pamphlet, treating on a very large subject, "Liberty of Conscience and Ultramontanism," has just been issued, and apart from the ever-deepening interest in this very "live" topic, the pamphlet claims attention by reason of its literary and logical merits, and as an exposition of the two sides of the controversy by two distinguished Roman Ultramontanes who hold firmly the doctrine of the infallibility of the Pope. The champion of "Liberty of Conscience" is Mr. GEORGE MIVART, a distinguished naturalist, author of a great work on Contemporary Evolution, and his antagonist, a writer in the Dublin Review, a periodical which is directly inspired by Cardinal CULLEN, and is now the recognized organ of the most extreme section of the Ultramontane Party of the Roman Catholic Church. When GLADSTONE published his famous pamphlet on the infallibility question, pamphlets laudatory, condemnatory, controversial, and simply abusive, were issued by the dozen. He was answered by no less distinguished champions of Ultramontanism than Cardinal MANNING, Mgr. CAPEL, and the still more illustrious Father NEWMAN. There ran through the arguments put forth in every one of those pamphlets a labored and essentially Jesuitical attempt to avoid the logical issue of the effect of a rigid and persistent application of the doctrine in every department of human thought. The writer of the article from the Dublin Review before us has no such scruples. He grapples his subject squarely; sees his way clearly, and rides down Mr. MIVART'S tottering, illogical positions with the coarse exultation of a controversial Juggernaut. Such an antagonist is scarcely worthy of the attention of such a man as MIVART, but the public cannot but benefit by a contemplation of so unequal an intellectual duel. We use the word unequal as explaining the relative stand-points of the two antagonists. The champion of Ultramontanism, in its most uncompromising aspect, plants his foot on a divine decree, and backs up against the solid rock of the infallible Church. MIVART is willing to stand on the same ground, but rests upon the slippery rocks of "reason and freedom of conscience," which are in their very nature antagonistic to the dogma of Papal infallibility.

The writer in the Dublin Review boldly declares that "a Catholic's freedom of conscience is grievously impaired by the civil tolerance of other religions," and again that there is hardly any duty of the civil ruler more august and sacred than the preservation to the people, as far as possible, of their liberty of conscience, (in the sense named,) and protecting them from intellectual temptation. This great duty, putting aside such a country as Spain, is performed with deplorable inefficiency in modern Europe. The same bold writer further advances that "it is the proper course of the Catholic Englishman to stimulate and influence the existent national hatred of Atheism; to foster purposely in his countrymen those views and principles which would lead them—in the event of such a sect making vigorous aggression—to clamor loudly for its forcible repression and to sympathize intensely with what penal laws may be enacted for its chastisement." There is a boldness about this writer's method of upholding the infallibility decree which is quite refreshing, but even he shrinks from grappling with the logical consequences of his own dogmatic assertions or interpretations of the decrees of his Church. If it is the duty of English Catholics, enjoined by the very voice of GOD speaking through man, to persecute Atheists, it is clearly the duty of Catholics in a Catholic country to persecute unto death Protestants. There is no getting out of this difficulty, and the writer indicates very clearly what he thinks about it by his reference to Spain. Throughout his remarkable article there runs the uncontrollable spirit of the intolerant inquisitor and his contempt for the "logical reconcilers of the dogma of infallibility with reason and freedom of conscience" is only too pronounced. That his interpretation of the Church's decrees is the only logical one need not be argued. It is an interpretation which reconciles infallible utterances and decrees with those frightful acts of persecution which darken the page of history from the time the Church became the great dominant power in the world. It is an interpretation which would, in the name of GOD and love, and truth and justice, justify the rekindling of the fires of inquisition, and the torturing of the Mivarts, the Wallaces, (both Catholics,) and Tyndalls of the present day.

A NEW RAILROAD IN LOWER CALIFORNIA.

SAN FRANCISCO, Jan. 20.—A San Diego dispatch says a company is being formed there to build a railroad to Yuma, on the direct line of the Texas Pacific. The Government will be asked to grant the same aid given other roads. A meeting will be held to-night to consider the question.

THE FINE ARTS.

PAINTINGS AT THE LENOX LIBRARY.

SOME OF SIR JOSHUA REYNOLDS' CREATIONS—PORTRAITS BY AMERICAN PAINTERS—TWO OF TURNER'S PAINTINGS—HORACE VERNET AND PAUL DELAROCHE.

(Second Notice.)

The superintendent of the little gallery of paintings at the Lenox Library has endeavored to unite some of the modern requirements as to picture-hanging. It will be noticed that he has tried to place together the works of the same man, so far as was compatible with other demands. The "Saint Cecilia," whose charms we endeavored to give some expression to in the course of a notice printed the other day, is flanked by other creations of the great Sir Joshua's brush. Among them we would like to call particular attention to that on the right, No. 103, being merely the portrait of a boy. He is dressed in a dark red velvet coat, and leans forward over a green cushion. He holds a pen and paper in his hand. The charm of this picture cannot well be described; it must be seen to be felt, but it is not hazardous to affirm that, after working back on one's own impressions and the technical qualities of the painting, one will bring up at last on the personality of Sir Joshua Reynolds himself. He could make a mere boy so striking because he was Sir Joshua and not another man. The same effect, minus color, is seen in No. 109, portrait of Miss Kitty Fisher. The boy has wonderful mellow tone in the painting; this, on the other hand, whether from the fact of never having been finished, or because time has been at work to bleach or confuse the colors, has a deathly tone which is far from agreeable. But the drawing is masterly, and the expression as serene as the great man knew how to make expression. Miss Kitty is by no means handsome, but we are sure, even without the emblems of innocence—the dove in her lap and its companion on the window-sill—that she is good. No. 64 is still another picture to which the name of the great English portrait painter is annexed; but any one who glances at it will more than agree with the cautious words of the catalogue. It may be "probably" a copy by John Jackson. Certainly—it is not a painting by Sir Joshua.

The Lenox gallery is fortunate in the possession of two portraits by the American artist J. Singleton Copley. No. 115, portrait of Mrs. Hooper, of Marblehead, is an amusing family relic, which has an attractiveness of its own in spite of woodenness to the verge of the hideous. Doubtless, here is an old lady who belonged to those who rode Floyd Ireson in a cart, all because of his hard heart, as the ballad tells us. She has little grace, but plenty of character. Much more pleasing will No. 91 be found, that being the portrait of Lady Frances Wentworth. Copley has introduced the inevitable red velvet curtain, festooned from pillars of palatial architecture, but he makes up for this conventionality by the amusing attributes of his sitter. On the table before her is a flying-squirrel, secured by a small chain to Lady Wentworth's hand. There is a lurking smile about her mouth, which accords well with the introduction of a little pet into the majesty of a portrait containing pillars, curtains, and the best of clothes. The flesh painting is excellent, although, perhaps, a little affected by time; the white or grayish satin dress, the sash across her shoulder, are equally well done. She is no beauty, but seems to have had firmness and fun in her.

Another American portrait painter represented here is Henry Inman. His portraits must hang in many houses in our City, some of them much superior to what this gallery has to show. No. 76, portrait of Dr. Thomas Chalmers, is a good specimen of his work, excellent in flesh tints, quiet, gentle, dignified. Other instances are not so happy, probably because he is off his legitimate track. No. 13, "Dundrennan Abbey, near Kirkcudbright," cannot assist his fame as a colorist, or in any other way. No. 36, "Dismissal of a School in October," has some fine effects of color in one tone, without showing any skill of handling figures or telling a story, while No. 123, "Heads of Children, altered from Reynolds," is a piece of order-work, about which the less said the better.

Rembrandt Peale is here only in the rôle of a copyist, and he succeeds to the usual extent of that rôle in being tiresome. Mr. Lenox has been pleased to own as many heads of Washington as there were heads to be found or copied; perhaps Rembrandt Peale could do them better than another. There is also a copy of the "Madonna della Seggiola," which, very naturally, is even more trying to the nerves than the copies of Washington. James Peale, however, appears to better advantage in still another portrait of Washington, said to have been painted in 1778. It is wooden, but the drawing and modeling of the face are strong.

We have spoken chiefly of the portrait painters in this gallery for the reason that was before given, because it is in the first place a gallery of portraits. But there are some other pictures whose merits are of almost equal value. No. 86 is actually an Andrea del Sarto, purchased in Rome in 1820. It represents an angel, Tobit, of the Apocrypha, and his famous dog. It would be beyond the powers of the present writer to decide on the authenticity of a picture by so great a name. Many Americans have been deceived with able copies of antiques by Italians, but Mr. Lenox ought not to be of the number, both from his own attention to art and his acquaintance with connoisseurs and artists who could advise him. In any case this picture is lovely in itself. The face of the angel has great nobility, tenderness, playfulness—as it be knew the affliction of Tobit to be temporary. The latter reveals his blindness without exhibiting disagreeable signs of it. The dog is as curiesque as usual in pictures of that time. Sir Edwin Landseer has three pictures which are all the better for not being of the number of the ambitious. No. 2, "Dog in a Stable," is conventional in general coloring, but shows how early he made a specialty of animals. The dog by itself, sitting quietly in a stable, and not attempting to tell any story, is an excellent study, of more worth in a gallery than half a dozen "Peace and Wars," "Dying Staghounds," and such later efforts. No. 11, "A Landscape," is curious in connection with a man of so much note in English art. No. 73, "Study of a White Horse," is still better. It is said to have been given by Sir Edwin to Leslie, the artist, as a hint for Rosinante in the picture of "Don Quixote." Another Englishman of former note is George Morland, whose pictures here have the old-fashioned conventional brown tone so customary at one time—a trick taken from the old masters. No. 3, "Pigs in a Fodder-yard," shows the merit of the man through this conventional medium. Another is No. 40, "Marine View."

Two of Turner's paintings hang near each other on the left wall as one enters the gallery. No. 32, "Scene on the French Coast," has the repulsiveness at first sight which seems inherent in many of Turner's pictures, but it also succeeds very soon in riveting the attention. He appears to have tried to do as much as he could with as little paint. The result is harsh, mournful, flat in feeling, but after a little reflection one is bound to remember that the subject demands just these colorings. Here lies a man-of-war on the sands; no one is near; sky, ocean, and wet beach are desolate and dreary. Turner has therefore treated the subject so as to increase the natural sadness of the scene by his way of handling the paint. But that is a pitch of art to which only masters can attain. A different style seems to obtain in the companion picture, No. 34, "Fingal's Cave, in the Island of Staffa." Here the rain and mist are battling with spray and waves; all four are warring against the dim cliffs, while out of the midst of the tumult a small steamer is staggering along, as if to contrast its quiet determination with the anger of the elements. It pushes its way through the veils of rain and mist with a sort of good-humored doggedness fine to behold.

We cannot close this notice without mention of two pictures by French painters that would do honor to any collection. No. 55, "The Siege of Saragossa," by Horace Vernet, is a standing example to painters who attempt the difficult feat of telling a story without exaggeration or dullness. The action is heroic, the faces are handsome, the scene is fiery, full of smoke of battle—and yet it must always be a delight to look at. The little figure of the defender on the right, who stands lifted by his courage above the necessity for violent action, is full of beauty and grace. He looks down on the besiegers without fear, but without raving. The monks beyond him are in passionate action, yet they, too, are not posing. The monk with a gun is firm and resolved. But what drawing and what color is here, beside all these excellences! Otherwise beautiful is the art in No. 57, "The Field of Battle," by Paul Delaroche. A cuirassier who bears a standard has halted. His jaded horse droops his head and at the same time seems to perceive something on the ground not included in the picture. The trooper has let his standard fall, with point almost touching the ground, while he arranges the band of his helmet, with a face expressing and focusing the dreadful scene hinted in the neighborhood. Perhaps he is looking at a dead comrade, perhaps he is only overcome by weariness and the sadness of the scene of death. He may be wounded; who knows? With him we must close our impressions on a first view of Mr. Lenox's collection.

WATER COLORS.

TENTH EXHIBITION OF THE AMERICAN SOCIETY.

Last night was set apart for a private view of this year's exhibition of the American Society of Painters in Water Colors, at the National Academy of Design, in Twenty-third street. The object of this preliminary viewing is to afford members of the Academy and a few privileged friends an opportunity to examine the collection at their leisure, without being hindered and confused by the crowd that gathers on the regular opening night. The conception of a formal reunion of artists, connoisseurs, and critics is a good one; nothing is wanting to make it a most enjoyable affair except the presence of some one person of authority, who could assume the attitude of host and bring the various members of the meeting together more closely than is at present the case. The American is noted for being a solemn and rather shy animal, whatever the stage Yankee may be, and requires on such occasions to be taken in hand by a genial host and made to converse and enjoy himself.

Taken as a whole the water-color exhibition of this season is without question a success, although that of last Winter surpassed it in more particulars than one. There are fewer pictures this year than last, yet the same amount of wall space is covered. The rooms are all used, with the exception of the south room. Of course, fewer pictures on an equal spread of wall mean pictures individually of larger average size. With water-colors this is hardly likely to be a favorable trait, for modesty of size is especially requisite in a style of painting which for good reason does not rank as high as oil-painting. Therefore the larger average spread of these water colors, while it may possibly be a matter of little importance, is likely to point to a defect in many of them. Water-color painting seems so especially adapted for happy thoughts, pretty bits of landscape, clever turns of figure that are now quite worth perpetuating in the gravity of oils that the idea of plodding for along while over great expanses of paper partakes of the nature of elaborate jokes. Before they are done, everybody is looking another way for a chance to escape. However, we may be well content with what is on exhibition in the pretty rooms of the Academy. The number of pictures and drawings runs into the five hundreds as it is, and although the older and more famous active members of the Academy are rather conspicuous from their absence, yet there are enough pretty pictures by American, French, and Spanish artists to please almost every taste The collection cannot be fairly seen by any one who is in a hurry.

NOTES FROM THE CAPITAL.

WASHINGTON, Jan. 20.—The condition of Senator Anthony was much improved this afternoon. After taking a bath he dressed himself and sat up to converse with a friend. He expects to be out to-morrow. Some of his friends attribute his sudden illness to his having eaten partridge at Baltimore, which birds feed on laurel leaves when the ground is covered with snow, and thus become poisonous.

The Treasury now hold $338,545,200 in United States bonds to secure national bank circulation, and $19,062,800 to secure public deposits. United States bonds deposited for circulation for the week ending to-day, $1,500,500; United States bonds held for circulation withdrawn for the week ending to-day, $949,000; national bank circulation outstanding, currency notes, $319,108,061; gold notes, $2,094,390.

Receipts of national bank notes for redemption for the week ending to-day, as compared with the corresponding week of last year:

New-York	$2,471,000	$1,749,000
Philadelphia	138,000	206,000
Boston	1,331,000	1,970,000
Miscellaneous	1,345,000	1,925,000
Total	$5,280,000	$5,851,000

Receipts to-day, $827 279.

The President sent the following nominations to the Senate to-day: Benjamin H. Lanier, to be Collector of Internal Revenue for the Second Louisiana District; Solomon Cooper, of California, to be Receiver of Public Moneys at Humboldt, Cal. Postmasters—Mrs. Louisa A. Johnson, at Griffin, Ga.; David Wiggins, at Greenport, N. Y.; A. M. Wittler, at Suspension Bridge, N. Y.; C. Davis Millen, at Skowhegan, Me.

The President to-day sent a Message to the Senate transmitting a letter from the Secretary of State concerning a report of the Clerk of the Commissioners of Alabama Claims, together with many opinions of Judges of the Supreme Court, in the more important cases submitted to that body, and announcing that all claims submitted having been decided, the court adjourned on the 29th ult. Mr. John Davis, the Clerk of the court, in a letter to Mr. Fish, dated Jan. 5, 1877 transmitted a report of the court, together with the opinions above referred to, and inserting a synopsis of the argument of counsel. In most of the claims the court entered judgment for a certain amount, not announcing the manner in which they arrived at their decision. The report states that the court has passed upon 2,065 cases in which the amount claimed was about $14,500,000. The report is very voluminous, and gives a brief résumé of the proceedings had in most of the cases which came before the court for adjudication. The information it conveys has all been heretofore published.

The investigation regarding the late District Police Commissioners was continued by the Le Moyne Committee to-day. R. P. Ball testified that Major Richards requested him, as a brother Mason, to inform Mr. Murtagh that unless the attacks of his Fairtagh's paper upon the Police force were immediately discontinued, certain scandals would inevitably be brought out which would be damaging both to Richards and Murtagh, and be of no benefit to any one. Richards explained that other persons besides himself knew of these scandals. Ball complied with this request, and in company with Benjamin F. Lloyd, Murtagh's brother-in-law, called on Murtagh New Year's Day. Murtagh replied that there was nothing in the charges, and that he intended to make it warmer than ever for the gamblers and their friends. Messrs. Ball and Lloyd reported this answer to Richards, who thereupon said, "Well, those things must be brought out."

The Senate, in executive session to-day, confirmed the following nominations: Pascal Decomis to be Consul at Cayenne; J. W. Howe to be Register at Lewiston, Idaho; W. D. Wheeler to be Indian Agent at the Los Pinos Agency, Colorado; J. L. Burchard to be Indian Agent at the Round Valley Agency, California; W. G. Wilson to be Assistant Surgeon in the Navy. Postmasters.—W. C. Vandewater, at Princeton, N. J.; Byron M. Cutcheon, Manistee, Mich.; John Beatty, Nevada, Iowa; Mary J. Rockafellow, Mechanicsburg, Penn.; H. F. Cutler, Florence, Mass.; J. N. Cramer, Rhinebeck, N. Y.

The waters of the Potomac continue to fall gradually. The tides have not been strong enough to lift the ice, but the current is fast cutting it away from underneath, and it is much thinner than yesterday. Along the Long Bridge it presents an unbroken field, with occasional small openings, and on the south shore and around Arsenacosta Island and in the direction of Easley's Wharf there appear immense gorges. Below the bridge all is ice as far as can be seen. Hundreds of spectators have been swarming on the bridge all day expecting to see the ice move.

Assistant Surgeon E. R. Marsteller is detached from the Naval Hospital, Chelsea, Mass., and ordered to the Tallapoosa, at Washington. Acting Assistant Surgeon Thomas Owens, from the Tallapoosa, and placed on waiting orders.

A DUEL BETWEEN NEGROES.

WILMINGTON, N. C., Jan. 20.—Two South Carolina negroes fought a duel at Pine Bluffs, in this State, yesterday. One was a Democrat and the other a Republican, and they fought over politics. Four shots were exchanged. One of the men was wounded three times and is dangerously hurt. The other was hit on the right arm. The affair has caused great excitement in the neighborhood, which was intensified by the prominence in the public mind of the recent Bennett-May affair.

AFFAIRS IN ENGLAND.

A VARIETY OF LONDON TOPICS.

THE RAIN STILL COMING DOWN—GREAT DAMAGE TO PROPERTY REPORTED—THE EASTERN QUESTION AND THE EMPRESS OF INDIA—A FEW MORE BISHOPS WANTED—THE CRACK IN THE B.G GUN—NOTED JOURNALISTS SAID TO HAVE BEEN BRIBED.

From Our Own Correspondent.

LONDON, Saturday, Jan. 6, 1877.

The rain, though not falling in torrents, still keeps on coming down in a quiet, steady, soaking way, as if it meant to drown the country, but only inch by inch, and without any fuss; and a very large part of England is now more or less under water. There has been some, but not much, loss of life, but ruin and misery have been widely spread in all the districts afflicted, and there can be no doubt that it amounts to a very grave national calamity. Where seed has been sown it will in most cases be wasted, and where seed ought at this period to be sown, the sowing will have to be kept back too long to be of any good. Then the continuous rain and flooding of the fields are very bad as regards cattle. They have to be supplied with artificial food, and it is difficult to transport them to market on account of the impassable condition of the roads. This affliction has not been accompanied, like any of the great convulsions of nature, by any scenes of sudden and appalling violence or disaster, but it has done almost more mischief. In London, for instance, the overflow of the Thames has produced very disastrous effects in various poor and densely-inhabited districts, such as Lambeth and Southwark, on the south side of the river, and Wapping on the north; and all this has arisen from the wharfingers and others selfishly keeping their wharves as low as possible, in order to enable ships or barges to load and unload off the edge at certain times, and thus save the trouble of lifting goods to a higher point. With the usual stupidity of popular ignorance, a cry is being raised against the embankment of the Thames as the cause of the inundation; but this is, of course, mere nonsense. The embankment, where it has been constructed, has perhaps in some degree increased the flow of the river by narrowing its bounds, but on the other hand it protects the land by a much higher bulwark than formerly. The cause of the inundation is not embanking, but the absence of embanking, and this is the proper remedy, but, unfortunately, the owners of property set themselves against it because they like their barges to lie in the mud at their doors, in order to suit their own convenience. Nothing can be more disgraceful than the condition of the river-side in this respect, where it is not protected by the embankment. In the early morning of the 2d of January, the tide of the Thames rose to three feet ten inches above the ordinary high-water mark, and swamped the adjoining districts. At Lambeth there is a large freight-yard of the South-western Railway, with a long frontage to the river, which, though higher than the wharves, is still very low, and the river poured over this, discharging an immense volume of water into the lower and thickly inhabited districts behind. The rain-fall during the last month has been reduced six inches, being more than a fourth of the average annual down-fall. The valley of the Thames, and its tributaries above London, are overflowing the adjoining land almost as far up as their sources. On every side there is a dreary waste of water; and it is feared that not only the harvest, but the health of the population, will suffer severely. The supposition of the inundation seems to be that the outflow of the exceptional accumulation of rain-fall water, coming in contact with the high water of the Spring tides, caused the river to heap up and overflow on the lower districts of London and along the course of the Thames.

Nothing will be known till Monday, and probably not even then, as to the final position which the Turks will take up in the face of the conference, and nobody can be surprised that on a question affecting the whole organization, and even the existence of the country as an independent State, they should not cringingly submit to the demand of the Plenipotentiaries to give an immediate answer to the scheme which they took several weeks to prepare in private, without any consultation with the Porte, and which they expect the Porte to accept off-hand, without any argument, and as a matter of course. Indeed, the Plenipotentiaries have seen the mistake they made, and are willing to allow argument to a certain extent. They have also made certain concessions as to their proposed terms. There are a great many rumors that Russia is not ready for war, and is anxious to throw the responsibility of a settlement on the powers concerned, but this is by no means certain, and wiser people, who know what goes on below the surface, believe that, though the Czar would no doubt prefer to accomplish his aims, if he can, without an expensive war, he is sufficiently prepared for it, and in some ways better prepared than he will be a few years hence. It would be idle for me to give you the reports or speculations about what is likely to happen, when you will probably learn the precise truth by cable before my letter arrives; but I may say that there is a strong impression springing up here that Lord Salisbury has played his game badly, and that Gen. Ignatieff has been too much for him, and moreover, that the Turks, with their characteristic fatalism, are becoming more obdurate and bent upon taking their chance of success in the field or going to the Paradise of the Prophet. Their Army, and especially their Navy, is very strong, a large proportion of the foreign loans being spent on them; and even for Russia it would be a tough job to beat them by herself, and still more to make head against their fanatical vengeance. I am not at all a philo-Turk myself, but it seems to me that in national, as in private affairs, it is necessary to take human—or it may be inhuman—nature into account, and to manage people instead of simply threatening to knock their heads off if they will not agree to what you want, and that the more ignorant and backward people are the less is mere intimidation and bullying likely to succeed. The timidity of a Parliamentary Government, such as that of England, does not exist in a despotic State. There can be no doubt that a great mistake was made in not having the Eastern question put on a proper footing at the close of the Crimean war, but this would not have suited Russia, who hoped for another chance, and Louis Napoleon had squared things with the Czar.

The weak side of Disraeli's character comes out strongly in the ceremonial at Delhi. It will be remembered that at the end of last session he justified the Queen's new title of Empress of India as a great blow to Russian schemes of invasion; and this heroic feat has now been completed. The Indian Government has conciliated, as it thinks, the friends and chiefs by giving them sham titles and decorations and flags and banners, and all sort of tinsel and frippery, which these astute persons know to be like the beads given to savages, and Russia is supposed to be terrified by the exhibition of the biggest Englishman in India, six feet high, in a costume costing £200. All this is laughed at here, but causes some wincing, too.

What this country most wants is rational and competent statesmen; but it seems to be thought by the Government that, under Providence, a few more Bishops will secure the blessing of Heaven, and put an end to diplomatic blundering, Stock Exchange swindling, the bad weather, and all other difficulties. The utter impotence, not to say imbecility, of the Episcopate is conspicuously shown in the way in which the more violent Ritualists are snapping their fingers at them. Mr. Tooth, a very High, indeed almost Romanist, parson at Hatcham, has been sentenced to suspension by the Court of Arches, and openly, by words and acts, defies both the court and his Bishop in the most contemptuous and violent way, going on wearing his illegal robes and performing the illegal ceremonies just the same. He has taken up his quarters in the Vestry, and nobody ventures to meddle with him. The Bishop has meekly subsided, and it is doubtful whether anything will be done. A few good Bishops, if they could be got, would no doubt be a great boon to the country; but the nature of their positions makes it necessary that they should be dodgy, shuffling, temporizing men, facing both ways, and with no aim except to have a quiet life of it for themselves, and hush up difficulties in the Church. The four new Bishops, to be endowed by the Government, are, it is said, to take their titles from Liverpool, Newcastle, Southwall, and Derby, and private subscriptions have been got up for a Bishop in Cornwall.

A great panic has been caused at Woolwich Arsenal by a report that the 80-ton gun had cracked, and a detailed account of the crack was published in the papers. But the artillery men utterly refuse to believe it. We are now told that five impressions of the bore have been taken by the staff of the School of Gunnery, without their being able to discover the alleged flaw in the inner lining; and in the next sentence it is admitted that the undiscoverable fracture is "infinitesimal, and probably due to the gun having been bored rather too fine."

Some very unpleasant disclosures have been made as to bribes received by English journalists, and by at least one member of Parliament, from the Nueval Nózim of Bengal, to advance his claims in the newspapers. The subsidies varied from £25 to £500 and £600, and in the case of Dr. Russell, of the Times, to £1,000.

The Admiralty, after, according to its usual practice, trying to get the first word about the Arctic Expedition, and by garbled extracts from the official reports, to make it appear a triumph, has now been obliged to admit that the scurvy part of the business is, after all, not particularly the sort of thing to strike gongs and blow trumpets about, and is trying to screen itself by a sham inquiry, with an Admiral at the head of it, and from which the chief medical authorities are carefully excluded.

OBITUARY.

ASSEMBLYMAN JAMES HEALY.

Assemblyman James Healy, of the First District, died at an early hour yesterday morning at his residence in this City. He was a prominent member of the Tammany Hall Democracy, and was elected to the Assembly in 1872, 1873, and 1874, and was elected last November to the present Legislature. He was born in Kilrush, in the County of Clare, Ireland, in the year 1835, and came to this country in 1851. He served as a clerk in the Eagle Spice Mills, in Desbrosses street, for over 10 years, subsequently engaged in the cartage business, and afterward as a liquor dealer. He was a member of the Assistant Board of Aldermen in 1868 and 1869. While a member of the Legislature, he served in 1872 on the legislative committees on Public Health and Expenditures at the Executive Department, and in 1873 on the committees on Federal Relations and Expenditures of the Executive Department. The cause of his death was Bright's disease. He leaves a widow and four children in very poor circumstances.

OBITUARY NOTES.

Hon. Daniel T. Durland, at whose residence in Middletown, N. Y., his brother, Assemblyman S. T. Durland, died on Wednesday, also died yesterday afternoon, aged 69 years. He represented the Second District of Orange in the Assembly of 1850.

Gen. Joseph J. McDowell, of Ohio, died at his home, in Hillsboro, Highland County, that State, on the 17th inst. The deceased was in his lifetime well known to the prominent men of the State who figured in public life from 1830 to 1850. He represented Highland and Fayette Counties in the Legislature at the session of 1832-3, and the same counties in the State Senate in the Thirty-second and Thirty-third General Assemblies, 1833-4 and 1834-5. Gen. McDowell also served four years as a member of Congress from 1843 to 1847. He was by profession a lawyer, was of decided ability, and withal a fine speaker. He enjoyed the confidence of all who knew him. He was aged 76.

AN ALLEGED COUNTERFEITER.

A PIOUS YOUNG MAN ARRESTED WHILE ENDEAVORING TO PASS A SPURIOUS TEN-DOLLAR BILL.

About 8 o'clock last evening Capt. Leavy, of the Third Precinct, Brooklyn, was on Court street, and was met by a messenger from the bakery of Bernard Frevert, No. 316 Court street, who informed him that a young man was in the store endeavoring to pass a counterfeit $10 bill. The Captain arrested the suspected person, who handed him his card, on which was the name "James L. Manker." He said that he was ignorant of the character of the bill which he had offered, and expressed a willingness to go to the station-house, and he was locked up. A careful examination of the bill showed that it had been raised from a $2 United States currency note to a $10 United States bill. In Manker's room, at No. 354 Henry street, a boarding-house kept by Mrs. Alexandria Van Vlake, Detective Mahoney found a counterfeit lead 10 cent piece, and a number of greasy paper patterns, which the prisoner had used in raising the bills. The patterns were made of thick oiled paper, on which the figure "10" and letter "X" had been traced. The interior of the letters was removed, leaving an exact outline of the figures and letters necessary for the alteration. These were placed over the vignette, and the outer coating of the bill was picked off with the point of a pin, leaving the letters and figures as white as in a perfect bill. The white hair on the head of the portrait of Jefferson was also picked out, making an older face than that of the $2 currency note. The work had been skillfully done, and the bill had been creased and soiled in order to hide the marks of the alteration. Capt. Leavy sent for Miss Frauson, a clerk in Mollenhagen's confectionery store, No. 197 Atlantic street, where he learned that a counterfeit $10 bill was passed some weeks ago. Miss Frauson brought to the Police station a bill which was the exact counterpart of that which the prisoner had endeavored to pass last night. She readily identified the prisoner as the person from whom she had obtained the bill. Manker declared that he had no recollection of passing the bill. He professes to be a newspaper correspondent, and his landlady says that he has recently been secretary to Rev. Mr. Harris, a converted Jew, (now a Methodist preacher,) and that he represented to her that he had written a book for Mr. Harris. He is about 26 years old, and has lived at No. 354 Henry street for about a year and passed among the boarders as a pious young man.

THE CHECK FORGERY.

The officers of the Union Trust Company still decline to say what prospect is entertained by them of recovering any portion of the $64,000, obtained by means of the forged check received on the 3d of January. The arrest of Maxwell has not yet resulted in any new developments. One of the Union Trust Company's officers said to a reporter of THE TIMES yesterday that the premature publication of the forgery on Tuesday afternoon had given opportunity to one man to get away from them, but he declined to say who the man alluded to was. Mr. Hewitt was busy yesterday for his client, Brown, whom he declares is entirely innocent of the charges made against him. It was said in Mr. Hewitt's office that there seemed to be a prospect of recovering a part of the money obtained by the forgery, but it was not explained how the money was to be recovered. The forger is still believed to be a much more skillful man than either of the persons yet arrested. Detective Simpson would not say what was being done to secure the offender, but his description was said to be in the possession of the detectives. The habit of Brown to visit his office infrequently, has not been considered strange by his neighbors at No. 35 Broad street. The janitor of the building said he came to the place yearly a year ago, but that he had scarcely seen him since he came. The impression prevailed in Wall street yesterday that a number of arrests would be made, and the anxious and nervous state of the parties most interested in the forgery was construed to indicate a waiting anxiety on the movements of the detectives. Maxwell will be brought before Justice Duffy, at the Tombs, this morning, when, it is said, he will give bail, and be discharged from custody.

AMUSEMENTS.

MUSICAL AND DRAMATIC.

ENGLISH OPERA.

Attention has already been directed to the fact that Miss Kellogg and her English Opera Company will soon enter upon a brief series of representations at the Academy of Music. These performances, which, from all indications, are likely to be numerously attended, will begin on Tuesday evening next, when "The Bohemian Girl" is to be interpreted. On Wednesday, "Faust" will be sung, and, on Friday evening, and Saturday afternoon, "The Flying Dutchman" will be brought out. Miss Kellogg is to appear in each of the three Operas, and she will have the co-operation of Messrs. Maas, Turner, Carleton, Conly, Peakes and Seguin; of Mlles. Manetti and Chiomi, and of Mmes. Rosewald and Seguin.

GENERAL MENTION.

Mr. Edwin Adams is expected in New-York on Tuesday.

M. Emile Sauret departed for Europe last week. He goes to Germany, where he will fulfill several important engagements.

A continuance of polo, racing, and out-of-door sports generally, is the theme of announcement at Gilmore's Garden.

Mr. Maurice Grau returned to this City on Friday. Mlle. Aimée and the opera bouffe company are looked for on Sunday next.

Dr. Herman Linde, the distinguished German reader, will read "Julius Cæsar" on Thursday afternoon next, at Steinway Hall.

The reopening of the Olympic Theatre and its consecration to performances of comedy and drama is announced. The theatre reopens on January 30.

Among the new guests at the Aquarium a "hair turtle," from Japan, is conspicuous. The upper shell of the animal is completely covered with a vegetable growth.

A "sacred" concert by the Jubilee Singers now at the New Broadway Theatre, will take place at that house this evening, and, to-morrow, the run of "Uncle Tom's Cabin" will continue.

The operetta called "The Happy Moke" still holds a place or honor upon the programme of the San Francisco Minstrels, and the usual miscellany of songs, comic stories, and minstrel "acts," precedes it.

The programme for Mr. Thomas' fourth symphony concert, to occur on Feb. 3, will embrace Bach's Suite No. 3, in D; Beethoven's "Pastoral" Symphony, and Siegfried's "Death Scene," and the finale, from "Götterdämmerung."

"Lad Astray" will be acted at the Park Theatre to-morrow evening, with most of the artists who originally appeared in the play. On Wednesday evening it will make way for "The Geneva Cross," which drama will be given during the remainder of the week.

Announcement is made that a matinée performance for the benefit of Mrs. Jane C. English, mother of the late Miss Lucille Western, will occur on Feb. 1, at Niblo's Theatre. Performances with the same object are also to be given in Boston and in Philadelphia.

The last nights of Mr. Heller's excellent "second" programme are announced at the Wonder Theatre. The present entertainment includes, it should be remembered, Miss Heller's marvelous second sight performances, which are not likely to be rivaled for a long time.

Onslow's quintet for wind instruments, opus 81; a trio by Rubinstein, and three movements of Beethoven's septet, in E flat, are the most important numbers on the programme for Wednesday's concert—the third given this season—of the New-York Mozart Club, at Steinway Hall.

The spectacular drama called "Around the World in Eighty Days" will be brought out at Niblo's Theatre, to-morrow evening. It will be remembered as having been represented some months ago at the Academy of Music, and it has since been performed, with great success, in the principal cities of the United States.

To-morrow evening's performance at the Eagle Theatre will be for the benefit of Miss Jennie Hughes. "Turn Him Out," "The Swiss Cottage," and "Toodles" will constitute the programme of the representation. On Tuesday Mr. Oliver Doud Byron will appear at the Eagle in "Across the Continent," and that drama will be represented there during the remainder of the week.

Booth's Theatre will be closed during the present fortnight. The recess will allow the holding of rehearsals of "Fifth Avenue," Mr. Rowe's new local play, upon the success of which great expectations are founded. Mr. Rignold, who is to assume the principal rôle in "Fifth Avenue," sailed from Liverpool on Friday. The piece will be brought out on February 5.

The new vaudeville called "Lemons," the pleasant effect of which upon a numerous and brilliant audience was recorded a few days since, has attracted to the Fifth Avenue Theatre large assemblages ever since. The amusing character of the story it unfolds, the well-defined comic traits of its principal personages, and the charm a bright and brisk representation always possesses, indicate that it will have a protracted career.

With the present week, Mr. Booth's sojourn at the Lyceum Theatre will terminate. "The Merchant of Venice," "Brutus," "The Lady of Lyons," "Ruy Blas," and "Don Cæsar de Bazan,"—the two plays being given on Friday evening—and "Othello" will succeed each other, Mr. Booth appearing at the Saturday matinée in "Hamlet." On Jan. 29, the tragedian will perform at the Academy of Music, in Brooklyn.

It is represented that Mr. Max Strakosch has completed arrangements for the building of a grand national opera-house in this City. The site selected covers an entire block; is located between Madison and Vanderbilt avenues and Forty-second and Forty-third streets, and has been bought for $300,000. Mr. Strakosch states that Mr. William H. Vanderbilt, who is understood to be interested in the affair, has acted in the most liberal spirit, and that the new opera-house will be in readiness for occupancy on Oct. 1 prox.

"All for Her," will be made known at Wallack's Theatre to-morrow evening. Messrs. Palgrave Simpson and Herman Merivale are the authors of the play—a three act drama, and understood to be possessed of marked literary excellence. Mr. Lester Wallack, who has not appeared in New-York for many months, will act in "All for Her," and sustain the character of Hugh Trevor, a combination, it is said, of Don Cæsar de Bazan, and Sidney Carton, in Dickens' "Tale of Two Cities." The assumption of an important rôle by Mr. J. Steele Mackaye, is also likely to prove an element of interest in the performance.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS.

Carlotta Patti is at Leipzig.

Mlle. Pauline Luigini is at the Paris Bouffes.

Rubinstein's "Maccabees" has just been interpreted at Munich.

The tenor, Niemann, has been re-engaged for ten years at the Berlin Opera-house.

Johann Strauss' new operetta, "Prince Methusalem," is to be produced at once in Vienna.

A musical review is to be published in Constantinople, to contain works by Turkish composers.

The Venice Fenice is mounting a new opera, "Mattio Corvino," by Ciro Pinsuti, the song-writer.

They cannot discover a second good prima donna for the Scala this season—for the money they want to pay.

Götz's "Taming of the Shrew," just produced at Berlin, has proved very successful. The composer died recently.

Mr. Gye is in Paris and Mr. Mapleson is also said to be there. The former is en route for Italy, and both are on the look out for novelties.

L'Ambigu is about to take its place once more among the live theatres of Paris. It has been leased by M. Lafont, whose efforts on behalf of the French drama are not forgotten.

The Paris Vaudeville is actively rehearsing "Dora," M. Cardon's new comedy. Four acts have been delivered and are in the hands of the company, while the fifth is to be given by the author before the end of the week.

The subvention to the Parisian theatres at which dramatic performances alone are given will be the same during the present as during the past year. The Opéra Comique and the Théâtre Lyrique will, however, receive an addition of 100,000 francs.

The inauguration of the monument to Auber, in Paris, is fixed for the 29th inst., the anniversary of the birth of the composer. There will be special performances of his operas at the Grand National Theatre and at the Opéra Comique to commemorate the event.

Miss Arabelle Root gave a concert in aid of the "Association for Improving the Condition of the Poor," at Steinway Hall, on Friday evening. The whole proceeds, we learn, are to be devoted to this worthy charity.

The répertoire of Mlle. Aimée's first week's sojourn in this City is to include "La Jolie Parfumeuse," "La Vie Parisienne," and "La Fille de Mme. Angot," each of which operas bouffes will be represented twice in succession.

A once celebrated tenor, Guasco, died a fortnight ago at Alexandria. Guasco had retired from the stage for fully 30 years, but he was a great friend of Donizetti, and created the chief parts in "I Lombardi," "Ernani," "Attila," "Maria di Rohan," and "Il Corrado d'Altamura."

The fortieth anniversary of the production and the four hundred and forty-eighth performance of the national Russian opera, "Life for the Czar," of Glinka, was recently celebrated at St. Petersburg, when the old tenor, Petroff, who created the rôle of Ivan Soussanine, resumed for one night his original part.

Mlle. Alice Marchand, the once celebrated danseuse, died in Paris a fortnight since. She had attained her one hundred and eighth year. The official records of the academy prove that she made her début as a ballerine, at the Grand Opéra of Paris, more than 101 years ago, that is to say, on the 4th of March, 1775, before the first Empire, the Consulate, or the Directory, and, indeed, in the early part of the reign of Louis XVI. She leaves her memoirs, which are to be edited and published.

"M. Gounod's new four-act opera, in eight scenes, entitled 'Cinq Mars,' is completed," save the London Athenæum, "and is now in preparation at the Opéra Comique in Paris; the composer has selected Mlle. Chevrier to sustain the chief soprano part, Marie de Gonzague, and M. Dereims for Cinq Mars. 'Polyeucte' is reserved for the year of the International Exhibition in Paris, when it will be produced at the National Grand Opera-house. M. Gounod hoping to have either Mme. Adelina Patti or Mme. Nilsson for the chief character; and, if peace be proclaimed between M. Halanzier, the director, and M. Faure, to include the latter in the cast."

According to the London Athenæum, the Italian Opera-house in Paris is not flourishing. The Director has not been fortunate in his tenors. Neither Signor Carpi nor Signor Piazza satisfied the Parisian connoisseurs. Signor Clodio, who had some success in Milan, was tried in "Alda," but was overcome by stage fright. Signor Nicolini was compelled to return to Russia, so that at present Signor Aramburo alone maintains his position as a strong tenor. Signor Masini is engaged. As regards the prima donne, Mlle. Borgi-Mamo, soprano, and Mlle. Sass, contralto, are liked. Mlle. Chiomi (Miss A. Eyre) made her début as Leonora, in the "Trovatore," but was too nervous to achieve a success.

The London Athenæum says: "The returns for the operatic year 1876, of new works, produced at the various theatres of Italy, and the reports in the journals, and those received from private sources, indicate the decay of the lyric drama in the sunny south, both as regards composition and execution. In quantity, there is no deficiency of novelties; 41 new operas, from the 29 h of December, 1875, to the 13th of December, 1876, afford evidence of encouragement given to native musicians, and of enterprise on the part of the directors; but, when we look down the list of poets and of composers, and the titles of their joint productions, it is evident that not one of them will travel beyond the boundaries of Italy, and the large majority of the operas will be interred in the towns where they were brought out."

At the Théâtre Historique, in Paris, a new play, called "Un Drame au fond de la Mer," in five acts, by M. Ferdinand Dugué, has been produced with success. It has been cut, scene by scene, from a novel of M. Richard Cortambert bearing the same title. The laying of the transatlantic cable, which event produced such a sensation in the civilized world in 1855, serves as the ground-work of the story. Before witnessing the drama at the bottom of the sea, the spectator is present at one on the surface of the ocean, with the depths of which he is afterward to be made acquainted. The sensational scene of the piece represents the bottom of the sea; gigantic crabs, a monster octopus, and other huge denizens of the deep glide their way through arcades of coral, and amid thick vegetation; shoals of fish with glittering scales dart through the water like flights of bids in the air.

The Anglo-American published in Nice, prints the following notice, of an American singer now in Naples, studying under Signor Scafati: "Signor Scafati, has now under instruction a most promising baritone, of whom he expects great things. He is a young American, Mr. Digby V. Bell, of New-York. Mr. Bell has already sung in society with great éclat, and his rendering of the 'Salve Maria,' of Mercadante, at a great Church festival, elicited most favorable criticism from the Neapolitan art journals. His voice is of great compass and power and for beauty of tone could hardly be surpassed. Local impresarios have made Mr. Bell several offers to effect his début in Naples, but he has decided upon visiting the United States for the purpose of giving a series of concerts before formally entering upon his professional career." The Mr. Bell above mentioned is the son of the late William J. Bell, a well-known banker of New-York, and a nephew of Digby V. Bell, Collector of Customs of the Port of Detroit.

THE UNION LEAGUE RECEPTION.

The ladies' reception of the Union League Club, to take place next Thursday evening, promises to be an exceptionally brilliant affair. This annual reunion is always one of the choicest festivities of the season, and as such is anticipated by the members of the club and their families and friends with special interest; but we hear that its next occurrence will also be marked by an unusual attendance of distinguished invited guests. Among the representatives of foreign Governments who have already signified their intention to be present are Baron Blanc, Italian Minister; M. Aristarchi Bey, Turkish Minister; M. De Vangelas, Secretary of the French Legation, and Chevalier Bajnotti, Vice Consul of Italy. Many prominent officials of our own Government, together with distinguished officers of the Army and Navy, have also accepted invitations to attend. The Committee of Arrangements, on their part, are sparing no efforts to make the occasion one of the most enjoyable of these unique entertainments.

THE CITY GOVERNMENT.

The following call has been issued by the committee under whose auspices the conference regarding the City Government is to be held on Tuesday next:

DEAR SIR: The committee named below, of which you are a member, will meet the Mayor and Controller of the City, at the Mayor's office, on Tuesday, 23d inst., at 3:15 P. M. The object of this meeting is (without reference to party purposes) to express the interest felt by the committee in the Government of this City, and to tender to these gentlemen its cordial sympathy and co-operation in the discharge of their official duties. Your prompt attendance is requested

BUSINESS FAILURES.

Fabian Harris, of No. 103 Franklin street, assigned his property for the benefit of creditors to David Marks yesterday. The liabilities are $11,691 43, the nominal assets $31,816 43, and the real assets are set down at $1,131 60. In explanation of the great apparent discrepancy between the real and nominal assets, it may be said that this is owing to the peculiar manner in which the schedule is prepared, none of the debts due Mr. Harris being placed among the assets.

In the report yesterday of the failure of Elijah K. Bangs and Andrew Merwin it was erroneously stated that these gentlemen compose the firm of Bangs & Co. They composed the old firm of Bangs, Merwin & Co., which has passed out of existence. The firm of Bangs & Co. is its successor, and has nothing further to do with the other firm.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR.

SOUTHERN HOMES.

INTELLIGENCE, BENEVOLENCE, AND INDUSTRY OF SOUTHERN WOMEN—HOMES IN THE SOUTH UNPRETENTIOUS BUT PRETTY.

To the Editor of the New-York Times:

One of the dwellers in a Southern home would like to say a few words to her Northern neighbors in reply to the strictures of your correspondent on "Southern Homes." She must begin by stating that circumstances and opportunity have enabled her to see a good deal of the world—of social life at home, North and South, and abroad, of social life in its highest conditions, as well as in its healthier, happier middle state. With Northern homes she is intimately acquainted, and has for many years enjoyed the greater privilege of intimacy in English homes; in France, Switzerland, and Holland she had like privileges, to a less extent, to study the habits of the people, particularly of the women. Perhaps these opportunities may justify a dweller in a Southern home in expressing her opinion of these homes and of the women who make them, the class with which THE TIMES correspondent seems so well acquainted.

Planters in ante-bellum times, (it is useless to speak of plantation homes since the war, because they have virtually ceased to exist,) had almost always two homes, a necessity as well as a luxury, on account of the general unhealthiness in Summer of that part of the country best adapted for the growth of rice and cotton. The plantation houses, as a rule, in Georgia, were large and rambling, without modern improvements, and with no pretension to architectural beauty, and without fine furniture; there was, however, good, often elegant, table appointments, and a great deal of old-fashioned plate. A large portion was seen in the North soon after the war; the remainder saved has been sold piece by piece as necessity compelled. There was also plenty of stable room, and every facility for a large-hearted hospitality; for in those days people visited their friends with children, servants, and horses; this was the habit of the country. The Summer homes were always more or less pretty, without pretension, and never without flowers, which all Southern women love well enough to cultivate with their own hands, and who understand it thoroughly, many sending annually to various florists in the North for additions to their greenhouses instead of sending to France for fine dresses and bonnets. The Summer homes were rarely carpeted, and the floors, "dry rubbed" daily, were so polished as to require care and habit to avoid slipping; the extensive galleries scrupulously scoured; the bed-linen washed in pure spring water, of which there is so great an abundance, smelling sweet of old-fashioned lavender, the favorite perfume of the linen press. Now these "lazy, dirty women," had, with the care and management of their two homes, a great deal to do, besides; they bought, cut, and arranged all the clothing for the plantation "hands," taught their seamstresses, trained their cooks—no easy chance of a good cook by offering high wages. These careless mothers had to teach their daughters before they were wives. The writer being without these domestic accomplishments when first called to manage her own home, having been educated at the North, was stimulated to competition by the tempting delicacies sent her in a time of sickness, made by the hands of her kind neighbors and friends. These "lazy, selfish" Southern women are singularly active and devoted to the sick and suffering.

Southern homes, like the English, are permanent, descending from father to son; they are loved and lived in, or rather were before the war and poverty wrenched them away. The love of flowers is universal; the writer has a friend now three-score and ten, who, at no hour of the day, is ever seen without her dainty little bouquet of heliotrope, scarlet geranium, and the like, in the bosom of her dress, glowing amid its deep black, like the hope of Heaven from out her deep sorrow; this lady is exceptional, not in her tastes, but in the means left her to indulge them. In short, the dweller in a Southern home for the greater part of her life can testify by knowledge, by comparison, to the intelligence, active benevolence, and industry of Southern women. Reduced by a sudden overwhelming blow from affluence to poverty, they perform the menial offices necessary to the comfort of their families with a cheerful fortitude which should command the respect and admiration of generous minds. This is the testimony of one without prejudice and without favor, who feels capable of judging, and who also feels impelled to lift up her voice against the ignorance which stigmatizes Southern women as "ignorant," "lazy," and "selfish," living in homes of "squalor, untidiness, and poverty." To the last charge, in many, very many instances, they plead guilty. K.

LIFE INSURANCE INVESTIGATION.

HOW EXAMINATIONS CAN BE CONDUCTED IN THE INTEREST OF THE POLICY-HOLDERS.

To the Editor of the New-York Times:

Your reference to the report of Deputy Superintendant McCall, on the affairs of the Security Life Insurance Company, assumes that "the investigations of the Life Insurance Department may be rendered futile by the chicanery and fraud of the officers of a rotten company." With due respect, I beg leave to differ. My interest is that of a policy-holder in various companies, but not in the Security. I have sometimes acted on committees of policy-holders to examine the accounts and property of companies in which I have been interested, and in such cases have had, of course, less authority than any State department.

You give four points in which the company deceived those who made the examinations: 1. Fraudulent over-valuations of real estate. 2. Assumed possession of securities really borrowed. 3. Falsehood regarding cash balance. 4. Falsehood regarding outstanding premiums.

The fraud in the first point might have been readily detected by an examination of the assessed valuation of the real estate in the municipality where located, and by an examination to ascertain if such valuations were equitable, and both these could easily have been made by any intelligent business man or the department. On the second point, it was the department's duty to see that the company had the real and not the assumed possession of the securities referred to, and also to see that such securities were registered in the company's name, or, if payable to bearer, then to see that they were stamped across the face thereof as the property of the company. As to cash balance, the third point, the company should have been required to produce a certificate from the bank or banks where its funds were, and there could then have been no chance for deception; and fourth, any person employed by the department to make such computations, who was possessed of even passable qualifications for the post, could have detected the fraud here.

Application.—Let any injured policy-holder with grit bring a criminal suit against the officers of the company, and a suit for damages against the head of the Insurance Department. One party will be looked up where they will do no more harm in this line, and the other will learn how to conduct such examinations in the interest of the policy-holders.

Application Second.—Let the committee now appointed to examine the Equitable Company's affairs take nothing for granted, but proceed as they would if they believed a confidential clerk had been stealing from their own strong box and tampering with their own trial balance, calling in an independent but competent actuary to make those very computations which you assume may be left to the State Department. It will do no harm, and in case of the Security would have done much good in the direction of the department itself been verified. The company can stand it, and the policy-holders will appreciate such an examination. T. J. L.

SCARLET FEVER.

To the Editor of the New-York Times:

You republish the circular from the Boston Board of Health for the prevention of the spread of scarlet fever. The directions are very imperfect in one particular at least. We are told:

"On recovery the sick person should not mingle with the well until the roughness of the skin due to the disease shall have disappeared. A month is considered an average period during which isolation is needed."

This roughness is due to the scaling or dropping off of the dead scurf-skin, which has formed during the course of this eruptive fever. It resembles dandruff, although some of the scales are often very large. Every one of these particles of dead skin is saturated with the poison of the disease, and they necessarily linger on the scalp and among the hair of the head longer than in any other places. These poisonous scales should be disinfected early and removed thoroughly. They should not be allowed to drop off at their infinite pleasure and leisure during the whole course of a month. Some of them are small and light, so that they float in the air like Tyndall's dust, and are wafted to considerable distances, where they are inhaled by others, cling to the mucus of the nostrils or throat, and then set up the preliminary sore throat of scarlet fever, and finally infect the system, either by being swallowed down into the stomach or drawn in by inhalation into the lungs, or are absolutely absorbed into the blood-vessels and lymphatics of the throat.

During the course of scarlet fever, sweet oil, glycerine, vaseline, cold cream, or some other unctuous substance, should be freely applied several times a day over the whole surface of the skin, and well rubbed into the scalp and hair. The addition of a small quantity of carbolic acid, or some other disinfectant, is desirable. As soon as convalescence will permit, several warm baths should be administered at intervals of one or two days, aided by the free application of soap, not only to the whole body, but also to the hair and head. In this way the poisonous scales, or scurf, will be quickly disinfected and removed, and the spread of the disease much lessened, or even entirely prevented. The same course should be pursued in measles, varioloid, chicken-pox, and small-pox. PUBLIC HEALTH.

SEVENTY YEARS AGO.

IDEALISTIC PICTURES OF THE "GOOD OLD TIMES"—THE DISCOMFORTS OF SEVENTY YEARS AGO COMPARED WITH THE COMFORTS OF THE PRESENT DAY—A HIGHER HUMANITY.

To the Editor of the New-York Times:

The youth of our own land are often made to open their eyes with amazement at recitals of such universal lack of elegance, or even comfort, during the reign of "Good Queen Bess," that she was obliged to send out of her own dominions for a salad; that dogs were admitted to the dining-rooms of the most refined of her time—and it would be difficult to convince them of the truth of such disgusting pictures of the social life of those days, as dear old Thomson commences in these words:

"The dry divan
Close, in firm circle; and set ardent in
For serious drinking."

The coarse carousal that Thomson then proceeds to describe was probably a common thing even in such circles as were graced with the presence of the polished Essex or the courtly Leicester. But we, or at least our children, are seldom reminded that their own grandparents were subject to a state of things that our comparatively luxurious public would deem uncivilized. In the houses of our wealthiest farmers, or rather our largest farmers, for none were wealthy, no other mode of warming the slightly-built frame houses was in use but open fire-places—great ventilators that they were, large enough to consume a cord of wood of an evening. The powerful draught made by this huge fire and the huger fire-place made a real breeze, that possessed at least one advantage, viz., that of concentrating the occupants of the room near the scorching blaze. The bare, unadorned, real fire-places of these sixty-years-ago rooms, differed very considerably from the fascinating carved and frescoed affairs which now so often adorn drawing-rooms where houses are really warmed by furnace, but where curiously-wrought andirons, that suggest a raid upon some last-century palace, support a pretty, open fire of wood, a fire which is a happy excuse for otherwise useless screens; screens that have the lives of a generation of Chinese worked in with the shimmering stitches, warm velvets cover the floors, the warm fire is reflected from huge mirrors, and the warm-looking pictures are made still more so by the bright flames that light up the sun-tinted mountain tops, or warm, odorous-looking meadows.

The walls of our grandmothers were white and bare, except for the one mirror, which reflected more and more of whiteness, with occasionally a framed sampler of various alphabets, or a family record.

Then the clothing differed still more widely than the houses and furniture. The furniture of those days is easily described, for it consisted chiefly of negatives—prim chairs set close against the wall; generally no carpets, or at most only in the centre of the room; and, besides the fire, the lights were tallow candles, except, upon very rare occasions, wax or spermaceti.

The costly sables of a lady of the present day would outvalue as much in warmth as in price the moderate outfit of her grandmother. The warm machine-knit undergarments used by everyone to-day are as much more luxurious than the home-spun clothing worn sixty years ago as the luxurious comfort of a Pullman palace car compared with the shabbiest of jolting stage-coaches. Fine linen was then in the possession of some, but at what almost infinite cost! Let any young girl sit down at a sewing-machine, and, with her foot upon the treadle, instead of hemming a frill let her imagine a distaff of flax, from which she carefully pulls a fine thread at the same time that it is twisted and wound up upon her imaginary "little wheel," continuing this careful process not only from morn till night, but during a long succession of long Winter evenings, thus making the thread that ultimately is to be woven by some rustic neighbor into a fabric either of plain linen for underwear or bed linen, or in figures for table linen. How dismaying to a prospective housekeeper that everything used upon tables, beds, or person must be homespun. Then, let think of stockings—when all ceased to be elderly gentlemen must perforce wear the small-clothes, that are now only used in Europe as court costume. These ancient garments required stockings that reached above the knee, and said stockings also required to be knitted by wife, daughter, or mother. The writer remembers to have seen a fabric made by shredding up small portions of black silk, and carding it with white wool; it was considered much nicer than the "sheep's black," which was generally used to make the much-coveted black gray for these long stockings. Probably most young ladies are not aware that knitting stockings compared with crocheting tidies is as pedestrianism compared with steam locomotion. Indeed, so universal became the necessity, and consequently the habit of knitting, that the popular theory was a young lady was never entirely ready to be married until she possessed the traditional "pillow-case full" of stockings. In one farmer's family of four daughters the self-imposed rate of the household was that each daughter assisted night and morning with the milking, spun her day's work of yarn, i. e., forty knots, and then to knit at odd times at least one pair of fine cotton or linen stockings per month. This included often some coarser work and some time for society. An afternoon visitor or going out to tea did not hinder the cherished fine knitting—on the contrary helped it on. Now, when we remember that at that time, the short socks worn by gentlemen now, were not, but that every one wore gartered stockings, the consequent amount of knitting to be done was something appalling. Of one tall, muscular woman of those days it was said that she used to knit on her way to and from a neighbor's house to tea, and it is a well-authenticated fact that she has been seen stalking on, and quietly, if not gracefully, stepping over the rough stone walls of her own and her neighbor's farm, without stopping the click of her steel needles or her count of stitches. "Lects, how long will it take you to knit a man's stocking?" Looking up slowly, without stopping her reckoning: "I do' know." "Can you finish one in a day?" "Ya'as, I have done it, but I should have to lam in, and have boughten coffee for dinner." The writer well remembers a delicate, trim old lady who kept a brand new bushel basket under the bed in her spare bedroom, as a place of deposit for new stockings, and was packed full—the result of her slender, busy fingers during the winter there existed any necessity for efforts of that sort on her part. So strong is habit. She was wont to accuse herself of being very tired, as she "could not keep from hurrying, as if some one was barefoot, waiting for the stockings." Food was commonly equally plain and simple—compared with present usage, really rude. Witness the elimination of the stalwart knitter to "boughten coffee." Parched grains of various kinds were a substitute for Java or Mocha; also peas, and often toasted bread crusts. Indeed, the introduction of coffee proper was not universally hailed as a luxury. While it was still a novelty, used only upon occasions, a rustic Quaker lady, dining at a Friend's house, of course "Quarterly Meeting," accepted from curiosity a cup of this new beverage, and after tasting it with great care and deliberation, set down her cup decidedly, and somewhat rudely pushing it away, remarked with impetuosity: "I don't like it, and I won't drink it. It is bitter as a root." I don't believe any of you love it, you only drink it because it is the fashion to do so." Of the poverty of the country, with respect to fruits and flowers, volumes might be written. No strawberries but wild ones, and sweet as these were, they were too literally like angels' visits to be of much account. We have an orchard of "grafted fruit" was like having "ships at sea;" it gave one a notion of unknown and uncounted luxury or wealth. Apples, a row of currant-bushes around a very small garden, with, in rare cases, a few quince trees and common sour cherries, was considered all that was necessary. Pork was the ordinary and almost the only meat used; veal was quite an exceptional thing when a farmer killed a beef for his own use, and butchers had not found their way into the rural districts. In many families more rye than wheat was used; indeed, wheat was considered a luxury, and a supper of Indian mush and milk was good enough for ordinary. Witness the rather irreverent doggerel-rhymed "grace" of a rustic lover, who found that the advent of a more favored suitor had changed the bill of fare of the evening meal:

"The Lord be praised!
How I'm amazed
To see how things have mended;
Here's short-cake and tea
For supper, I see,
Where mush and milk were intended."

It is a favorite subject of idealists to describe the plenty of good old times, but these pictures have no foundation in truth or only apply to extraordinary occasions. So far as food and many other things are concerned, these are pre-eminently the "best times." "The latest born of time" should, of course, be the best. Indeed, the ordinary school parsophernalia of a student of these times would have puzzled an ancient philosopher. There are so many nameless accessories to learning that he or she must be exceedingly dull whose acquired knowledge does not far exceed that of their grandparents. This only proves the development of the race and that all these changes evolve a higher humanity. It would be well if all youth could realize the truth of this, and that now we look for something better than the world has ever seen; that they inherit all that was good of old times, but that it is to be incorporated with something still better and higher. Then they would press on, not with added complacency, but with humble self-confidence. H.

THE HAMBURG MASSACRE.

M. C. BUTLER THE INSTIGATOR—WHY THE MURDERERS WERE RELEASED—DEMOCRATIC FALSE SWEARING AND INTIMIDATION.

To the Editor of the New-York Times:

A Northern weekly paper, calling itself independent, says of the Hamburg massacre:

"The criminals, however, have not been brought to trial; so far as we can learn, there is no talk of bringing them to trial. The District Attorney passed his Summer on the Chamberlain stump. In other words, the massacre having served its electioneering purpose, no attention was given to the enforcement of the law. The prosecuting officer neglected his duty, and the Governor made no attempt to make him do it."

It the truth is of any use to such high-toned moral papers (!) as the one from which the above extract is taken, allow me, Mr. Editor, through your columns, to administer a little of that apparently unappreciated article to the writer of the above. I know that to attempt to send the truth in that direction creates a laugh among my friends as much at my expense as if I were Don Quixote attacking the wind-mills; yet at this moment I am inclined to just this errand, and it THE TIMES prints this, probably it has readers who will be glad of information on a subject upon which the limited circulation of Southern Republican papers has left them ignorant.

First.—The prosecuting officer was not the District Attorney, Corbin, but the Attorney General, Stone, and neither of those gentlemen "passed the Summer on the Chamberlain stump." The writer of this watched the campaign carefully, and never saw the name of Corbin or Stone as having made a speech at any political meeting! In October I said to Attorney General Stone: "Why don't you prosecute those Hamburg murderers." "How could I?" replied he. "When upon attempting to do so, the court-room was filled with white men armed to the teeth, and in their presence the negroes whose friends had been killed, would not open their mouths to testify. What could I do, but to postpone the trials to another term of the court, hoping that after the election excitement had subsided, it might be possible to bring them to justice." It was perfectly well known in this State that this state of things existed in the court-room, when the attempt was made to try the murderers, and yet the Democratic papers pretended to complain that the persons accused were not brought to trial so that they might free themselves from false accusations! It was a matter of surprise to Northern readers that the murderers were released, under bonds of only $2,000 for such heinous offences; but any one who knew the amount of false swearing done by white respectable (!) people to prove their innocence, their absence even from the scenes of violence, would wonder that the Judge had the courage to place any bonds upon them. Is not this a state of things subversive of all government? Do Northern editors desire to see the country submitting to it? Nothing less is meant by the demand of Southern Democracy to have their State Governments to themselves.

Ex-Attorney General Ackerman, of Georgia, said in my presence that "in 26 days there were 25 negroes killed in that State, and he had yet to hear of the first arrest made in consequence of these murders." The struggle for freedom and justice in Georgia is ended, and the Democrats have their own way. In South Carolina the struggle is not yet ended, and by God's blessing it may end in putting down violence, instead of putting down justice; but if it does, small thanks will be due to those Northern editors whose hypocritical course has been like the writer I have quoted.

The truth about the Hamburg massacre has been told before the Senate Committee recently investigating here. M. C. Butler is proved to have been the instigator and absolute controller of it; and yet M. C. Butler has been chosen by the Democrats here to the United States Senate. They say in private, "We have no orators with us save Democratic man, and the right one to represent us." Alas, that he is the right one to represent the majority of Southern whites! Will the North understand this, and understanding it, will they hold up the hands of Southern Republicans now struggling against fearful odds, in the battle for freedom and justice, or will they leave the cruel wolves to serve Democratic crushing out Republican carpet-baggers, the last hope in the South for humanity to the negro, and for the maintenance of government, law, and order. TESTING BRIDGES.

To the Editor of the New-York Times:

Bridges built 15 years ago were not as strongly constructed as now. Locomotives, in place of weighing 15 or 20 tons, now weigh 29 to 40; sleeping-cars 20 to 35 tons other cars in similar proportion; is it a wonder that some of these older bridges give way? Now, as a suitable test of a bridge, I would suggest, in place of a train of 20-ton (ordinary) locomotives, they use the weight of about two of the heaviest over the middle panels, and that these be placed one above another, if practicable, if not, pile on enough car-wheels and pig-iron to make a sufficient weight, say of 75 or 80 tons. This ought to give a satisfactory test. Attention has been called to the fact of a trestle-work on the Iron Mountain Railway giving way under a heavy train of two extra locomotives, being carried as freight. The Ashtabula train had two heavy locomotives; don't know about the Vermont Railway bridge. It would appear that a continuous train of ordinary locomotives would not be a practical test of strength. I believe there are other bridges that are unsafe for heavy extra trains, that would not sustain a test of 60 to 80 tons over the middle panels. H. S. HEBARD.

SLEEPING-CAR GRIEVANCES.

To the Editor of the New-York Times:

Your correspondent "Nightwatch" has a good point on sleeping-car companies. He has omitted one point of inquiry: why they do not make their conductors as well as cars? Many of the conductors are no more use to travelers than men of putty; gold-lettered and gold-laced, they cannot comprehend the wants and requirements of their passengers, and would not if they could. They firmly entertain the idea that the sleepers are run for their pleasure, and an opportunity to travel and display themselves and uniforms and their treatment of passengers does not prove anything to the contrary. And, too, porters, but they show up much better, more willing and polite; yet you sometimes meet one who considers himself boss of train and passengers, but I have noticed he always quickly grasps the quarter, and does not shine the shoes very well. But they can all be improved. It often happens that conductors and porters have a friend to assist them to support the night, and I have fancied things got lost that way, and it is so pleasant and enlivening to lie awake and listen to the hearty greetings, perhaps by near enough to hear it and enjoy it. But I have heard passengers much worse. One would suppose they were alone in the car.

So far as car companies are concerned, they do not care for their passengers. They furnish handsome and luxurious sleepers; that is, upon compe ing routes. But just try a sleeper on 11 P. M. train to Albany, or Albany to Buffalo. You cannot see any luxury, or lower rate than by the handsomest and most luxurious car.

Like parlor cars, it is creating a first-class—either crowd into the coaches or pay first-class. I don't always object to that, but don't like to pay one-third more rate for the use of a comfortable seat, or a berth, besides porter's fees. Rates are enormously high. Can any influence be brought for lower rates, better men, attendance, and care?

CRUELTY TO CHILDREN.

To the Editor of the New-York Times:

Passing along Sixth avenue yesterday, I saw sitting on the corner of Twentieth street, a woman holding a little girl on her lap. (I should judge the child to be four or five years old.) She looked very ill, and a lady told me she had been in the same position for two hours or more. I asked the woman what ailed the child. She replied, "She is sleeping." I feel satisfied the child had been drugged. She was perfectly motionless, and of a livid, ghastly color. Is there no one who can reach a case of this kind? It is the height of cruelty that she should be allowed to sit on the corner with that poor drugged child in her lap, her feet resting in the gutter. I looked for a Policeman, but did not succeed in finding one, or I would have endeavored to have the woman arrested. M. S.

THE SECURITY (!) LIFE.

To the Editor of the New-York Times:

In the latter part of October the premium on my policy for $5,000 in the Security Life Insurance Company was due. I had paid six annual payments out of 10, amounting to about $1,000, cash. I called upon the President and Vice President of the company in reference to taking out a paid-up policy. They both urged me not to do it, but to continue my payments in full. In answer to my inquiries, they both stated that their company was perfectly solvent and could, if necessary, insure all of their risks and then have a surplus of 10 per cent. for their policy-holders. Now what should be done with such officials?

DRAWING LOTS FOR THE PRESIDENCY.

To the Editor of the New-York Times:

I have heard many Republicans outside of Congress object to drawing lots for the Presidency because the people have elected Mr. Hayes; all the Democrats desire is to draw lots and convince the people they ought not to have elected him. Now, can't you advise the Republican Party to be more accommodating to the Democrats and save Tilden and his party from paying out his money for bribes. Who doubts the Democrats will appoint three Democrats and two weak-kneed Republicans on the committee of the House who they think could be bribed, and who doubts these honest Democrats would contribute $1,000,000 to bribe them? Why can't the Republicans be conciliatory and leave the decision of the question who is to be President to such honest and courageous men as Samuel J. Tilden, Abram S. Hewitt, and Fernando Wood? Their characters are well known. Who doubts their courage? Look at the courage of A. S. Hewitt in stating that Tilden contributed to the support of the war to conquer the rebellion. Probably no other man in the House of Representatives would have had the courage to do it. Do you doubt the ability of such men to do right when they think it to their interest to do so? It would save a great deal of the expense and labor of the Democrats in convincing the Republicans that Tilden should be elected. Why should Mr. Hayes have been elected? He has not contributed or done anything to aid his own election, while Tilden has worked night and day, and given his money freely for the election of himself. What if Mr. Hayes is fairly elected; we know it will offend the Democrats, and we ought not to offend them. Suppose they do steal the Presidency, don't the Bible say if a man steal thy coat give him thy cloak also?

THE BELGIUM TOWING PLAN.

To the Editor of the New-York Times:

For the interest of all concerned in the Erie Canal, don't allow capitalists in New-York City to invest a dollar in the Belgium Cable. I know from eight years' experience in towing a train of boats, that two boats is the limit. It is an erroneous idea to suppose that a train of boats can make up lost time between the locks for the detention that is necessary at the locks, for the reason that they se tie and strike at the bottom when towed beyond a certain speed; it is therefore necessary to keep the boats constantly moving. If the cable system was practicable, it would take a fortune of the Rothschilds to maintain it at the price they propose for towing. Undoubtedly the Belgium system would be a success were there no locks or bends in the canals. In the name of common sense, how can they make the cable pay, towing only five boats in a canal, through locks, when the tow-boats on the Hudson River must have from 40 to 60 boats to make a reasonable profit, with no locks to interrupt them. This freighting must be done with a propeller and barge, which are run by one crew by pushing the barge with the propeller, carrying 15,500 bushels of wheat, viz., the propeller 7,200 and the barge 8,300 bushels. The system has been in use eight years on the Illinois and Michigan Canal. It has superseded the horse-boats and successfully competes with the railroads. My opinion is based upon actual experience of 30 years on the canals, 10 of which I have owned and ran steam canal-boats. I sincerely trust that you will give this a space in your valuable paper, knowing that you are interested in the cause of cheap transportation.

ST. ANN'S CHURCH FOR DEAF MUTES.

To the Editor of the New-York Times:

This church was founded on the first Sunday of October, 1852, and from that time to the present has been the only one in this City which has specially cared for the deaf mute men and women. It has always maintained a Sunday afternoon service for them in the sign language, while it has had, of course, other services for its hearing and speaking parishioners. Its seats have always been free to all. For several years it has had a mission chapel in West Eighteenth street, near Eighth avenue, where it has done an extensive work among the poor. When it bought its present property in Eighteenth street, near Fifth avenue, in July, 1859, it assumed a mortgage of $50,000. This has been reduced to $20,000, and is provided for by legacies. For the last three years, the income of this church has fallen somewhat short of its expenses, so that it now has a note of $3,000 to be paid on the 6th of February. The parishioners are striving to raise $1,500. On account of the work which St. Ann's, with its free seats, is doing among deaf mutes, and also among the poor generally, I trust that other friends will contribute toward making up the balance. AN APPEAL TO THE CHARITABLE.

To the Editor of the New-York Times:

Allow me to say in reference to the relief for the destitute, in behalf of whom I have received and am continually distributing sums of money, that if the charitably disposed would only send—as an unknown friend did yesterday—some cast-off clothing, it would be as thankfully received as money, and would in a great many cases be more beneficial, and enable those who, through extreme distress, have parted with their last warm and decent garment, to go out once more into the world as respectable members of society and obtain employment. How many men and women obtain from going into a church and keep their children from attending the Sunday-school for want of decent clothing, only a clergyman who is constantly visiting the poor can know.

I would make an especial appeal for men's and boys' clothing, although every kind will be gladly received and acknowledged. Parcels may be sent to the church or to my address, or, on receiving intimation to that effect, will be sent after.

MADISON AVENUE CARS.

To the Editor of the New-York Times:

I see the question of heating the street cars has come before a committee of the Common Council. Without giving an opinion as to the advisability of this plan, I would like to call the attention of our Madison Avenue Line to the very cold and uncomfortable condition of some of their cars running up to Eighty-sixth street this cold Winter weather. I mean those cars with perforated board seats and bare board backs, the sight of which is enough to chill one. To take a seat for one hour, down town or up, is next to freezing, and involves great danger of taking cold. The doctors pronounce it dangerous for very many persons. Now, when those cars can be made comfortable—comparatively so—by covering the seats and backs and making the cars tight—all so easy to be done—it seems to me surprising that the company has not done it. I hope the company will take thought enough of us people living up in the neighborhood of Yorkville, patronizing their line daily, to accede to our wishes in this respect, and for which they will receive our thanks. A DRUID'S WIDOW GETS A VERDICT.

The St. Louis Republican of the 18th inst. says: "The case of Margaret Barbaro against the Grand Grove of the Ancient Order of Druids and Occidental Grove No. 16 of the State of Missouri, was tried yesterday before Judge Lindley. The plaintiff is the widow of James S. Barbaro, who died Oct. 14, 1869. The widow brings action to recover $200 from the Grove, of which it is claimed her husband was a member in good standing at the time of his death. The by-laws of the order provide that in case of the death of a member in good standing, $40 shall be paid to the family for the expense of the funeral and $5 per month for three years thereafter. Payment was resisted on the ground that the deceased died when not in good standing, being more than 13 weeks in arrears with his dues, which, by the by-laws, causes him to be declared 'out of dues' and not entitled to benefits. The plaintiff held that the reason of his being in arrears was that during the time covered by the arrears deceased was sick, and therefore unable to pay. The case was originally brought before Justice Peter Powers, whence a change of venue was taken to Justice Smith, where plaintiff gained the case. An appeal was taken to the Circuit Court, and on trial the jury gave a verdict of $134 16 in favor of plaintiff."

LOW PRICES IN THE MARKETS.

Cheapness is now a feature of the markets. There is an abundance of produce arriving daily from all quarters, and dealers are anxious to get rid of it at small profits. Shrewd buyers can make their own terms. Meats are not dearer than they were last week, and poultry is cheaper. Game has not been lower priced for years. Quail, grouse, partridges, all kinds of wild ducks, except canvas-back—which are scarce—venison, rabbits, and hares—the latter as good as the article imported from Germany—are, at the prices current, within the reach of people of moderate incomes. Butter is in liberal supply, and buyers who are not very fastidious as to color, can buy something of a very good flavor at reasonable rates. "Orange County butter" is held at higher prices than it should be, in view of the fact that there is so large a quantity of good butter arriving from the West and other sections, which is now incumbering the cellars and store-rooms of wholesale dealers, and which is nearly as good as the best "Orange County" ever churned. Cheese of really excellent quality is rather dear; the demand from England, where it is regarded as one of the staples of life, keeping the price up to a high standard. Fresh eggs are no cheaper, the snow and sleet in the country reducing production very materially. The mild weather now prevailing has, however, the tendency to make dealers less exacting and prices for this great necessity will fall unless there should be another great snow-storm over a large area of territory. There is no advance in the prices for fruit in season. Apples, oranges, Catawba grapes and cranberries are in excessive supply, and dealers have considerable trouble to rid themselves of their stocks, which are every day rapidly accumulating in their storehouses. There is a sufficient supply of vegetables to meet the general demand, and prices are pretty low for everything, except for Irish and sweet potatoes. Onions, squash, turnips, beets, carrots, leeks, parsley, &c., are cheap enough to satisfy the most economical.

HINTS ON THE MAKING OF BREAD.

As a most difficult branch of a housekeeper's duties, bread-making requires a generous stock of patience and a vast deal of experience. The skill of it is in no sense intuitive, but acquired through repeated failures and doubtful successes; and even the accepted receipt of many a housewife makes a poor apology for a perfect loaf of bread. The best of receipts gets hard usage in unskilled hands, and the indifference which much bread-making betrays would spoil any rule, and offend any table. Teaching is worth something, but in this, as in most other skilled employments, experience is everything. The Women's Centennial Committee, who compiled the National Cookery-Book, consider the chief evil of much bread-making to be the use of saleratus or other baking powder, and enjoin upon their sisters to do away with this vicious custom. Were there no such thing as saleratus, considering the uses to which it is often put, the dining tables of the present generation would perhaps offer a more wholesome diet, certainly a more acceptable bread where such a powder is now used; and were the common and unhealthy biscuits, with their so frequently sulphur-streaked surfaces, which require special training of the stomach for even a passable digestion, driven away from every dining-room, the effect would be of immense importance.

Mr. Tegetmeier, in his Handbook, explains the process by which bakers make their bread so light and spongy. They mix a little of the flour they are about to use with water and the yeast, and set it to rise some time before mixing up the mass of dough. In this way less yeast is required, and by this whole "sponge" acting as a ferment, the bread is much better and softer than is made in the ordinary way. The rising of the dough is quickened by adding to the sponge a small quantity of mashed boiled potatoes. To make half a peck of flour into bread on this system, mash three-fourths of a pound of well-boiled mealy potatoes through a coarse sieve or colander, and mix with a pint of flour; mix an ounce and a half of German dried yeast, with a pint and a half of lukewarm water, and strain into the flour and potatoes; beat up the whole into a batter; cover over with a blanket and set by the fire to rise. In two hours, if kept quite warm, this will have risen considerably and constitutes the "sponge." Beat this with the hand very perfectly and mix with a pint and a half of nearly blood-warm water, (92° Farrenheit,) and pour into half a peck of flour, which has already had one and one-fourth ounces of salt mixed with it. Knead the whole into dough and let rise in a warm place—two hours in warm weather, but longer in cold weather. Then turn out on a floured table, divide into pieces suitable for loaves, and knead lightly and together with only flour enough to keep it from adhering to the table. For a still lighter bread a portion of the dough, when ready for the oven, should be well kneaded, with flour enough to make it rather solid, divided into small loaves or rolls, placed on a slightly greased tin, and set in a very warm place to rise again. Then wash over the loaves with a little milk, and bake for about 20 minutes. Upon taking from the oven cover with a cloth to prevent the outside from becoming hard. Stale bread, which is far more healthy than new, may be made soft and palatable by covering closely with a tin and placing it for half an hour in a very moderately-heated oven.

RECEIPTS FOR THE TABLE.

A FRUGAL BREAKFAST.—Take a beef kidney, wash and let it stand 15 minutes in cold water; then put on to cook in cold water with a little salt; cut off the fat and slice the kidney thin and return to saucepan on the fire; cover with hot water, just enough for the gravy; salt and pepper to taste; add a bay leaf, butter size of walnut, rolled in brown flour, and stew till gravy is thick enough; turn this on hot buttered toast; a bit of onion may be added if desired. Sibyl will find it a very good breakfast dish, costing 10 or 12 cents.—HOUSEKEEPER.

A RELISH FOR BREAKFAST.—Take one-fourth pound fresh cheese, cut it in thin slices, put it in a frying-pan, turning over it a large cupful sweet milk; add one-fourth teaspoonful dry mustard, a pinch of salt and pepper, and a piece of butter the size of a butternut; stir the mixture all the time. Roll three Boston crackers very fine, and sprinkle in gradually, then turn at once into a warm dish; to be sent to table immediately.—AUNT ADDIE.

OTHER BREAKFAST DISHES.—Smoked salmon soaked three or four hours in plenty of warm water, then dried in a towel, and broiled until hot through; butter and serve very hot. Also the thick part of salt codfish soaked until quite fresh, and boiled, and buttered while hot, is very palatable.—AUNT ADDIE.

DINNER FOR TWELVE.

First Course.—Oysters or very small round clams on shell.

Second Course.—Mock turtle soup. (Pale sherry after soup.)

Third Course.—Boiled sod, salmon, or bass; potatoes, fillet of beef, with mushrooms; spinnach. (Champagne.)

Fourth Course.—Frozen Roman punch.

Fifth Course.—Breast, only of birds served on toast; green peas.

Sixth Course.—Salad of lettuce.

Seventh Course.—Charlotte russe, ice cream jelly. (Claret or Rhein.)

Eighth Course.—Liqueurs, bonbons, (Madeira or Port) coffee in parlor, after guests have left the table.—EMILE DUNLAP.

BEEF-TEA, WITH SLOW MODERATE HEAT.—Take one pound of the best beef, cut it into thin slices, and scrape the meat fine. Put it, along with two-thirds saltspoonful of salt, into one pint of cold water contained in an earthen jug, and let the mixture stand two or three hours, stirring it frequently. Then place it, in the same vessel, covered, on the back part of the range, and let it come very gradually to blood heat, and no more, for any higher temperature would injure the nutriment. Then strain it through a fine sieve or muslin bag, and it is ready for use.—ARMY SURGEON.

BEEF-TEA, WITHOUT HEAT.—Take one-third of a pound of fresh beef, mutton, poultry, or game, minced very fine; place it in 14 ounces of soft, cold water, to which has been added a pinch or about 18 grains of table salt and three or four grains of muriatic acid. Stir all with a wooden spoon, and set it aside for one hour, stirring it occasionally. Then strain it through a coarse sieve, and wash the residue on the sieve by means of five additional ounces of soft water, pressing it so that all the soluble matter will be removed from the residue. Mix the two strainings, and the extract is ready for use. It should be drank freely every two or three hours.—EPICUREAN.

BROILED POTATOES WITH HAM.—Slice thick some cold cooked potatoes; place on a greased gridiron and broil brown; mince very fine some cold boiled ham, and a very little shalot, or onion and parsley; fry in butter until a light brown color; dish the potatoes neatly in a dish, and pour the ham, &c., on them. Serve very hot. This is very nice for breakfast, with coffee, boiled oat-meal, stewed prunes, and hominy croquettes.—HOUSEKEEPER.

SPICED BEEF.—Chop very fine the tough end of two beef cakes, a piece of suet as large as half an egg; season with pepper, salt, summer savory, and a very little nutmeg; add two well-beaten eggs; half a pint of dry bread, rolled fine; half a pint of rolled cracker; four or five tablespoonfuls sweet cream; butter the size of an egg, and make into a long loaf with flour; place in a baking-pan with a little dripping; bake until cooked and brown; turn it over several times.—AUNT ADDIE.

TO COOK PIGS' FEET AND HOCKS.—Wash very thoroughly and clean well the feet and hocks; put in a pot and cover with cold water, and a little salt if they were fresh. Boil till the meat nearly leaves the bones. If the water boils away before this time add enough to cover, and boil slowly. When cooked pour off the liquor, reserving about three cupfuls in the pot, to which add one cupful more hot water, two cupfuls vinegar, two blades mace, one small red pepper, one bay leaf, one dozen whole cloves, ditto allspice, one ounce mustard seed, one-half ounce celery seed, and more salt if necessary. Boil all together and turn into stone jar. Cut in slices two white onions; slink these among the feet and cover all tightly; ready for use in one day. The rest of the liquor that was reserved off will make delightful jelly. It must get cold to prove its being stiff. Then when wanted, heat to boiling; add the juice of three lemons, the rind of one, if it is not bitter, grated, two ounce sticks cinnamon, orange peel to taste, and two tablespoonfuls burnt sugar for coloring; or the burnt sugar may be omitted and one-half pint wine or rum added; rinse molds in cold water and strain the jelly, and pour boiling hot in the molds.—HOUSEKEEPER.

PIGS' FEET FRIED.—Take butter size of a walnut; roll in a little flour; put in a hot pan; when very hot drain some of the feet, cooked as above and cut in pieces, and fry in the butter to a rich yellow. Let them cook a little crisp and quickly. Garnish with parsley or fine celery tops.—HOUSEKEEPER.

TO FRY SCALLOPS.—Rinse in cold water, dry in towel, pepper a trifle, and roll in Indian meal, or dry cracker-crumbs. Have a pan of boiling hot fat, put them in and brown them on all sides. Remove with skimmer, place on white napkin, and place sprigs of green parsley among them. Butter or Boston crackers are the best for such uses. Or the scallops may be dropped in a well-beaten egg, then rolled in the meal or crumbs.—HOUSEKEEPER.

APPLE FRITTERS.—Make a batter, not very stiff, with one quart of milk, three eggs, and flour to bring it to a right consistency; pare and core a dozen large apples, and chop them to about the size of small peas, and mix well in the batter. Fry in lard as you do doughnuts, and eat with powdered sugar and the juice of a lemon.—SIBYL.

APPLE JELLY.—To 13 good-sized apples put one quart of water and one lemon; boil till soft, and strain. To one pint of juice add one pound of sugar, and boil 20 minutes.—SIBYL.

APPLE SNOW.—Pare and core tart, juicy apples; stew with just enough water to keep from burning; sweeten with white sugar, and beat perfectly free from lumps; when cold, add the juice of half a lemon, and, for a dish large enough for eight to ten persons, the whites of two eggs; beat the mixture until it is stiff enough to stand alone, and is as white as snow, and pour will have a delicious and elegant dessert; eat with whipped cream.—M. L. H.

ORANGE MARMALADE.—Take fine, large, ripe oranges; weigh them, and allow one pound of crushed sugar to one pound of orange; pare off the yellow rind of half the oranges; put the rind over the fire in cold water, covering very tight, and let simmer until tender; grate the yellow rind of the remaining oranges, and set aside; quarter the oranges and squeeze out all the juice and pulp, removing the seeds and white skin; put the sugar in the kettle; to each pound add one pint of cold water; allow the white of one egg to every two pounds of sugar; when the sugar is all dissolved put over the fire; let boil and skim until it is quite clear and thick; take the boiled parings and pound them to a paste in a mortar; put this in the pulp-juice and grated rind; boil all together for half an hour until it is a transparent mass. Lemon marmalade may be made in the same manner, or lemon and orange mixed; put in using lemons you must allow one-half pound more sugar.—AUNT ADDIE.

ORANGE PUDDING.—Peel and slice three or four oranges and lay in a pudding-dish with one-third cupful sugar; make a custard of one pint of milk, yolks of three eggs, one tablespoonful corn-starch, one-third cupful sugar; when cold pour over the oranges; beat the whites of three eggs and one-third cupful sugar to a froth, and pour over; put in the oven a few minutes to brown; to be eaten cold.—COUSIN MATTIE.

FRUIT CAKE.—Two pounds raisins, three pounds currants, one pound citron, one pound butter, one pound sugar, one and a half pounds prepared flour, one gill brandy, one gill rosewater, one gill molasses, and 10 eggs; spice to suit the taste; line a pan with layers of paper and butter; bake seven hours in a slow oven; raise the pan about an inch from the bottom of the oven, and place a buttered piece of paper on top to prevent scorching. This receipt has been used in my mother's family for 20 years.—MARY.

CREAM CAKE.—One cup of sugar, one of milk, one egg, one tablespoonful butter, one half-teaspoonful soda, one teaspoonful cream-tartar, two and one-half teacups cupfuls flour. Inside Filling.—One egg, one tablespoonful sugar, two of corn-starch dissolved in a very little cold milk, a small piece of butter, one pint of milk; beat the ingredients, and stir into the milk while boiling. This makes two pies.—SIBYL.

LEMON CAKE.—Three and one-half cupfuls flour, three of sugar, two of butter, nine eggs, one grateful wine, one teaspoonful saleratus, two lemons, grating the yellow rind in the flour. Squeeze the juice into a cup, and mix the saleratus in it. Stir quickly in the cake while it is foaming.—AUNT ADDIE.

LEMON JELLY CAKE.—Three cupfuls prepared flour, two cupfuls sugar, one cupful milk, five eggs, quarter of a pound of butter, a little nutmeg. For the jelly take one grated rind and juice of one lemon, half a cupful sugar, one egg, lump of butter size of a walnut; cook until it boils, stirring fast.—MARY.

ORANGE CAKE.—Two cupfuls flour, two cupfuls sugar, one-half cupful water, yolks of five and whites of three eggs, a pinch of salt, one teaspoonful baking-powder, the juice and grated rind of one orange to bake as for jelly cake; beat the two remaining whites of the two eggs to a stiff froth, add sugar and the grated rind and juice of an orange; spread each layer of cake and put in the oven a moment.—AUNT ADDIE.

FRENCH ROLLS.—Sift a pound of flour into a pan, rub into it three ounces of butter, mix in the whites of only three eggs, beaten to a stiff froth; make into a stiff dough with sufficient sweet milk, two teaspoonfuls salt, and one-half cake of Fleischmann's compressed yeast; cover closely and set by the fire; mold very softly when quite light, and divide into rolls; you can cut out round and double them together to form them into proper shape.—AUNT ADDIE.

PANCAKES.—Into one and a half quarts of flour sift one teaspoonful soda; add one egg and a little salt; make a thin batter with milk, (buttermilk is better, and if slightly frozen better still,) using two-thirds sour and one-third sweet; stir swiftly around in the middle of the dish; it will create a foam; occasionally lift the spoon and gather in the remaining flour. Wheat ground in a grist mill like corn-meal, then sifted, makes very nice bread, and pancakes equal to buckwheat.—FLAT ROCK, N. C.

SPICE PUDKES.—One pint milk, four heaping tablespoontuls flour, one tablespoonful butter browned a little in a frying pan, and carefully mixed with the batter; salt to taste. Beat well, and just before cooking stir in four heaping tablespoonfuls of fresh dry snow; fry in just enough butter to prevent burning. Roll up before dishing.—HOUSEKEEPER.

BUCKWHEAT CAKES.—One pint of buttermilk, one pint of warm water, a little salt, and three tablespoonfuls of baker's yeast; stir in buckwheat to make a thin batter; raise over night; in the morning stir in a little saleratus dissolved in hot water. Cook on and taste; if sour stir in a little more saleratus.—ANNIE B.

HOMINY CROQUETTES.—Boil hominy till well done, let it get stone cold, then mix with it salt to taste, two well-beaten eggs, one tablespoonful milk, two tablespoonfuls sifted flour with one teaspoonful baking powder mixed through it. Mix all very thoroughly. The milk may be omitted, when less flour would be needed. Have ready a frying-pan of boiling hot fat, let the pan be nearly full; take the mixture up in a spoon in shape of dough-nuts, and fry till of a rich light brown color. Let the fat boil over them, and serve very hot.—HOUSEKEEPER.

GINGER SNAPS, I.—One cupful molasses, one cupful brown sugar, one cupful shortening, one heaping teaspoonful soda dissolved in a cupful warm water; one teaspoonful ginger; mix stiff and roll thin.—COUSIN MATTIE.

GINGER SNAPS, II.—One cupful molasses; three-quarters cupful sugar, one cupful shortening, part butter, one tablespoonful ginger, one heaping teaspoonful soda, three tablespoontuls hot water, and little salt. Add flour, and mix with the hands as soft as possible. Bake in a quick oven.—HARLEMITE.

USEFUL FAMILY HINTS.

RELIEF FOR CATARRH.—Put one tablespoonful of iodo-bromide of calcium comp. into a teacupful of warm water. Snuff it up the nose night and morning. Is very cleansing and healing.

WEAK EYES.—If Violetta Moore will thoroughly bathe her eyes three times a day with water as hot as she can bear, she will find them much strengthened.

BLACKING KID BOOTS.—Put some good black ink (not finid) into an old tin cold-cream or pomatum pot; fill it about half full, and set it in a cupful of very hot water, so as to heat the ink; melt down a common tallow candle and mix thoroughly to a smooth paste, with the heated ink. This may be rubbed into kid with a piece of old flannel. It makes kid boots and shoes very durable, and the kid looks almost new as long as it lasts.—BEATRICE.

MILITARY GOSSIP.

The Forty-seventh Regiment, Brooklyn, Col. D. E. Austen commanding, is about to have a new armory. The building will be located on Bedford avenue. The old armory, at present occupied by this command, together with the land on which it stands, is to be sold, and from the fund thus obtained the expenses of putting up a new armory will be defrayed. The residents of the Eastern District favor the project, as it involves no taxation.

John J. Schermerhorn, Jr., for many years a member of the Veterans of the National Guard, Seventh Regiment, died at the residence of his father-in-law, John Jacobus, No. 70 St. Mark's place, last Thursday evening. The members of the Veteran Corps will assemble at his late residence to-day, at 2 P. M., where the funeral services will be held from whence they will escort the remains to St. Mark's Church, where the coffin will be deposited in the family vault.

Battery K, Artillery, Lieut. A. Hoelzle commanding, held its tenth annual ball at Teutonia Assembly Rooms last Wendesday evening. The attendance was large, the music was fine, and the entertainment was a complete success. The Separate Troop Cavalry, Major Karl Klein commanding, assembled at Dramatic Hall, at 8 P. M., and marched to the Assembly Rooms, parading 40 men on that occasion. Before participating in the dance, several military evolutions were executed by the troop for the edification of the guests.

The Veteran Association of the Seventy-first Regiment held their annual meeting last Friday evening, and elected the following officers for the ensuing year: Commander, Henry P. Martin; Vice Commander, Theron S. Copeland; Correspondent, F. F. Taylor; Recorder and Treasurer, J. T. Woolsey; Surgeons, C. McMillan, M. D., and James B. Reynolds, M. D.; Secretive Committee, T. S. Copeland, A. M. Underhill, Eoen Beck, W. J. Coles, and Thomas Girvan; Stewards, S. A. Bunce, T. A. Ames, and Amos L. Sea. The ninth annual meeting and anniversary dinner of this association will take place at Delmonico's on April 21.

The twenty-fourth annual meeting of the State Military Association will take place at Albany next Tuesday at 7:30 P. M. Col. Charles S. Spencer will preside. A general invitation has been extended to the National Guard throughout the State to send representatives. The annual address will be delivered in the Assembly Chamber on Wednesday evening next. Officers are requested to wear fatigue uniforms during the sessions of the association, and full-dress uniforms with side-arms on the occasion of the delivery of the annual address. After the delivery of the address the members will attend a reception to be given by Gen. Franklin Townsend at his residence.

The annual reception of Company E, Twenty-second Regiment, will take place to-morrow evening, at the Lexington Avenue Opera-house. As we have previously mentioned, there is a good deal of interest attaching to this event, owing to the resolution of the Board of Officers of this command, not to give a regimental reception this year. The companies have all subscribed liberally for tickets, and the further distribution of invitations was stopped on Friday, in order that the house might not be overcrowded. Mr. Gilmore has promised to direct the orchestra in person, and has selected several new pieces for introduction on that occasion. The Police arrangements will be under the direction of Capt. Mount, and the drivers of all carriages are requested to approach the Opera-house from the west, passing the entrance on Fifty-eighth street to the east.

Company A, Thirteenth Regiment, has elected civil officers for the present year, as follows: President, Watkins W. Jones; Vice President, Jacob David; Recording Secretary, Neptune A. Wilson; Financial Secretary, William A. Ludden, Jr.; Treasurer, Charles Bunce; Finance Committee, Maurice Faucon, George W. Parker, and W. H. Vanderveer; Armory Committee, David Ludlum, A. Gay, and R. N. Decker; Recruiting Committee, N. A. Wilson, C. Bunce, and George Dowling; Court-martial, Maurice Faucon, W. H. Vanderveer, C. D. Morris, and H. H. Handover. First Lieut. Robert Rae, of this command, has resigned, and Sergt. W. A. Ludden has been chosen as his successor. Corp. F. G. Bruther has been returned to the ranks. N. A. Wilson and Hayward Smith have been elected Sergeants, and George Dowling has been promoted Corporal. W. H. Smith, Jr., has been appointed Quartermaster Sergeant.

At First Division Head-quarters the parade returns of the Seventh Regiment for the uniform fund have been received. They are based on a quota of 792 men. The Eighth Regiment claim is for 489 men. The resignation of First Lieut. James L. Cook of the Eighth Regiment, has been received. The resignations of the following officers in the Third Regiment Cavalry have been received and forwarded to Albany: George W. Sauer, Capt. H. H. Featterman, Capt. H. Schmidt, Commissary of Subsistence; Second Lieut. Diedrich Buhrje, First Lieuts. F. Freedenthal and John H. Prigge, all having served their full terms. Frederick Storck has been elected Second Lieutenant of Troop B, and John G. Koehe First Lieutenant, and Henry Deode Second Lieutenant of Troop F. The transfer of First Lieut. John J. Behringer, of Company G, to Company A, Seventh Regiment, has been approved.

Lieut. Col. F. W. Obernier has issued an order assuming command of the Twenty-eighth Regiment, Brooklyn. The commissions of officers of this command will assemble in fatigue uniform for instruction and drill, at the armory, as follows: Mondays, Jan. 22 and 29, and Feb. 5. Assembly at 7:45 P. M., and roll call at 8 P. M. Capt. William Heerdt, Inspector of Rifle Practice, and acting Adjutant, will act as instructor, and Capt. H. Osterman will act as Assistant Instructor. Wing drills are ordered as follows: Right wing, Companies A, C, I, and B, on Thursdays, Jan. 25, Feb. 8, March 1 and 15. Left wing, Companies D, G, H, and K, Thursdays, Feb. 1 and 15, March 8 and 22. The non-commissioned staff officers are under orders to report in fatigue uniform at regimental head-quarters every Thursday at 8 P. M. Twenty-five members of this command qualified as marksmen at Creedmor last Summer.

The left wing of the Seventy-first Regiment, Companies G, C, E, I, and F, Col. Richard Vose commanding, will assemble in fatigue uniform with white belts at the State Arsenal, on Friday evening next, for drill and instruction. Major E. A. McAlpine has been detailed as instructor of the wing. Company K, Capt. Robert S. Orsor commanding, will hold its annual reception at its armory next Wednesday evening. This company bears a first-class reputation as a host, and will no doubt receive its guests, as on former occasions, in good style. Civil officers and committees for the ensuing year have been appointed as follows: President, Capt. Robert S. Orsor; Vice President, First Lieut. S. A. Taylor; Financial Secretary, Charles A. Piercy; Recording Secretary, John D. Sherry; Treasurer, James H. Boosstill; Finance Committee, Lieut. S. A. Taylor, Lawrence McKown, and Frank E. Towers; Recruiting Committee, Sergt. Charles A. Piercy, Corp. James Bishop, and B. A. Vickers; Armory Committee, Sergt. F. L. Hynsun, Corp. F. K. Mawhinney, and J. O'Berne; Court-martial, Sergt. Louis J. Sniffen, Sergt. John R. Servers, Sergt. Le Grand McKown, Jacob B. Sherwood, and John Bowden.

The right wing of the Twenty-second Regiment, Companies D, E, A, H, and G, assembled for drill at the regimental armory, on Friday evening last. Col. Porter was in command, and Lieut. Col. John T. Camp was present, and ably assisted the Colonel in manœuvering the battalion. Adjutant Lepner equalized the command into five companies of 16 files front, and turned over the command to the Colonel 10 minutes after assembly was sounded. Col. Porter drilled the battalion for over two hours, in simple and complex movements, in close and open column. The evolutions of marching in line of battle, column of fours, and column of companies, were very finely done. The left wing, comprising Companies F, C, I, K, and B, will drill in similar movements at the regimental armory next Friday evening. The entire regiment will parade for review by Brig. Gen. Ward on Wednesday evening, the 31st inst. After the review a grand promenade concert will take place. The music will be furnished by Gilmore's Band. At an election in Company E last Monday evening, Capt. Andrew Gilsey, of Brig. Gen. Vilmar's Staff, was chosen Captain, to fill the vacancy caused by the resignation of Capt. Wilmot M. Dunning. Capt. Gilsey has manifested considerable military talent in the exercise of his duties on the Second Brigade Staff, and will no doubt prove a valuable acquisition to the regiment. The following non-commissioned officers were elected at the same meeting: Sergeants, Privates Victor F. Muldhof and William B. Smith; Corporal, Everett Llewellyn Clapp.

Brig. Gen. Frederick Vilmar, commanding the Second Brigade, has issued an order dissolving the Brigade Examining Board, and appointing a new one, consisting of Col. Frederick Unbekant, Eleventh Regiment, Lieut. Col. W. H. Chaddock, Seventy-first Regiment, and Major John T. Pryer, Ninth Regiment. Lieut. Andrew Gilsey, of the Brigade Staff, will not act as Recording Secretary. The Board will convene at the armory of the Seventy-first Regiment on the third Wednesday of each month, at 8 P. M. A court-martial has been appointed in this command to convene at the armory of the Ninth Regiment, on Monday, Feb. 5, at 8 P. M. Col. James R. Hitchcock, Ninth Regiment, Lieut. Col. Albert P. Stewart, Eleventh Regiment, and Major E. A. McAlpin, of the Seventy-first Regiment, will compose the court. Major Joseph Korb, Brigade Judge Advocate, will attend the court. Gen. Vilmar and staff have received an invitation from Adjt. Gen. Townsend to attend a reception at his residence in Albany next Wednesday evening. The quarterly returns just received from the Seventy-first Regiment show a muster of 614, a decrease of 16 in the last quarter. This apparent decrease is due mainly to the dropping from the roll of a number of members of the old Company A, who cannot be found since the inspection. A regimental court-martial has been ordered in the Seventy-first Regiment, to convene at the armory on Friday, Feb. 9, at 8 P. M. Capt. M. L. Vantine will preside. The resignation of Capt. Edwin C. Imlay, of Company C, Seventy-first Regiment, has been forwarded to General Head-quarters. Capt. Imlay has been appointed to a position in the United States Signal Service.

The second battalion drill of the Fourteenth Regiment, Brooklyn, Col. McLeer commanding, took place at its armory last Wednesday evening. Nine companies paraded unequalized. First Lieut. Cuits, of Company H, was detailed as acting Adjutant for the occasion. The drill was a considerable improvement over that held on the 12th inst., and at its conclusion Col. McLeer, addressing his men, stated that when the regiment next assembled for drill, it would be under more pleasant auspices. The armory, which is about to undergo repairs, it is expected will be in readiness for use about July 1, next. Col. McLeer recommended that during the intervening time it would be well for the several companies to meet on their regular evenings at the rooms provided for the purpose, and to endeavor to continue the work of recruiting as much as possible. The Board of Officers of the Twenty-third Regiment have offered the use of their armory to Col. McLeer for battalion drills until his own building can be used, and the latter will probably take advantage of the opportunity occasionally. At a recent meeting of Company H, the following civil officers were elected for the ensuing year: Secretary, J. J. Turpie; Treasurer, Henry Schnepf; Recruiting Committee, L. E. Merrifield, John F. York, and J. Elias; Court-martial, W. R. Owens, Ezra Green, and J. J. Boughton; Finance Committee, John Cuits, John F. York, and Oscar Schweig. The following civil officers have been elected in Company F: President, Corp. G. H. Youngs; Vice President, W. E. King; Treasurer, Lieut. J. J. Gould; Financial Secretary, Sergt. A. C. Hillman; Recording Secretary, Sergt. T. Terhune.

A court-martial for the trial of officers of the First Brigade has been appointed by Brig. Gen. Ward, to convene at the armory of the Twenty-second Regiment on Monday, Feb. 12, at 8 P. M. The following officers will comprise the court: Col. Josiah Porter, Twenty-second Regiment; Lieut. Col. S. V. R. Cruger, Twelfth Regiment; Lieut. Col. Peter Krueger, Fifth Regiment; Major Charles A. Peabody, Jr., Judge Advocate. Gen. Ward has issued an order directing regimental commanders to cause the officers of their commands to be instructed in the principles of rifle practice, and will assemble the officers for this purpose upon three occasions previous to Feb. 28 next. Regimental commanders will be held responsible during the coming shooting season for any incapacity on the part of company officers in giving instruction in rifle practice to the men under their charge. The commanders of the several companies are under orders to convene three drill nights between Feb. 1 and April 30, in instructing their men in rifle practice; from one-hour to an hour and a half each evening will be devoted to this exercise. The mode of operations observed will be as follows: The company will be divided into squads, according to the knowledge of the subject possessed by the different men, and commandants are directed to see that each squad is given its required instruction. Particular attention will be paid to aiming drill and to the positions for firing while standing, kneeling, or lying down, and the commandants of companies will be held responsible for the degree of progress attained by the men under their command. Regimental Inspectors of Rifle Practice are directed to attend to these drills and to assist the company commanders in the instruction of their men. They will also be required to make written reports monthly to brigade head-quarters through their regimental commanders, of the number present at each drill, and the result attained by the course of instruction. In closing the order, Gen Ward says: "A noticeable feature of the rifle practice last season at Creedmoor, was the ignorance of a large number of the men in the firing position, and much valuable time was unprofitably consumed in instructing these men in matters in which they should have had a clear idea before they left the drill-room, and much time would have been saved if all the officers had been capable of imparting the necessary instruction."

Col. David E. Auston, of the Forty-seventh Regiment, Brooklyn, has prepared and had printed a manual for street firing for a regiment of infantry, in conjunction with a howitzer or Gatling battery. It is assumed that the infantry shall be armed with breech-loaders, and the advantages claimed are rapidity of firing, complete command of intersecting streets, and of the street in the rear of column; a defense against attacks from house-tops; compactness of formation and protection to the flanks, and an effective opposing force against mobs. It is to be hoped that the opportunity to use either infantry or artillery, or both combined, in this or any other city, will not soon present itself; but that time may come, hence a brief reference to Col. Austen's pamphlet may be permitted. The manual before us embraces almost innumerable instructions which would be of little use in actual warfare. To drill a regiment so that it will be useful in case of a riotous demonstration on the part of an armed mob, requires only a careful understanding of Upton's Tactics. It is only necessary to remember that there is a great difference between firing at Creedmoor targets and firing on an armed enemy; between drilling in an armory or in the park and going through necessary battalion or company movements in a time of great danger. In the latter emergency the fewer commands issued the better, and though the manual may be a good thing for smoothing young officers to understand, its real merits would be greater were the instruction simplified. It used to be calculated that to kill a man in battle, his weight, in lead was required. Nowadays, a fair calculation is about 30 rounds fired for each man disabled, at an average of 80 yards distance. Thus, when either rank of the leading company had delivered one volley but one man of the opposing force would be disabled, and when the enemy returned the fire the casualties would be equal. The fact, however, that a charge would probably be made by the mob seems to have been lost sight of. It is true, the compiler provides a partial protection, in case of danger, to the battery, but it he must go into details, then there should be further precautions taken. The commands to fix bayonets and to guard against infantry are more necessary in a pamphlet of this kind than "right dress," "left dress," or orders of similar import. Though the bayonet is despised and cannon cried up by many members of the modern school, the influence of both is alike chiefly moral, and this is particularly true of the former in street fighting. The bayonet will best restrain a mob in narrow thoroughfares, and, as a rule, few men will dare to throw themselves upon it. The pamphlet is well printed, and Col. Austen has evidently given his subject much attention

THE RUSSIAN CHURCH.

THE NUMBER OF DISSENTERS—ESTABLISHMENT OF NEW RELIGIOUS COMMUNITIES FORBIDDEN.

The Russian St. Petersburg Gazette, in an article on the Russian Church, observes that the number of dissenters in Russia has very much increased of late, especially among the masses of the population, and that even in the higher classes of society the mystical doctrines of fashionable preachers and the manifestations of "spiritualists" have undermined the influence of the orthodox clergy. This is certainly not due to any excessive tolerance by the Government of sectarianism, for "the State could not do more to support orthodoxy than it does, unless it adopted a system of intolerance like that practised in the Middle Ages." The writer next enumerates the laws which are now in force for the protection of the State Church in Russia. "If a member of the orthodox Church changes his religion, both he and the person who instigated him to do so are punished. When the adopted religion is a non-Christian one, the instigator is punished with hard labor; when it is the Roman Catholic or a Protestant faith, he is banished; and when it is that of a Russian sect, he is 'interned.' As for the person who leaves the orthodox Church, he is in every case placed at the disposal of the ecclesiastical authorities for suitable correction, and his property is sequestrated. Members of the orthodox Church are forbidden to marry non-Christians, and the children of mixed marriages (except only in the Baltic provinces) are bound, under severe penalties, to be brought up in the orthodox religion. The right of propogating religious doctrines is possessed exclusively by the State Church; the members of other religions are not even allowed to convert pagans to Christianity. The establishment of new religions communities, too, is strictly forbidden. And yet, though the State thus protects the orthodox Church, the latter is daily losing ground to the Empire. It is not the fault of the State that, notwithstanding such severe protective laws, the Tchouvashes, Toheremisses, and other alien races are being converted in masses to Mohammedanism; that whole villages which were regarded as orthodox are now found to be Mohammedan; that the Mohammedan propaganda is rapidly spreading northward, while the orthodox propaganda finds but few supporters."

A HORSE TRADE.

The Putnam County Standard of last week has the following: "A youth nick-named 'Pickles' owned a horse a few days ago which he sold for $2, Capt. Manville, who keeps a boarding-house at the dam, being the purchaser. Soon after a couple of tramps drawing a hand-sled loaded with two trunks came along, when Mr. Manville asked them if they did not want to buy a horse to draw their sled. The tramps thought favorable of the proposition, and concluded to take the horse, for which they gave the Captain $2 50, a shot-gun, a buck-saw, a beetle and wedges, and a violin."

LONGS "CENTRAL AFRICA."

CENTRAL AFRICA: NAKED TRUTHS OF NAKED PEOPLE. An Account of the Expeditions to the Lake Victoria N'yanza and the Makraka-Niam-Niam, West of the Bahr-el-Abiad, (White Nile.) By Col. C. Chaille Long, Chief of the Egyptian Staff. New-York: Harper & Brothers.

Since the days of Mungo Park the heart of Africa has been a point of fascination that never ceases to attract those travelers who find excitement in the dangers of wild and unknown lands, inhabited by barbarous and savage tribes. Among the latest explorers of this almost inaccessible portion of the globe is Col. C. Chaillé Long, for several years an officer in the Egyptian Army, and one of the most daring and intrepid searchers after geographical novelty that ever followed in the steps of Baker and Livingstone. The history of his two expeditions—one to the Lake Victoria N'yanza in 1874, and the other to Makraka-Niam-Niam, west of the White Nile, in 1875, together with the results of his explorations—he has recently embodied in a volume which will form a valuable addition to our already somewhat copious literature on Africa.

In the preface to his work the author says:

"Influenced by the judgment of kind and perhaps too indulgent friends, I have prepared for publication these 'Naked Truths of Naked People,' in the crude language of a soldier, and with the view alone of faithfully recounting the stirring incidents of my different expeditions; of promulgating correct views respecting the country, the nature and customs of the negro, and of paying an appropriate tribute to the character of the enlightened Sovereign, (Ismail Pasha, Khedive of Egypt,) under whose auspices the work of Central African regeneration is being carried forward."

Having joined Col. C. G. Gordon, C. B., of the Royal Engineers of the English Army, the newly-appointed Governor General of the Equatorial Provinces of Egypt, at Cairo, the writer, by request of Col. Gordon, was designated as Chief of Staff of the expedition, and with him Lieut. Hassan Wassif, Aide de Camp, also an officer of the General Staff of the Egyptian Army. On the 21st of February, 1874, the party started by special train for Suez, and from thence pursued the wonted lines of African travel, reaching Khartoum, a town on the left bank of the Blue Nile, 20 days' journey from Cairo, on the 13th of March. Upon leaving this point, Col. Long says: "As the steamer turns the point at the junction, and enters the Bahr-el-Abiad, at a slackened speed in stemming its swift current, I cast a long, lingering look behind, as the last haunt of civilization fades from view, ere I turn to brave the uninviting future that awaits the traveler in Central Africa." Their objective point was Gondokoro, the prospective seat of Government of the Governor General. Situated on the right bank of the river, Gondokoro is little more than a military encampment, composed of straw huts inclosed in a high palisade of straw; a little stream, running through marshy and at times flooded land, bounds the north side of the encampment. The brick "canissa" (church) has been long since pulled down by the "Baris," and served, mixed with grease, to besmear their bodies with the favorite red color they affect. Col. Long met with every discouragement from his friends at the encampment, but he determined to push on. Owing to a combination of circumstances which he does not consider it necessary to detail, he was compelled to start before the arrival of his baggage and supplies. "This," he says,

"Was an act of folly that might have cost dear both to myself and to my companions, but it was dictated to me by a sentiment of duty. That mysterious region, the Lake Victoria N'yanza, the source of the Nile, was the Eldorado of Central African explorers, to unlock whose difficult and hidden secrets, and explore the uncertain and unknown link between the two lakes, Victoria and Albert, was still in the geographical world a consummation devoutly to be wished for. Alone at Gondokoro I sought the key to unlock the forbidden door, and determined to brave all danger, 'to set my life upon the cast, and stand the hazard of the die.'"

Unfortunately for Col. Long, only two soldiers, in the weakened condition of the garrison, could be detailed to his service, and these with two unfaithful and useless servants and a miserable wretch in exile, Ibrahim Effendi, in the capacity of dragoman, composed his staff, the latter unfortunately only adding to the obstacles interposed by savages and by the elements. To these, however, was added a troop of 80 ivory hunters. They accompanied him a considerable distance, and thus his advance southward within the line of military posts, extending to Foueira, near Karuma Falls, was rendered comparatively secure. At this, the last military post on his route, Col. Long was compelled to remain several days on account of illness, but on the morning of the 25th of May, after many attempts that had proved vain, he started southward with the followers heretofore mentioned, with the addition of a native named "Selim," who was familiar with the language spoken in the Uganda territory, which borders on the Lake Victoria N'yanza.

The story of their march onward to the hill where stands the palace of M'Tsé, King of Uganda, is a melancholy one. In addition to the dangers incurred by traversing the territories of hostile tribes, the miseries to be endured from the climate are almost indescribable. On the 30th of May the Colonel writes:

"We marched seven hours and a half to-day through rain and mud; the water that we are obliged to drink is execrable; the spongy earth quickly absorbs the rain, save that which here and there collects in great holes, the tramping ground of elephant and buffalo. The water is a mixture of their excretions, and of this, with tongue parched with fever, we are obliged to drink. Fetid odors arise from the black marshy ground, and almost asphyxiate us as we pass over it."

Further on he adds:

"Day after day we march through rain, bog and slime, over the marshy earth. Rain and misery by day, misery and rain by night, with the addition of the chilly atmosphere—these may be accepted as the leading incidents of the route."

Arrived at the palace of M'Tsé, the narrative gains in interest. The monarch is described as being "scarcely 35 years of age; certainly more than six feet high; his face is nervous, but expressive of intelligence. From his large restless eye a gleam of fierce brutality beams out that mars an otherwise sympathetic expression; his features are regular and complexion a light copper tint. He is dressed in a long cloak, common in fashion with that worn by the better class of Arab merchants. The texture is of blue cloth, trimmed with gold; around his head, in graceful folds, is wound a white turban; his waist encircled by a belt in gold, richly wrought, from which is suspended a Turkish scimitar; his feet are encased in sandals of Moorish pattern, procured from Zanzibar."

Having been admitted to an audience, Col. Long addressed his Highness in Arabic as follows:

"O, M'Tsé, great King of Africa, I have come in the name of the great Sultan at Cairo to present you his gracious salutations. The world has heard of a great African King, and my august sovereign, in sending me to him, wishes me thus to express his kindly friendship and interest for one for whom he wishes only continued health and greatness."

This was received with expressions of delight by the court and with evident pleasure by the monarch himself. Hereafter the relations between Col. Long and M'Tsé were of the friendliest character, although the latter's method of entertainment was not calculated to charm his visitor. At every interview a number of human sacrifices took place, these exhibitions of bloodshed being esteemed among the followers of M'Tsé as the highest compliment that could be paid to a stranger.

On one point, however, the monarch remained firm. For a long time he absolutely refused to listen to Col. Long's project of visiting Lake N'yanza and returning by the river. Finally, he yielded in regard to the lake, but the return by the river was flatly refused. "No," said he "you must not go; you will be killed; the river does not go as you think, to Mrooli; it goes away to the eastward. You will be lost and die of hunger, or be killed, and then your Sultan will come and kill me." Exhausted with illness, and emaciated through the scanty nourishment afforded by African fare, Col. Long set out for the lake, having been the guest of M'Tsé for more than a month. A short journey brought him to Murchison Creek—so named by the Explorer Speke—a small bayou at the head of the lake. His intention of crossing it was, however, frustrated by the dusky monarch. M'Tsé, fearful that he might die in the attempt, had secretly instructed his men not to take Col. Long across the lake, but in everything else to obey his orders.

Compelled to relinquish this design, the Colonel immediately dispatched a messenger to M'Tsé, demanding assistance and the requisite escort to conduct him to Urondogani, the point from which he hoped to return, via the river, to Foueira, should the river permit; a point from which Speke had been driven by hostile tribes, and which even M'Tsé assured him was not connected by the river with that place. The escort was furnished, and after enduring untold hardships and misery, the dauntless explorer finally reached Urondogani. In defiance of the advice of friendly savages, and although himself tormented with doubt, Col. Long followed the course of the river northward, and early in August entered the lake since called Ibrahim. Of this discovery he speaks thus: "I entertained now no doubt that Mrooli lay not far distant; and with a light heart I thought that on the morrow I should meet Selim, [who had been dispatched along the old route with instructions to meet the party here,] procure rations, or, if necessary, take the land route direct for Foueira; proud of having established the connection of the Victoria Nile with this point, (and Lake Albert,) and of having added another great basin to the equatorial water-shed, in the discovery of Lake Ibrahim."

Between this point and Mrooli, however, Col. Long was attacked by hostile tribes; Selim had not arrived, and starvation stared them in the face; the sufferings they endured seemed likely to end in death before the result of their labors could be made known to the world. The little party were about to succumb to despair, when one morning, in answer to a last volley of shot, they heard a bugle-call. It came from the detachment at Foueira. They were saved, and the result of their perilous expedition was an addition to our former knowledge of Africa, which, together with other good achieved, has been summed up by Col. Long in the following words:

"1. M'Tsé, King of Uganda, had been visited and the proud African monarch made a willing subject, and his country, rich in ivory and populous, created the southern limit of Egypt.

2. The Lake Victoria N'yanza had been partially explored; not thoroughly, owing to my helpless and almost dying condition at the time.

3. The Victoria River, leaving the Lake from Urondogani, (from whence Capt. Speke had been driven,) had been explored, for the first time, as far as Karuma Falls, thus forever putting at rest all doubts, and establishing the connection between the Lake Victoria and the Lake Albert. From Urondogani to Karuma Falls the river was proved to be navigable by steamers of the greatest draft.

4. The discovery, in about Ia lude 1° 30' north, of a lake since named 'Ibrahim,' thus adding another great reservoir to the sources of the Nile—a system of basins of which the Lake Victoria and the Lake Albert were only known heretofore—the plateau southward acting as a great water-shed to the almost perpetual equatorial rains."

Having accomplished the great object of his expedition, in ascertaining the water communication between Lake Victoria and Lake Albert, Col. Long returned to Khartoum to prepare for a still more arduous expedition to the country of the Niam-Niam. He allowed himself but a short interval for rest before returning to active duty. Required to conduct a detachment of men from that post to the head-quarters of the Government of the Equatorial Provinces, he accompanied them to Lado, a place 14 miles north of Gondokoro, whither the encampment had been removed on account of the unhealthiness of the latter district. Having landed his troops safely at this point, he says:

"I now turned my attention to preparations for the expedition to the Makraka Niam-Niam country, the object of which was to open a road through the hostile Yanbari tribe that until now had barred the passage to the Makraka Niam-Niam country westward from the Nile, the occupation of which was not only to exploit its great ivory interests, but at the same time to affirm the authority of the Government in its mission of civilization. There was another consideration; the health of the Arab soldiers was precarious in the extreme. I had chosen 450 stalwart men when at Khartoum, from a battalion of 800 men. They arrived in good health, but they fell ill in great numbers; it was unquestionable, they could not stand the climate. Extra rations of tea and sugar and other luxuries were issued to them in vain. The Niam-Niam country was reputed healthy, and the only Eldorado of health in all Central Africa; it was therefore determined to occupy that country, with the double purpose of exploitation, and the re-establishment of the health of the soldiers. Besides this, I hoped that this expedition, if my health should be equal to the occasion, might serve me as a reconnoissance in an expedition I might undertake later, to open a road through the Monbutto country, unfolding the mysteries of the Akkas or Tiki-Tiki, and other strange people, whose existence vaguely signaled by both ancient and modern travelers, was still left in a dilluvian haze, in the realm of fiction; finally, I hoped to reach through these mysterious regions—the Atlantic!"

The miseries endured by Col. Long and his party during his second expedition were of a similar character with those he encountered in the first. Making his way successfully among the anthropophagi to the Niam-Naim country he thus describes a potentate of that region:

"The Makraka Niam-Niam Sheik is par excellence the greatest 'fat' of all sheiks yet encountered. His coiffure is an object of the greatest care, and the most intricate detail of plaits, that in many cases, notwithstanding the unwilling crispy hair, is reduced into several long cues that hang down behind. The moustache and imperial, though not of luxuriant growth, are traced in points, that lend a very distinguished expression to a figure not unlike that of a cavalier of the six teenth century. The nose and ears are pierced with a copper ring, the neck is encased in finely-wrought copper wire, well burnished, as are the legs and arms. The loins are covered with a cotton cloth, from which is suspended a huge knife, which, with the shield, is their common weapon."

In describing the women of the country he says:

"They are short in stature, with well-shaped, diminutive hands and feet. Like the men, their ankles, arms, and neck are encased in a perfect coat of mail, either of steel or copper, the rings around the ankles clanking with great noise as they walk. The head is kept painfully elevated by the choking necklace, while the ears, nose, and mouth are either brass or iron clad. The coiffure, that seems their sole occupation, as it is performed reciprocally, is fashioned much after the mode of an English damsel into a chignon behind. With this exception, the Niam-Niam female is entirely 'in puris naturalibus,' a garland of leaves being the sole attempt at covering."

Among these curious people a marriage is contracted by the suitor giving to the father of his fiancée a huge knife, with curiously wrought handle wound with copper wire. One or more are given in ratio as the lady may be valued; while the happy suitor, of course, is obliged to make the countless rings that must encircle nose, neck, ears, arms, and legs of his future spouse.

Having been much annoyed on his outward journey by attacks from straggling members of the hostile Yanbari tribe, Col. Long, whose force had been much augumented by followers from the Niam-Niam country, determined on his return to give them a lesson in the matter of warfare. After arriving near their settlements he describes the engagement in the following terms:

"The Niam-Niam were ordered to pile up their ivory, about which I threw a detail from my Soudanieh as a guard as well as a cordon of sentinels around the camp, beneath the friendly shade of a large tree where the non-combatants were ordered to assemble. With my Soudanieh and the irregulars I drove the Yanbari from the surrounding jungle, while the Niam-Niam, eager for combat, were sent flying into their midst to engage the enemy hand to hand. When the tide of war rolled away only the yells of the combatants might be heard, as the Yanbari, in full retreat, endeavored to gain the mountains in our rear.

My bugler called in vain the 'retreat.' When night came we saw the smoke and flame that seemed to envelop the whole valley around the plateau for miles in a cordon of fire; they returned only the next day at sundown, having burned at least twenty villages and captured about forty goats. My soldiers had captured 13 women and children. 'Morbi' was brought in requisition, and explained to the most intelligent-looking of the lot, who, like the men, looked like savage beasts, 'that I made war upon them, not alone because they had murdered my soldier, but that, as they had murdered and massacred the other tribes, this was to show them that in the future they should not be permitted to kill without being killed; that "Meri" was the Father of all, and as such desired peace and good will among them.' They were released and told to go and tell the Sheik what 'All Bey' had told them."

It is scarcely necessary to say that Col. Long had by no means accomplished his desired object of reaching the Atlantic Ocean by way of the Makraka Niam-Niam country; but the results of this expedition, like those of the first, he has summed up in a few words at the close of his volume:

"1. Communication had been opened from the Bahr-el-Abiad 'ri et armis'—by punishment given the Yanbari tribe—to the Niam-Niam country, rich in ivory, whose inhabitants were friendly and well disposed toward the Egyptian Government.

2. Occupation of that country by the establishment of military posts, which were to serve the double purpose of acquiring ivory in exchange for cotton, cloths, &c., and at the same time inculcating in the native habits of industry, cultivation of the soil, the raising of cattle—(he want of which has been the chief incentive to anthropophagy)—in fact, working an amelioration in the state of the negro, social, mental, and moral.

3. Extended information as to the customs, fabrics, &c., obtained of these people, specimens of whom in the interests of ethnography were brought to Cairo and presented to the Government."

Unlike many African explorers, Col. Long is by no means an enthusiast in regard to the country and its benighted inhabitants. He appears to have discovered little that is attractive or beautiful in the tropical scenery that others have written of so eloquently, and his opinion of the climate may be gathered from the following paragraph:

"A strange misconception exists as to the real climate of the equator, and may be briefly corrected here. Rain and humidity are the chronic condition of the whole of Central Africa. The month of April alone affords a slight respite, during which time the heat is excessive, but the nights are always cold, the scarcity of wood rendering the natives really miserable at night. During other months incessant rains, sometimes days on end, damp and humid, but the nights are very cold. When, however, the sun breaks through the clouds its rays are almost insupportable. On the east coast, on the equatorial line, the seasons are affected by the monsoon winds that blow north-east, and south-west, for the six months of the year; a dry wind and a wet wind. One or two rains may be supported by the European; but the latter is the precursor of all diseases, and specially of consumption, to which the native Soumali is a victim."

In speaking of the insect world, he says:

"Flies, ants, and mosquitoes are the natural pests of Africa. To evade the attacks of the latter, the negroes have no other defense than to keep themselves perpetually surrounded by a circle of fire, on which the dung of the cow is thrown, thus forming a dense smoke that from its stifling odor shields from the enemy, while the whole body is smeared with ashes, and filth of beasts, of the most revolting oder. The famous white ants, of which so much has been written, at Gondokoro, as at every point from the Saubat south to the equator, employ their energetic qualities to such an extent as to destroy almost everything, save metals, if left for 24 or 48 hours on the earth. They throw up large red mounds that rise solitary and alone, the only distinctive marks that break the monotony of the plains and marshes, and from whose tops, eight to 10 feet high, the naked savage may be seen with his foot resting upon the knee of the leg that supports him; the rigid hand clasping the lance crosswise, as a means of defense or offense—of livelihood, if he be an inhabitant of the river banks; for the lance alone serves him as a means of procuring fish, by the uncertain process of spearing them."

Equally severe is he, also, upon the inhabitants of this unhappy country. After speaking of the passion displayed by the African for human sacrifice, he adds:

"I cite these facts in the interest of truth alone, yielding to none in the desire to ameliorate the condition of the African. But in heaven's name, let those whose province it is to be the pioneers in the work, speak of him as he is, without regard to those who attribute to him virtues and ideas that, if possessed, would render him no longer a subject for missionary sympathy. Central Africa is no paradise, but a blood-stained spot, and the negro, the product of this pestiferous region, is a miserable wretch, often devoid of all tradition or belief in a Deity, which enthusiastic travelers have heretofore endeavored to endow him with. This is the naked truth that I would present to the reader, in contradiction to all those chapter-fraud pictures which are sung of this benighted country. The humanitarian may pause to consider the cost at which he sends his emissaries, in the laudable effort to humanize and civilize a country where nature has placed a barrier, not alone in the poisoned arrow of the savage, but in the more deadly poisoned air."

Col. Long's estimate of the mental and moral capacity of the natives of Central Africa is less favorable than that given by Baker, Livingstone, and other travelers, and he is far less hopeful of their elevation above their present barbarism. It is his belief that the regions he explored can be brought under the rule of civilization only by colonizing from the North. Egypt, he says:

"Holds within her domains in the region of the Upper Nile a hardy population of nomads, especially fitted for the exploitation of these countries. Inured to hardships, these Arabs, Dongolese and Nubians already entered these countries, and have been the pioneers of every traveler, except Capt. Speke and myself, in the explorations that have from time to time been made there. Under a proper régime of discipline, and the selection of good men that I have among them, I regard them as the great future civilizing element for the redemption of this country; since the white man and the Arab cannot permanently dwell in its pernicious climate."

Col. Long closes his well-written and soldier-like record of his experiences in Africa with an honest tribute of admiration to his sovereign, the Khédive of Egypt, for his efforts toward repressing the slave trade and improving the government of Equatorial Africa. To this he adds a posteript, which concludes:

"The question of the Nile sources is now no longer one of 'caput Nili quærere'—the problem of remote ages has been finally solved. The Lakes Victoria, Ibrahim, and Albert, acting as great basins of the equatorial River-shed, and fed by perpetual equatorial rains, constitute with their affluents the sources of the Nile. One other problem that may await the exploitation of the countries discovered engages the attention of the geographical world—the relation with these Lake-basins of that great affluent of the Bahr-el-Abiad, the River Saubat."

Taken as a whole, Col. Long's volume is one of unusual merit, and when the almost universal interest shown in stories of African adventure is considered, there remains little doubt that he will have a large audience of readers.

A ONE-LEGGED ELOPER.

The following romantic story is told by the Albany Times of Friday evening last: "What there is about a man 40 years old, with a wooden leg, to captivate the heart of a Massachusetts Yankee girl of 15, it is difficult to imagine. But Larkin Wilcox, who answers the description, succeeded in doing so, and they started away from Lanesboro, Berkshire County, to be married. He told her that he was very wealthy, and owned large business blocks in Albany, where he resided, but owing to poor health he had come out in the country to work on a farm, to see if he could not get better. Wilcox was arrested, and it was discovered that he was formerly an engineer on the Boston and Albany Railroad, and lost his leg by an accident which happened when he was drunk. His residence in Albany was of ten months' duration, on the ull for stealing. He was arraigned at Pittsfield, and pleaded guilty to enticing the young girl away for the purpose of marrying her against the consent of her guardian. He was sentenced to one year in State Prison, the lowest penalty allowed by the Massachusetts statute for the offense."

A SOLDIER SEVERELY PUNISHED.

A fine soldierly man, named William Felton, was charged at Aldershott, recently, with fraudulent enlistment. The prisoner pleaded guilty, and exhibited his papers, which stated that when in India he was convicted with others of culpable homicide in an affray with the native Police, and sentenced to penal servitude for life. While he was undergoing his sentence, a mutiny occurred among the convicts, and the prisoner showed such gallantry and courage in quelling the disturbance—killing four of the insurgents with his own hand—that the authorities gave him a free pardon and his passage to England. The Bench sentenced him to one month's hard labor.

PROTECTION AND FREE TRADE.

The Athenæum says: "Prof. Fawcett is writing a book on 'Protection and Free Trade.' He intends, we believe, to consider the arguments advanced by the advocates of protection in America and the Colonies, and he also means to make special inquiry into the causes which have prevented the realization of the predictions of the general adoption of free trade which were so constantly made at the time of the repeal of the corn laws, and of the negotiation of the commercial treaty with France."

AMID FOLIAGE AND BLOOM.

THE FLOWER TRADE OF NEW-YORK.

MAGNITUDE OF THE BUSINESS—THE WEALTH OF BEAUTY ON FLORISTS' TRAYS—ORCHIDS AND THEIR OWNERS—FICKLE POPULAR TASTE—COSTLY LEAVES—A FLORAL PRICE-LIST—SOME EXQUISITE AND NOVEL BOUQUETS—MRS. ASTOR'S PRETTY FANCY—A SOLEMN WARNING.

Azure petals, eloquent of faith and hope; roseate petals, fragrant with the breath of love; pallid petals, blanched to wreathe the icy brow of death; closely they lie together—as joy and grief are blended in our lives—ready to serve the impartial hands of fate and the florist. Surely there is no other branch of trade in which sentiment and the hard practicalities of business are so closely blended as in this traffic in Nature's loveliest and most fragile handiwork—foliage and bloom. Little recks the dealer for the Autocrat's pleasing fancy of the origin of tints in flowers, that—

"——each hour of daylight tells
A tale of shame so crushing.
That some turn white as sea-bleached shells,
And some are always blushing."

As little cares he for the uses of his ephemeral stock, whether it adorns the baptismal font, the marriage altar, or the tomb. All seasons and occasions are alike to him, if they equally minister to his profit. But he is by no means the rapacious gatherer of enormous gains that Charles Adolphus deems him when he fixes the price of a bouquet for C. A.'s adored one. Large as is the seeming discrepancy between the wholesale prices of flowers paid to the growers and the retail prices demanded from the public, it is in reality very small when the inevitable losses, expenses, and risks of the business are taken into account. Flowers fade very quickly, and their freshness once gone is gone forever. Rent, and tasteful, intelligent help, are heavy items of cost. The fluctuations of supply and demand are unequaled in any other business. In short, to come down to a plain statement of fact, the percentage of profit in the flower traffic, year after year, is not greater than in any other legitimate business, and is often more uncertain than most others. Still, it has tempted a great many to enter into it, more indeed than there is room for, especially in these dull times. On Broadway, Fifth, and Sixth avenues, and the up-town cross streets near them, between Third and Forty-seventh, there are 30 large florist concerns, each of which pays a rent of from $1,000 to $4,500 per annum, and does a business of from $6,000 to $40,000 yearly in ordinarily good times. Outside these, there are probably 50 small shops and parts of shops in which the sale of flowers is carried on in different parts of the City. Of course, in years such as 1876 has been and as much of 1877 as we have experienced, when people are forced to curtail their expenditures for the luxuries of life, the florists are made to feel the pressure very keenly, and those who do but a small business even in the best of times, glide quietly out of sight. One of these barks makes hardly a ripple in going down, however, and its disappearance is scarcely noted except by its immediate neighbors.

From 1860 to 1870 were the florists' good days. In that decade were established many large gardens and hot-houses, and the prevalent flush of greenbacks encouraged the growth of a popular fondness for floral decoration, greater than we had known before. Then, more than ever before, we followed the European style of ornamentation of both our homes and public places with the transitory beauty of blossom and leaf, upon all public and semi-public occasions. We not only imitated, but with characteristic Americanism, strove to excel the old world's wealth, luxury, and taste in such matters. Without doubt, too, the lavish expenditures of the ill-gotten gains of the old "Tweed "Ring" gave an impetus to the florist's trade. There was an emulative prodigality in ostentatious display among the members of that gang which was fatuous to the souls of those who ministered to it. Weddings, christenings, balls, banquets, funerals, receptions, and all other occasions of public assemblage they deemed incomplete unless a wealth of roses wreathed the tiger's neck. Thousands upon thousands of dollars were often thus lavished upon single events; as, for instance, at the wedding of Tweed's daughter, when the floral designs, bouquets, and parlor decorations are said to have cost nearly $4,000. This Winter, per contra, the most expensive floral display has been a little under $1,500, and that was for a ball in the house of a man worth several million dollars.

Since 1871 there has been no increase of note in the number of flower producers in this vicinity. The number of retail dealers has, however, increased, and this fact, added to the diminished demand, has lowered prices very materially. It is, indeed, only in the holiday week that flowers are any longer sold at such figures as the growers deem handsomely remunerative. Immediately after that short season of prosperity there is a decline in values. To illustrate this: one shipment of roses and violets sent to Boston just before New Year's brought $15 per 100 for the roses and $1 50 for the violets, but by the 10th inst. the same sorts of flowers were only worth respectively $4 and 50 cents per 100.

Few, if any, cities possess at this time greater abundance and richer varieties of flowers than New-York. Let us see what the assortment is, in this season of snow. First upon the list naturally seem to come roses. Of these there are no less than ten choice varieties: Bonseline, Saffrana, Marshal Neil, Cornelia Cook, Agrippina, Duchess of Edinboro, La Marque, General Jacqueminot, Isabella Sprunt, and Niphetos. The Bonseline is a beautiful shell pink bud, formerly known to many as the "Boston rose," from the especial fondness manifested for it by Bostonians, and the success with which their gardeners cultivated it. But a few years since New-York was almost entirely dependent upon "the Hub" for her supply of these choice flowers. Now, however, the hot-houses in the vicinity of our City, and at Madison, N. J., not only furnish all we need, but many more for exportation to Philadelphia, Baltimore, and even to Boston, upon occasion. Curiously enough, the Bonseline was—like another rose hereafter to be mentioned—popular 20 years ago, but gradually passed from view until it was only retained by the Boston gardeners, and when reintroduced to popular favor it had to be propagated from their stocks. The Saffrana is the common saffron-colored tea-rose. The Marshal Neil buds are huge golden yellow ones, magnificent in large bouquets and table designs. But a few years since they were quite rare and commanded as much as 50 or 75 cents each, sometimes even $1 for particularly fine ones; but now their production has so far increased that ordinary buds are only worth $2 per dozen, and the choicest specimens but 50 cents each. At less than these rates their cultivation would scarcely be profitable, as they are difficult to rear and are not free in blooming. The Cornelia Cook affords a bud as large as the Neil, pure white, of perfect form, and is now even more expensive than the one just described. It is commaratively new, having been introduced from England but about three years ago. The Agrippina belongs to the Bourbon rose family, is a favorite free Summer bloomer, and when reared in hot-houses supplies in Winter the place of the Gen. Jacqueminot, so far as color is concerned, but it lacks the rich perfume and size of that superb rose. The Jacqueminot, which is just now coming into bloom, and commands readily $3 per dozen wholesale, is very large, of deep red hue, and is one of the most fragrant of all the roses. The Duchess of Edinboro, a lately-introduced rose, vies with it in intensity of rich crimson color, has a very strong tea fragrance, and is quite a favorite for its profuseness and its perpetual blooming. La Marque is the well-known climbing white rose. Isabella Sprunt is the unlovely name given to a very pretty yellow rose, of lighter tint than the Marshal Neil, probably better described as a lemon color, and has a strong tea odor. The Niphetos is a variety which was popular 20 years ago, then for some inexplicable reason was allowed to die out, and has been introduced again within the past two years from England as new. Its bud is very long, and pure white. In the opinion of the most experienced gardeners it is destined to become exceedingly popular, and certainly its beauty should win for it public favor.

There are four varieties of camellias shown—the fimbriato (or fringed white), Lady Hume, alba plena (or double white,) and candidissima. The first named, with its petals of pearly white edged with a delicate fringe, is the most beautiful of all. The Lady Hume will be readily recognized by the regular star-like disposition of its thickly piled creamy petals. There has been a complete reversal of popular taste in the matter of camellias within the past four years. Not long ago nobody wanted red camellias, or variegated ones, at any price, and they were so worthless a drug in the market that gardeners cut down the stocks of those kinds to graft on the pure white varieties. Now that it is almost impossible to get them any more, the public demands them, holds them high in estimation, and turns coldly from their colorless successors, which are cheaper now than they ever were before, or, probably, ever will be again. A similar fickleness has been manifested toward the tuberose. At one time, only three or four years ago, there was a positive rage for them. No floral piece was deemed perfect unless their waxy petals dotted its surface, and their rich perfume pervaded its odors. Already, however, the demand for them has become so small that few gardeners any longer raise them, and those who do so persist rather from a desire to keep up an assortment than with the hope of making anything out of them. One person says, with a shudder, "They remind me of funerals;" another, "Their smell gives me a headache;" a third, "They are beautiful, but —No." So the result is that, although they might be expected to be seen at this season, one would find it difficult to get a bunch of them from all the florists along Broadway, W. C. Wilson, of Astoria, alone supplies 50,000 choice camellias each Winter.

Of carnations, there are probably 150 varieties, but only two or three of those are grown to any great extent for the trade, as the others are either not sufficiently perfect or not of free enough growth to pay for propagation. The most popular white carnation is the President Degraw, and the favoritered, La Puritie. Why the color of passion should have been accorded the name of innocence does not clearly appear, and is probably due to the eccentric fancy of some French gardener who would have been quite as well satisfied with La Suphide, if that had occurred to him.

Violets are in, not yet in abundance, but becoming more plenty daily. Just now they are worth a cent each, at retail. By the way, a great many ladies have developed a passion for chewing violets. They impart a delicious fragrance to the breath, and even at a cent apiece are cheap for this purpose, by comparisen with the candied ones imported from France, and sold at the rate of about $16 a pound. It is interesting to know that many belles have a fancy for thrusting bunches of fresh violets in mysterious places about their corsets, professing to believe that the crushed flowers exhale a more delicately delicious perfume than any of the myriad of scented liquid stuffs that they can buy in bottles. And the florists encourage the fashion enthusiastically.

Of the 20 or more known varieties of heliotrope, only three or four are commonly cultivated here. Of these, the darkest in color is the Gen. Val Hubert, and that bearing the sweetest perfume is the Peruvienniun. Mignonette, pansies, Chinese primroses, azaleas, forget-me-nots, and sweet alyssum, all are plenty, and, with the flowers previously named, may be said to constitute the reliable stock, the base upon which the florist proceeds to build up his exquisite creations. The lilies of the valley seem to gain popularity constantly, and notwithstanding the great number now grown about New-York, so high are they in favor that their price is always good. Roehrs, of Union Hill, grows 150,000 sprays of them annually. He sent over, one day last year, by one man, 10,000 sprays, for which he received 15 cents each. Few persons would be likely to imagine that one man could carry $1,500 worth of market flowers, but let them undertake to buy a "back-load" of these choice little sprays and they will soon be convinced of its entire practicability. But even Roehrs' production seems small when compared with that of Carl Jurgens, of Newport, Rhode Island, who grows this Winter 800,000 of these delicate and beautiful little plants. To explain their well-maintained value, it should be understood that lilies of the valley are grown from imported bulbs, most of which come from Germany, though some are got in France; that these little bulbs cost three cents each, produce but one slender flower spray each, as a result of the careful forcing ngt which they are subjected, like none of these bulbs ever before forcing, capable of producing anything for three years, and that they can never be successfully forced again. So each spray of lily of the valley actually costs the grower three cents primarily; to this there must be added cost of forcing, loss upon bad bulbs, interest on investment, the small profits of grower and florist. Really, when one considers all this, the wonder seems not that lilies of the valley are so dear, but that they are so cheap. Roman hyacinths—said to be in such abundance on the low lands near Rome that the fields are white with them, as if covered with snow—are here as expensive as lilies of the valley. Just at present each kind is worth from 7 to 10 cents per spray, wholesale, and from $1 50 to $2 per dozen at retail, according to the demand for them. Orchids are difficult to procure, and always very costly. Sometimes as much as $2, $3, or even $5, has been paid for single flowers. They are generally slow growers, produce few flowers, and are cultivated by but few professional gardeners. They belong rather to the conservatories of the rich. Very frequently large and strong orchid plants are sold for from $25 as high as $300, and yet the buyer deems himself rewarded if one such produces three or five flowers in a year. The finest collection of orchids grown for the trade in this country is believed to be that of George Such, at South Amboy, N. J.; but even that is lacking in many of the rare and costly varieties which can be found in certain private houses. Erastus Corning had a passion for orchids, which has been inherited by his son, who has now a stock of these queer plants at his Albany home, which is worth at least $25,000. Louis Menand, of Albany; I. Buchanan, of this City, and William Bennett, of Flatoush, Long Island, each have large and fine collections. The orchids are often characterized as "caricature plants," from the queer shapes and faces contained in most of them, and the strange ways in which they are put together, but to no other family of flowers belong such infinite variety, richness, and delicacy of tint.

The mass of foliage about the base of a "table design" is of rare worth. Some of the leaves used here are even more expensive and difficult to procure than the most rare and costly flowers of which mention has been made. Indeed, some of the most beautiful leaves are only procurable by accident from gardeners when they are making cuttings, or from private green-houses, and are not sufficiently in the market to have any fixed price. When they are sold they, of course, command a price proportioned to their rarity as well as their beauty. The reason for this scarcity is, that the plants upon which they grow are slow of growth, difficult to rear, often rare, and in their best condition have but few leaves. The Medinilla magnifica, for instance, will have, upon a plant six feet high, not more than 50 leaves, each of which requires three years to arrive at perfection, and if one is plucked it is never replaced. Lovely leaves they are, however, of rich enameled green above and light plum-color beneath, corrugated and wonderfully vivid in tint. Some of the Crotons have very handsome variegated foliage, which commends them to the admiration of all lovers of beauty, but their leaves, too, are hard to obtain in sufficient numbers for regular use by any large florist. Dark green striped with lighter shades, light green with darker zig-zag markings, green spotted with yellow and dotted with crimson, and many other novel and charming combinations of color are found among the foliage of individual varieties of this class. The different varieties of Begonia Rex, grown for foliage and not for flowers, offer many curious and beautiful leaves. Of these some are corrugated, others smooth as if coated with enamel, others covered with stiff bristles, while in the matter of color their variations are endless. A very pretty leaf for decoration is the small, almost round one of Filtonia argyroneura, which is of light green, seemingly inlaid with veins of silver. The velvety salver-shaped little Peperonia leaf also works in charmingly in floral designs, and is fortunately more abundant than either of the first mentioned. An infinite variety of decorative leaves of almost all colors, sizes, and shapes is afforded by the Maranta family.

Most popular and commonly in use of all foliage, however, are ferns and smilax, which are justly prized for their effect in lighting up all floral combinations. There are almost countless varieties of the ferns, and some of them command quite a high regular price. The ordinary branches cost but $3 per hundred, but some of the rarer kinds command readily as much as 50 cents each. Among the prettiest are those belonging to the family of the Gymnogramma, of some of which the under sides of the leaves seem thickly powdered with gold and others with silver dust. The amount of smilax used here is enormous, experienced florists estimating that from 1,000,000 to 1,500,000 feet of this beautiful vine are made up annually in this City. A few years ago we used to import all our smilax from Boston. It was actually not known to New-York florists, although the gardeners doubtless had some theoretical knowledge about it. And that was only nine years ago. They were very quick, however, to see how charmingly its small, glossy, green leaves and delicate branches would weave into their work, and began importing it in considerable quantities. At first they had to pay $1 per yard for single strings, but now double strings are not worth one-third of that money. This decline in importation of florists' stock is the best evidence of the successful modes of cultivation adopted by our gardeners in late years, and their good judgment in meeting the requirements of the market, rather than a falling off in demand. This Winter we have not imported more than two or three thousand dollars' worth of all kinds of flowers and foliage from Boston, and have sent there considerably more than that amount, to say nothing of our large shipments to Philadelphia, Baltimore, Albany, and other cities. It is not to be expected, however, that any one city will always grow all the flowers it requires. Accidents of condition in growth and of demand for extraordinary occasions will ever necessitate an interchange. We may congratulate ourselves that the balance of exchange is largely in our favor, however.

Peter Henderson, Elliott, Wilson, and others of the best-informed of our large flower-growers estimate that there are in the vicinity of New-York not less than $10,000,000 invested in the wholesale florists' business, in land, green-houses, and stock. There are over 45 acres under glass in their hot-houses, and their aggregate profits will trench close upon $1,000,000 per annum, if, indeed, they do not exceed that amount even in these dull times. Of this, it will be understood a large part is derived from the plant business, which is annually increasing in importance, but the major portion of income of our principal growers is derived from cut flowers. At Union Hill, N. J., there are, it is estimated, 20 acres under glass for the cultivation of all sorts of flowers for the New-York market. The Wiegand Brothers are the largest growers there of roses, violets, and pinks, next to P. Henderson, who alone has about two acres under glass, almost all for plant growth, however. Roehrs makes specialties of lilies of the valley and Roman hyacinths. The Schupps have large establishments for the growth of a miscellaneous assortment of flowers. A great many Bonseline, Saffrana, and Cornelia Cook roses come from Madison, N. J. Carmolin, of Staten Island, is the principal grower of Niphetos roses, and Tait, of the same place, devotes himself princip

THE DIRTY STREETS.

FILTH AND GARBAGE IN ABUNDANCE

IMPASSABLE CONDITION OF MOST OF THE PUBLIC THOROUGHFARES — SLOW WORK BY THE STREET-CLEANING BUREAU—NO ATTEMPT TO REMOVE ASHES AND GARBAGE.

The condition of the streets as described below by THE TIMES reporters shows plainly how little the Street-cleaning Bureau has yet done toward removing the accumulations of snow, ice, and garbage from the public thoroughfares. With few exceptions, all portions of the City are in such a state as to make travel, either on foot or otherwise, highly dangerous. In the business portions of the City the delay and inconvenience caused by the impassable condition of the streets have proved very injurious in a pecuniary sense to our merchants and small traders, and hopes are expressed that the Legislature will take such steps as will prevent a repetition of such injury to their trade in future—an injury, they say, which would not occur if the dirt and garbage had been promptly removed by the Police Commissioners.

While the streets down town were not generally—thanks to the prolonged thaw and the rain—so difficult to cross yesterday as they have been for a fortnight past, they were in many places in a horrible condition. Private enterprise has in many places taken up the work that should properly have fallen to the Street-cleaning Bureau, and men are seen at work in the streets with pick and shovel making passable the hitherto impassable spots. Where the hummocks caused by throwing up the snow of several storms had grown to be a foot in height, they were proving serious obstacles to trucks, many of which were broken down in the attempt to drag them over the barriers. At the corner of Fulton and Front streets there were two mounds, four or five feet in height, solid masses of ice and mud. Along Beekman street there was a sort of canal, through which ran water, street railroad cars, and wagons, with solid banks of ice a foot high on either side. The plenteous rain had accelerated the thaw, and added to the volume of water that streamed along the gutters, and pools collected at many of the corners so wide that they could only be passed by making their circuit, or wading through a liquid compound of water, mud, and snow. The narrow streets in the lower east side part of the City were blocked up in many places with piles of rubbish, whose composition was made up of about equal parts of snow, ashes, and garbage. Along Greenwich and Washington streets the street cars ran through canals six inches deep, which found occasional relief when policemen had broken down their banks near open culverts. Walking everywhere was dirty, and riding was almost as disagreeable, the street cars being full of dampness, their windows reeking with steam, and their floors noisome with damp straw. The ash-men have not yet found their way to all the ash-barrels in the lower part of the City. If age in ashes deserves any sort of respect or consideration, there are some ancient and fish-like collections of such refuse along John street and Maiden lane that are entitled to immediate attention.

ON THE EAST SIDE.

The thoroughfares on the East Side of the City, from Fourteenth street to Fulton ferry, were never in a worse condition than at the present time. Beginning at Thirteenth street, and traversing it from Fourth avenue to the East River, the snow, ice, and filth combined form a solid foundation, varying from one to three feet in depth. In Eleventh street, from Avenue C to First avenue, the scene is varied by the presence of large pools of slush over a foot in depth. In the same street, between Avenues B and C, there is a pond fully 50 feet in diameter, and about 18 inches deep. Few horses can be forced to enter this quagmire, and in some instances yesterday drivers were compelled to retrace their route, and proceed through another street. Gigantic piles of garbage are also to be found in most of the thoroughfares in that vicinity. In Ninth street, from Avenue B to C, a regular chain of hillocks composed of ashes, snow, and garbage was found. The residents of Twelfth street, from Third avenue to the East River, have nearly all thrown their ashes and garbage into the street, and this rubbish, having become mixed with the snow and ice, has formed a solid footing. From No. 2 Fourth avenue to Astor place ashes and garbage have been piled in the street. Bond Street, from Broadway to the Bowery, is paved with a coat of ice, with here and there large holes containing water with a surface of slush. Bleeker street is in a similar condition, especially along the line of railroad, where the snow is piled on either side in colossal heaps. The same may be said of East Houston street, although its worst condition is found between Essex and Ludlow streets. Prince street is also traversed by a horse-railroad, and the enterprising residents along that thoroughfare have shoveled off the summits of the snow-banks to the tracks, and the snow being partially melted has formed a slush which covers its entire length, and backing to the cross-walks has made it a matter of great inconvenience to cross that street in many places. Mulberry, Mott, Elizabeth, and Elm streets are in a disreputable condition. Here and there wagons and carts have apparently been laid up for the Winter, and are surrounded with a mixture of snow, ashes, and garbage. In Mott street, opposite Ward School No. 5, the street is absolutely impassable to loaded teams, and an attempt to drive an empty wagon along that route would be fraught with considerable danger to the vehicle. Of all the thoroughfares upon which there is a large amount of travel, Canal street is in the worst condition. Two railroad tracks extend along the centre of the street, eastwardly from Broadway, over the hill. On either side of the tracks are numerous piles of snow, ice, and accumulated filth, while the ashes from most of the houses along the line have been deposited at the summit of these mounds. An express company occupies a considerable share of the street on the southern side, and its wagons and trucks are compelled in most instances to pass over a pavement of ice of from one to two feet in thickness. One of the sewers on the eastern side of Broadway was partially closed, and at the corner of Elm street a dense mass of snow and water had formed which was unable to find its way to the sewer. White, Franklin, Leonard, and Duane streets, east of Broadway, are nearly impassable, while the attempt has been made by the authorities to open the gutters on either side of the several thoroughfares. The streets not traversed by railways, and upon which the vehicles which pass through are mostly market wagons, are covered with ice from one to two feet above the level of the sidewalks. Large sheets of water have collected in many places upon the sidewalks, and thus walking is rendered difficult in those streets. Among the latter are Ludlow, Essex, Norfolk, Suffolk, Orchard, Allen, Forsyth, and Chrystie. The intersecting streets, Rivington, Delancey, and Stanton are equally bad. In Henry, Madison, Monroe, and Cherry streets no attempt has been made to remove the snow, and the ashes and garbage have not, apparently, been removed for several weeks. Catharine street is worse than any other thoroughfare in its neighborhood. At the intersection of New Chambers, Rose, and James streets, there is a pond about 30 feet in diameter, and quite deep. Gold street, from Frankfort to Ferry, is impassable to teams. The ice has been broken up with crowbars, and lies in large solid lumps, as hard as bowlders, over the entire surface of the street. no attempt has been made to pile it in heaps, and at a late hour last evening no steps were being taken to cart it away. Ferry street, in a similar condition. Pearl street from Burling slip to Maiden lane is a sea of slush, and Hanover square has a border composed of snow, ice, and ashes. William street, below Beaver, is covered with ice and pools of water, and Nassau street was no better, but a gang of men were at work on that street below Fulton last evening.

ON THE WEST SIDE.

The condition of the streets on the west side of the City yesterday were simply disgraceful. All the leading thoroughfares lying between the Battery and Twenty-third street were covered with heaps of congealed snow, from which streams of water flowed into the gutters, which became choked at nearly all the street crossings to such an extent as to render the sidewalks almost impassable. With the exception of Cortlandt street, and some others from which a portion of the snow had been removed during the past week by the Street-cleaning Bureau, there was no evidence to be found up to yesterday afternoon, on the west side of the City, of the existence of any such department. Anything that had been done to clear the streets had been accomplished by the proprietors of the numerous warehouses in this portion of the City in order to open up a passage to the principal freight depots along the East River. Immediately after the snow-storm several parties set to work to clear the street opposite the stores to facilitate the delivery of merchandise, but such was the difficulty experienced in the way of providing a dumping ground that in most cases all that could be done was to pile up the snow in large heaps in some other part of the street. P. Moran, an employe of the firm of Messrs. A. Bonneli & Co., No. 104 West street, corner of Liberty street, applied to the department, at Police Head-quarters, to ascertain where he might dump the snow opposite the company's store in West and Liberty streets, and was directed to throw it into the North River, at pier No. 1; but when he sent the carts there for this purpose, the Park Police would not allow them to dump there. The only alternative that remained for business firms was to shovel the snow into heaps on both sides of the street so as to clear a passage to their stores, and yesterday in all the business portions of the City these immense hillocks presented a hideous appearance, being like so much black mud, every trace of primitive whiteness having disappeared. All along West street, from the Battery to Washington Market and above the Erie Railway Depot one side of the street was lined with a continuous ridge of this dirty stuff, which had been rendered still more objectionable and unsightly owing to the fact that the ashes from the stores had been in most instances thrown upon the top of it. Opposite Pier No. 14, the depot of the Central Railroad of New-York, there was a large heap of snow black as mud, and at Liberty street two large heaps of the same stuff almost completely blocked up the street. Further up, between West and Washington streets, the trucks and wagons moving along this thoroughfare were nearly up to the axles in a bed of heavy slush, through which the most powerful teams were taxed to their utmost strength to move the ponderous wagons along. In Dey street there was a mound of snow all along the centre of the street for some blocks, which almost completely impeded public traffic, and in Barclay street it was painful to witness the overstrained exertions of powerful teams to drag the trucks and vehicles to which they were attached through the deep snow and slush which covered the entire thoroughfare. Such was the condition of the crossings at this point of West street that in order to pass pedestrians were obliged to get out upon the tracks in West street and risk being crushed with the wagons and vehicles that came rushing along. In West Twenty-third street the same black unsightly masses of snow that disfigured the lower part of the City were piled up on either side.

ABOVE FOURTEENTH STREET.

In Union square, which has been in a particularly bad condition, owing to the high banks of snow and ice piled up on both sides of the car-tracks, workmen, with picks and shovels, were yesterday breaking up the frozen mass. Broadway, from Fourteenth to Thirty-fourth street, is also being cleaned, but it is still in a bad condition. On Fourth avenue high banks of filthy-looking snow and slush are piled up on both sides of the car tracks, but the warm weather and the rain that has lately fallen are rapidly melting this away and filling the gutters and crossings with miniature rivers of dirty water. On First and Second avenues, above Fourteenth street, the snow is banked up on both sides of the car-tracks where the sweepers of the railroad companies have thrown the mud and water from the tracks upon it until it has become a very filthy looking mass. In many places on Second avenue the ice is so thick that it is almost impossible for wagons or other vehicles to reach the curb. Avenue A and First avenue are in very much the same condition, excepting that the residents of the numerous tenement-houses which line these thoroughfares have made the piles of snow and ice the receptacle for ashes and garbage, until the height has become a most disgusting one. In Fourteenth street, all the way from Union square to the East River, the street is in a very bad condition, the snow and ice being piled up in many places to a height of from four to five feet on both sides of the car-tracks, and here, as in First avenue and Avenue A, garbage has been thrown on top of it by the occupants of the houses. Of all the streets on the east side of the City through which the cars run, Fourteenth is the worst, there being no possibility of crossing from one side to the other except at the corners, or where here and there openings have been made by store-keepers. That portion of Sixteenth street between Fourth avenue and Gramercy Park is in a very bad condition, the worst spots being in the immediate neighborhood of Third avenue. In Seventeenth and Eighteenth streets, through which the cars of the Central Crosstown Railroad Company run, the snow is banked up on both sides of the streets to a height of several feet, there being barely room in the centre for the cars to pass. Nineteenth street, from Third avenue to the East River, and Thirty-third street, east of Second avenue, are both in very bad condition, being alternately made up of small hillocks of hard ice and ruts. Of all the streets on the west side Twenty-third and Thirty-fourth streets, notwithstanding the fact that double tracks are laid in both, present by far the worst appearance. In these thoroughfares the snow and ice thrown from the tracks by the snow-plows remain piled up to a depth of several feet. Outside has been thrown by the occupants of the tenement-houses east of Third avenue, ashes, garbage, and all kinds of refuse matter, which, were it not for the cold weather, would rapidly breed pestilence. In many places the banks of ice and snow are so deep that it has been impossible for the ash-carts to get near the curb, and here and there may be seen piles of ashes that have long since overflowed the barrels and boxes placed there to receive them. At the intersection of many of these streets with the principal avenues, small rivers of water and slush force the foot passenger to go half a block before being able to cross to the other side.

FAT MEN'S FOOT RACE.

Gilmore's Garden was thronged last night by about 5,000 spectators. The horse races were received with a good deal of favor, particularly when they were more than usually well contested. For the most of the time the efforts of horses and riders seemed to be directed to the not simple task of treading on each other's heels, but there were several contests in which good speed was made. The fun of the evening was caused by the race of the fat men. Five men weighing over 200 pounds each were entered. They were not a particularly prepossessing quintet as they came up to the scale, but they had the necessary avoirdupois, and they threw off their coats with celerity, and climbed over the fence with the agility of kittens. As they stood in a row there was James Daly, 215 pounds, a rosy, robust youth, with a tattered red shirt that exposed his herculean arms. Next to him, William Grote, 217 pounds, a man who looked as if he had been in the P. R. D. A. Webster, 206 pounds; H. Vosburgh, 222 pounds, and James Huber, 220 pounds, completed the fat contingent. The first heat was led off by Daly, followed by Grote closely, and then at respectful and constantly widening distances by Webster and Vosburgh. Huber was a corpulent man, best realizing the term fat of any of his companions. He was short and very thick in the middle, and wore a pair of canvas pantaloons well secured about his protuberant portions by a leather strap. Huber fell modestly in at the rear of the race, and trotted along in the most comfortable manner, reminding one of nothing so much as the baby hippopotamus when he trudges out to be laughed at by admiring spectators. Huber only made one circuit, as he was fairly overtaken then by Daly, and withdrew. The second heat resulted as did the first, Daly receiving the prize and Grote second money.

PRISONERS IN THE TOMBS.

There were 382 prisoners in the Tombs yesterday, consisting of 300 males (including four boys) and 82 females. Following are the names of the principal prisoners, the offenses with which they are charged, and the dates of their imprisonment. Several, it will be seen, have been confined a long time, and there is a very large percentage of grave offenses:

Charles Ralston, forgery, March 23, 1876; Henry Hunniville Vincent, forgery, June 26, 1876; Robert Garrity, homicide, causing the death of John Smith, July 12, 1876; Thomas L. Birch, perjury, Aug. 3, 1876; Charles H. Cands, receiving stolen goods, Sept. 5, 1876; Charles Dougherty, burglary, Sept. 12, 1876; Thomas McGunn, receiving stolen goods, Sept. 14, 1876; Samuel Hubbs, arson, Oct. 3, 1876; Edward Craft, forgery, Oct. 6, 1876; Mathew Henry, two charges, grand larceny and petit larceny, Oct. 28, 1876; George W. Kimball, Margaret Abraham, and Joseph Carr, alias "Charles Brown," conspiracy, Nov. 4, 1876; Mary Carter, perjury, Nov. 9, 1876; Abraham De Aucona, robbery, Nov. 23, 1876; Warren N. Herrick, forgery, Nov. 25, 1876; Denis Donovan, felonious assault and battery, Nov. 27, 1876; Benno Ville, arson, Dec 1, 1876; John Bruso, forgery, Dec. 4, 1876; David W. Rabbeth, perjury, Dec. 4, 1876; Charles Lynk and Neptune Bowen, perjury, Dec. 8, 1876; James Potter, alias "Lilly," forgery, Dec. 12, 1876; William Quigg, mayhem, Dec. 18, 1876; James Boylan, felonious assault and battery, Dec. 19, 1876; Michael Kelly, robbery, Dec. 20, 1876; Charles H. Bradley, conspiracy, Dec. 20, 1876; John Desmond, robbery, Dec. 20, 1876; Ronald M. Nichol, Robert K. Stead, and Theodore A. Stratton, subornation of perjury, Dec. 28, 1876; Mortimer Shes, robbery, Jan. 1 1877; James Bracy, burglary, Jan. 1, 1877; Thomas J. Baker, felonious assault and battery, Jan. 10, 1877; Maria Benser, bigamy, Jan. 11, 1877; George Lewis, robbery, Jan. 15, 1877; James Bake, homicide, causing the death of John McDonald, Jan. 17, 1877; Horace E. Brown, forgery, Jan. 19, 1877; Elijah W. Haughton, forgery, Jan. 19, 1877; James Rice, homicide, causing the death of Hugh McCabe, Jan. 19, 1877.

ATHLETIC SPORTS.

Mr. J. Marion Pollock will give an open amateur athletic meeting at the Metropolitan Riding Academy, on Thursday, March 1, which will consist of the following programme: Seventy-five yards run, throwing the hammer, one mile walk, quarter-mile walk, running high jump, half-mile run, 120 yards hurdle race, one mile run, and running broad jump. The prizes will be a gold medal to first, and a silver medal to second. No competitor will be allowed to enter under a false name. Entries will be received up to Feb. 22. The uniform will consist of undershirt and trunks or drawers to the knee. Any person not a member of any recognized club must be properly introduced by some well-known person. A twenty-five mile amateur walking match will take place at the Metropolitan Riding Academy next Saturday. The match has created much interest in sporting circles, as several champions at shorter distances will compete for the prize. The track of the Metropolitan Riding Academy is an eighth of a mile, and is admirably adapted for such athletic sports.

LOCAL MISCELLANY.

FOG UPON THE RIVERS.

A DAY OF DAMP AND DRIZZLE—DETENTION OF FERRY-BOATS—SCENES ON THE RIVERS.

With the change from cold to moderate weather there was a rapid accumulation of fog upon the East and North Rivers on Friday night and yesterday morning that only needed the presence of ice to have made traveling thoroughly uncomfortable and exasperating to the most patient of human creatures. The fog-horns of the ferry-boats and the signal bells on shore began their chorus on Friday night, but it did not swell to a full and horrid din until yesterday morning, when travel became more general, and all the puffing tug-boats were in action to complicate the difficulty which the ferry-boats had already met with in crossing from shore to shore. From 7 o'clock in the morning until 3 o'clock in the afternoon this din of whistles was maintained with uninterrupted vigor. The capacity of deep and high whistles was fully tested, and the amount of steam that was wasted in backing and filling to avoid collisions must have been sufficient to run a very important ferry for a whole month. On the North River the Hoboken and upper Erie Ferries were most annoyed by the fog. The boats on these lines having long distances to run, intersecting at several points the courses of other ferries, were compelled to run at half speed. The delays were not frequently long, but occasionally the fog would become unusually dense, and then the boats would be compelled to make three or four attempts to reach their slips. No accidents were reported on these or the New-Jersey Central or Pennsylvania Ferries, though there were several very narrow escapes from collision. At the battery the fog was very dense all the morning, and incoming steam-ships came up the Bay during the morning with great caution. The South and Hamilton ferry-boats repeatedly went astray, and came poking their bows into all sorts of strange and improper places on the Brooklyn and New-York shores, and met with delays of from 10 to 20 minutes. The Wall street ferry-boats were somewhat interrupted; the Fulton Ferry appeared to be but slightly affected by the thick haze, and the Roosevelt street boats were, as usual under such circumstances, more seriously interfered with than any others, except those on the James slip line to Hunter's Point, which were no suspensions of travel on any of these lines, however, and no accidents have been reported. Just before 3 o'clock in the afternoon the wind freshened and veered from south-east to south-west, and the sun appeared dimly through the driving clouds of mist that swept up from the Bay. At 4 o'clock the warm rays broke through the clouds, and before sunset the sky was clear, and the atmosphere high er and more exhilarating than it had been for a week. The thermometer ranged from 36° at 7 A. M., to 40° at 3 P. M.

DETENTION OF STEAM-SHIPS.

In consequence of the dense fog which hung over the rivers and Bay yesterday, the steam-ships Britannic, of the White Star Line, and the Neckar, of the North German Lloyds Line, did not sail as advertised, but will take their departure this morning if the weather is clear. Both of these steamers carry heavy mails, an extra one having been made up this morning. As previously announced, the Britannic carries an Australian mail which came via California, its destination being London.

SCARCITY OF OYSTERS.

THE INCLEMENT WINTER THE CAUSE—A LIMITED DEMAND AND SUPPLY—ADVANCE IN PRICES—VIEWS OF THE WHOLESALE DEALERS.

There has not been since the Winter of 1857-'8 so great a scarcity of oysters in the New-York market as has been apparent since the middle of December last, since which time the wholesale price has advanced about 50 per cent. It is, however, by no means an unusual circumstance to have oysters scarce at this season of the year, for the rivers and bays in which they are obtained are generally frozen over and some little difficulty is therefore experienced in procuring them. It is an admitted fact that oysters have been and are looked upon as a luxury which the prevailing "hard times," it would appear, have compelled many persons to forego, and the dealers say that had the demand during the present season been half as great as in former years they would have been utterly unable to supply it. This is due to the fact that the Winter along the coast has been an unusually inclement one, and has caused the formation of ice on the rivers in which oysters are obtained. At this season of the year oystermen generally expect to get their supplies from the rivers and bays in the neighborhood of Virginia, and pay, therefore, but little attention to the oyster-beds of Prince's Bay and other places nearer home. As a consequence the boats are all down on the coast waters, for the past three or four weeks, they have been imprisoned in the floating ice, afraid to anchor lest they should be crushed and unable to get out and return to this port. The labor of furnishing New-York and other large cities with oysters is a very great one, and only those who are thoroughly conversant with it know the sufferings and privations to which those engaged in it are exposed. All the waters in which oysters are procured, including Chesapeake Bay, Parker's Bay, the Shrewsbury, Cherrystone, Rappahannock, York, and other rivers, and Chincoteague Bay, have been either frozen over or filled with floating ice in which are imprisoned a very large number of boats, so that there has been, in this City at least, almost an oyster famine. A reporter of THE TIMES yesterday called upon several of the large dealers in this City for the purpose of obtaining their views in regard to the matter indicated, and all are agreed that, had the demand not been so small, great trouble would have been experienced in furnishing a supply for the market. One dealer stated that he had no trouble in procuring enough Long Island and other oysters to supply his customers, but at the same time there was an almost unexampled dearth of the bivalves. Another dealer said that a great many oysters were now being shipped to Europe, which kept up the demand somewhat. He did not anticipate any further increase in prices, but on the contrary looked for an early decline. The present thaw, would, in his opinion, open up the rivers and give the oystermen a chance to get to work, and by Monday the market would no doubt be well supplied. It appeared to be the general impression, however, that should the weather again become very cold, the market might be short until the middle of March.

THE PRISON-SHIP MARTYRS.

A MEMORIAL TO CONGRESS ASKING FOR $50,000 TO ERECT A MONUMENT OVER THEIR REMAINS.

On the 4th of July last, at midnight, while thousands of citizens crowded around the grave of the prison-ship martyrs at Fort Greene, Brooklyn, a committee was appointed to secure funds for the erection of a monument to the brave men who suffered death in the Wallabout Bay. Yesterday afternoon the committee and a number of other gentlemen met in Mayor Schroeder's office and listened to the reading of a memorial to Congress prepared by Hon. Henry C. Murphy, asking for $50,000 to erect a monument to the martyrs over the grave on Fort Greene. Among those present were Mayor Schroeder, Gen. Dakin, Silas B. Dutcher, E. C. Parkinson, Alderman Arcner, Chief Engineer Sharp, J. S. T. Stranahan, Gen. Jourdan, J. Y. Culyer, Col. Rooney C. Ward, and J. J. Van Nostrand. The memorial sets forth that a similar request was addressed to Congress in 1803, and again in 1845, but failed. In 1808 a popular movement was started and the bones of the martyrs, which were buried originally near the shores of the Wallabout, were removed—a great public display being made at the time—to a vault near the Navy-yard. The bones were not removed until the tide washing in had exposed them to public view. It was the original intention to erect a monument over the vault, but for some reason the intention was not carried out. Many years after, through the exertions of a soldier named Benjamin Romaine, a wooden structure was raised over the vault to protect it from injury. In 1873 the bones were removed to Fort Greene, and buried on one of the slopes which overlooks the Wallabout Bay. The memorial contains a vivid description of the sufferings endured in the six prison-ships by the martyrs. Allusion is made to the fact that in August, 1781, the Continental Congress directed Gen. Washington to remonstrate with the enemy. The remonstration was of no avail, and the imprisoned Americans continued to suffer. Many of them were starved because they would not join the English forces; others were butchered with the bayonet, and a large number were burned alive in one of the transports. The number of the martyrs who died in these ships is not known to the authorities at 11,000. It is certain that 21 boxes of bones were collected on the shores of the Wallabout. The memorialists ask for $50,000 to erect a shaft over the tomb of the martyrs. The dead heroes came from all parts of the country. Every State in the Union was represented among them. For this reason, other reasons, the memorialists claim that the erection of a fitting monument is a national duty, the expense of which should be borne by the whole country.

BOLD ROBBERY IN NEWARK, N. J.

A robbery of unusual boldness was perpetrated Friday night at the residence of Mrs. Joseph Gould, on the corner of Bellevue avenue and Gouverneur street, Newark. The family were all at supper in the dining-room at the time. The thieves entered through the hall door, descended to the basement, locked the door of the dining-room, and then ransacked the upper part of the house. When the family arose from the supper table, it was discovered for the first time that they were locked in the room. The door was broken open and a search made, but the thieves had accomplished their errand and gone away with a valuable set of jewelry and a pair of gold bracelets. A sealskin coat and an overcoat were found lying in the yard, where the thieves had thrown them from an open window. Yesterday afternoon Detective Smith arrested Edward Mack, a laborer, on suspicion of being one of the guilty parties. The accused was locked up to await examination.

SAD DROWNING ACCIDENT.

A THREE-YEAR OLD CHILD FALLS THROUGH A MAN-HOLE ON THE TUG-BOAT WM. FLETCHER—MELANCHOLY TERMINATION OF AN OCEAN VOYAGE.

The steam-ship France, of the General Transatlantic Company's Line, arrived at Quarantine this morning from Havre, and after a short detention came up to this City and anchored at 1:15 o'clock in the stream opposite the company's pier. She had on board 55 steerage passengers, among whom were Theresa Neef and her two children, Otto, aged 5 years, and Louis, aged 3. The party had been on a visit to their friends in Alsace, leaving the husband and father, Theodore Neef, at his home in North Wells street, Chicago. Soon after, the tug William Fletcher came alongside the France to take off her steerage passengers. Mrs. Neef and her two children hurried over the ship's gangways, eager, with the rest, to get ashore after their long ocean voyage. The number was not large, and scarcely filled up the covered passages on each side of the engine-room between the two paddle boxes. Mrs. Neef sat down in the passage with her children near by her, but they soon began to play about near the shaft, which ran along near the floor. Suddenly she missed her little Louis, a bright flaxen-haired fellow, and started up to look for him. She immediately discovered near her an open circular hole, the cover of which had tipped up on edge, and in the darkness she saw the figure of the child in the water below. The opening led to the tank of the tug, and the boy had fallen through into the water. He was drawn out as soon as possible, and as quickly as he could be taken from the frantic embrace of his mother he was laid upon blankets on the deck of the tug and the surgeon of the France was sent for. Life was apparently extinct, but every exertion was made to resuscitate the limp figure. Warm cloths were applied, the limbs were rubbed with brandy; every known method was resorted to in the effort to restore animation, and not until an hour and a half had been thus expended did the surgeon cease his exertions. The passengers who had been in such haste but a moment before, lingered about the agonized woman when the Fletcher landed at the Castle Garden pier, sympathizing with her in her grief. On reaching the pier, notice of the accident was sent to the Coroner, and Mrs. Neef and the boy were taken to the hospital in the Castle Garden inclosure to await the result of the inquest. A reporter of THE TIMES was shown the man-hole through which the child had fallen. The plate covering it was not more than 10 pounds in weight, and could easily have been lifted by a child. Having moved it but a half-inch from its place, a slight pressure of the foot was sufficient to lift it upon its edge, when a space large enough to admit the body of a child was disclosed. There was no fastening upon the plate, and the distance to the water in the tank appeared to be about two feet. Mrs. Neef was supplied with a ticket to her home in Chicago, but had no money with her. It was understood that the Emigration Commissioner would send word by telegraph to Mr. Neef of the sad accident.

THE NORTH SIDE ASSOCIATION.

IMPROVEMENT OF THE UP-TOWN WARDS DEMANDED—RESOLUTIONS IN FAVOR OF RAPID TRANSIT.

A meeting of the North Side Association was held yesterday at the Morrisania Steamboat Company's Office, Mott Haven, for the purpose of receiving reports of committees. Mr. John J. Crane occupied the chair. The Secretary read the report of the Local Improvement Committee in relation to the immediate improvement of the Twenty-third and Twenty-fourth Wards by the Department of Public Works, stating that they still remain of the opinion that the power of the department should be vested in a single competent head, as the lately annexed territory of Morrisania has afforded in the past many illustrations of the evils of divided councils. In closing, the committee called attention to the fact that the general improvement of the district, as well as its proper drainage and sewerage, so vital to the health of the inhabitants, await the action of the Department of Public Parks, and the committee urged that the attention of the association be directed to the end that comprehensive plans for the improvement of the district be adopted without further delay. Mr. George H. Foster then offered the following resolutions, which were unanimously adopted:

Resolved, That the North Side Association have received with great interest the recent reports of Olmsted, Vaux, & Co., engineers in the Department of Public Parks, also Mr. Parker's plan on the subject of laying out the Twenty-third and Twenty-fourth Wards, and that the views expressed in said reports are those which have been entertained by the property-owners as the true principles on which such improvements should be based.

Resolved, That the association urge, on the part of the department, the immediate practical action upon the plans submitted by the Engineer, with such reports after consideration of the suggestion as to details, made by the parties interested, to the end that the people may see some substantial result for the great expenditure already incurred. Expense during the year 1876, $25,000.

The report of the Rapid Transit Committee was next read and approved. The report says that they feel safe in asserting that all opposition by private persons to the completion of the Gilbert Elevated Railroad and to the further construction of the New-York Elevated Railroad has ceased. The following preamble and resolutions were then read by Mr. Fordham Morris and adopted:

Whereas, The action taken by the corporation known as the Sixth Avenue Railroad Company, with the purpose of excluding the use by the people of their own highway to their best advantage is intolerable, and to the highest degree hateful to the public welfare; and

Whereas, Such action of said Sixth Avenue Railroad Company is in direct violation of the spirit and intent of the contract made by it with the City of New-York, through which it derives primarily its license to transport passengers for hire in said city;

Resolved, That the North Side Association, in view of these circumstances, appoint a committee of five to wait upon the said Railroad Committee of the Board of Aldermen of this City, and respectfully request their careful consideration of the following clause in the original license granted by the Corporation of the City to the said Sixth Avenue Railroad Company:

"The parties receiving such license shall file with the Controller a statement under oath of the cost of each mile of road completed, and agree to survey, construct, and transfer the said road to the Corporation of the City of New-York whenever requested to do so, on payment by the Corporation of the cost of said road, as appraised by said assessment, together with 10 per cent. advance thereon. Also, that said parties, on being required at any time by the Corporation, and to such extent as the Common Council shall determine, shall take up, at their own expense, said railroad, or such part thereof as they shall be required, and on failure to do so in 10 days after such requirement, the same may be done at their expense by the Street Commissioner."

Resolved, That whereas the completion of the Rapid Transit railway now in progress of construction, but largely obstructed from completion by reason of the obstacles raised by the horse railways, would, to a great degree, relieve the difficulties now existing in the enforcement of the payment of taxes from owners of property in the sparsely inhabited but heavily assessed districts in the northern portion of the city;

Resolved, That such committee, when appointed, are hereby instructed to urge upon said Railroad Committee the propriety of exercising the power vested in the Board of Aldermen of compelling said Sixth Avenue Railroad Company to withdraw the invidious opposition now being made by them to the Gilbert Elevated railroad.

The meeting then adjourned.

DEATH FROM HYDROPHOBIA.

Early in October, while John Culver, a bright boy 6 years of age, living with his uncle, Tuttle Culver, of No. 12 Magnolia avenue, Jersey City Heights, was playing on the streets, a black-and-tan dog, passing, bit him in the calf of the leg and on the hand. The wound on the hand was slight, but that on the leg bled freely. Both were dressed, and both healed in the course of time. Nothing more was thought of the matter till Wednesday night last, when the family were aroused from their sleep by the child's shrill cry. When his bedside was reached it was found he was in convulsions. Dr. Pyle, who was summoned, administered to his relief, and Thursday the boy seemed better. In the afternoon the convulsions made their appearance again, and Dr. Abercrombie was called in consultation. Water was offered to the boy. His frame quivered at the sight of it, and during the paroxysms which succeeded he snapped and barked like a dog. Frequently during the night he was seized with convulsions, attended by all the usual symptoms of hydrophobia, and on Friday an antidote was administered, but it proved of no avail. Froth appeared on the lips and a tough leaden colored mucous clogged the throat. Cold prespiration settled over his little body, and often he clutched at imaginary objects in the air, till at 8 o'clock Friday night he died.

CITY AND SUBURBAN NEWS.

NEW-YORK.

The Police made 1,380 arrests last week.

The tenth annual ball of the B. P. O. Elks will take place at Irving Hall on Thursday evening, Feb. 8.

The ball of the Clinton Commandery, No. 14, Knights Templar, will take place to-morrow night at the Academy of Music.

Gospel services will be held by Peter Dwyer at No. 196 Bleecker street this afternoon at 2:30 o'clock, and in the evening at 8 o'clock.

There were dispatched to Europe from this port during the past week 791 registered letters, 207 bags of letters, and 96 bags of newspapers.

The arrangements for the Charity Ball are nearly completed. The music will be by Lander and Graffula, and will consist of not less than 50 pieces each.

Eva Jones, aged 22, of No. 341 East Twenty-sixth street, was found last evening near her residence insensible from an overdose of laudanum. She was sent to Bellevue Hospital.

A Grand Charity Ball is announced to take place at Terrace Garden the 30th inst., to provide a fund to relieve a part of the great suffering among the poor in the Nineteenth Ward.

The following amounts were received at the various municipal bureaus yesterday: Taxes, $160-439 27; Croton rents, $8,245 85; licenses, including those for 83 cars of the Sixth Avenue Railroad Company, $4,932.

The celebrated elephant "Gypsey," purchased some months ago by the Kiraify Brothers, has just arrived per steamer Batavia, and will appear in the Hippo ame in the grand spectacle of "Around the World in Eighty Days."

There were reported at the Bureau of Vital Statistics during last week 416 deaths, 420 births, and 122 marriages, showing a decrease of 43 deaths and 40 births, and an increase of five marriages as compared with the figures of the previous week.

The Palette Club gave one of its monthly informal receptions last evening at the Club-house, No. 7 East Twenty-second street. There was a large attendance of members and guests, and a very enjoyable musical and literary entertainment was had.

On Friday evening Deputy Collectors of Internal Revenue Beattie, Sheaids, and Yeomans, seized an illicit distillery in the rear of the premises No. 524 West Thirty-sixth street, capturing 25 hogsheads of molasses mash and a wooden still. The still was destroyed.

Mrs. M. E. Hollen, of No. 24 West Twenty-ninth street, was knocked down by a truck at the corner of Broadway and Twenty-third street yesterday afternoon and severely injured. The driver of the truck fled immediately after the occurrence, leaving his horse and truck standing in the street.

The twenty-fourth anniversary of the Young Men's Christian Association of the City of New-York will take place Monday evening, the 22d inst., at 8 o'clock, at Association Hall. Addresses will be made by Rev. Dr. Storrs, and the music will be under the direction of the Brick Church; Rev. Frederick Courtney, assistant Rector of St. Thomas' Church, and others.

The disorderly house No. 12 East Thirteenth street, kept by Emma De Valle, was raided upon by Capt. Byrnes, of the Fifteenth Precinct, last night. The proprietress, four women and two men found in the house, were arrested. This place was raided on a few nights ago, and the proprietress is now under bail to answer the charge of keeping a disorderly house.

A fire occurred at 9:30 o'clock last night in the store of Hartz & Levy, dealers in magical toys, on the first floor of No. 1,131 Broadway, under the St. James Hotel. The fire was caused by a defective heater. Damage to stock and fixtures, $300; insured for $2,000 in the American Exchange Company. The building, which is owned by Henry Spofford, was damaged to the amount of $50.

Louisa Kehlenbeck, aged 43, residing at No. 120 Broome street, attempted suicide last evening by swallowing a quantity of Paris green. She was taken to the Delancey Street Police Station, where she was attended by Drs. James and Disbrow, who soon pronounced her out of danger, and she was taken home by her son. It is asserted that domestic unhappiness was the motive for the attempt at self-destruction.

Some time ago an illicit distillery was seized by the internal revenue officers, on the premises at the corner of Eleventh avenue and Seventieth street, occupied by Garret Dreyer as a market garden. Dryer was placed on trial before Judge Benedict, in the United States Circuit Court, last Friday, the case being concluded in about two hours. The jury retired at 1 o'clock in the afternoon, and were out until the same hour yesterday, when they brought in a verdict of guilty. The prisoner was remanded for sentence.

BROOKLYN.

The gentlemen in charge of the Brooklyn Fire Relief Fund have thus far received $32,406 18, and disbursed $6,198 21, leaving a balance in the hands of Treasurer Chauncy of $26,007 97.

Surrogate W. L. Livingstone yesterday served a notice of motion for a bill of particulars on Abram H. Daily, who contests Mr. Livingstone's election on the ground of fraud in counting the vote.

A general order has been issued by Superintendent Campbell, directing members of the Police force to arrest all persons found collecting garbage, or driving garbage and swill-carts through the city on Sunday.

Mayor Schroeder, Moses S. Beach, Dr. T. P. Norris, A. S. Barnes, B. E. Hall, and some other gentlemen are about to establish a soup-house for the relief of the worthy poor. To those not entirely destitute it is intended to sell bread and soup at a nominal price.

Suit has been commenced by Mr. Timothy Bannon against the Long Island Bank for an accounting of $116,000, Mr. Bannon having done business involving that amount with the bank prior to 1861. At that time he became embarrassed and the estate was wound up. The plaintiff claims that there is a balance due him.

Two social events of much interest to many Brooklynites takes place during the present week. The Clinton Commandery, No. 14, Knights Templar, held their reception, which promises to be a brilliant affair, at the Academy of Music to-

THE COUNTING TRIBUNAL.

THE FEELING IN WASHINGTON.

PROSPECTS OF THE PASSAGE OF THE BILL—NO ORGANIZED OPPOSITION TO IT—SOUTHERN REPUBLICANS OPPOSED TO THE MEASURE—MOST OF THE DEMOCRATS HEARTILY IN FAVOR OF THE PLAN—AN UNCONSTITUTIONAL EXPEDIENT.

Special Dispatch to the New-York Times.

WASHINGTON, Jan. 21.—There is no change found to-night in the prospects of the compromise Electoral bill. All attempts to organize opposition have thus far failed, though it seems assured that the measure has lost some strength. To-night one would almost be willing to predict that debate would cease in the Senate in two or three days for want of somebody to speak to the bill. No one is yet assigned the floor for to-morrow, and Mr. Morton does not know whether he will speak till Tuesday. He has no speech written, but is thoroughly prepared by a careful examination of authorities which he will quote to prove the unconstitutionality of the measure. It is not yet known what other Senators will speak against it. The Southern Republicans are strongly opposed to the measure, and one statement is made to-night that no more than four or five Republican Senators, besides the members of the committee, have absolutely determined to vote for the bill. It is, indeed, quite significant that so many Republicans decline to commit themselves. The Senate caucus of Saturday was significant from the fact that after short speeches by two members of the committee, one for and the other against the measure, there was no further desire for debate, and the caucus adjourned because nobody wanted to speak. It is not true, by the way, that there were any words in the caucus between Senators Morton and Edmunds, as has been represented. Unless the silent opposition that exists speedily finds expression, the Senate will adopt the bill by a large majority. In the House there is much the same state of feeling. Many Republicans are against the bill who do not feel strong enough to resist it. The measure will not be suffered to pass without opposition.

Gen. Garfield is sick with a bad cold, which almost deprives him of his voice, but if he is well enough he will make a vigorous fight against the bill. What support he will have in the debate is unknown. Mr. Kasson will probably support the bill, as will also Prof. Seelye, and, of course, Mr. Hoar and Mr. McCrary. The position of the Democrats in both houses is different. The Democratic caucus it is believed will to-morrow agree to give a party vote to the bill, and that instruction will nearly consolidate the Democratic vote. There are certain turbulent spirits among them who would prefer a war to any measure not sure to elect Tilden, but the mass of the party look upon this offering from the committee as giving them the only chance they could possibly have. If the Republicans went on, under the Constitution, and inaugurated Hayes, it was certain he would be everywhere recognized. There was nothing to do but follow the law. This the Democrats well knew, and they embrace this bill as a surrender on the part of the Republicans. The bill gives the Democracy a chance to retreat from a position which has become uncomfortable, and even to gain some applause by the retreat. The Republicans give up an impregnable position, and submit their case to a tribunal whose decision is uncertain, because it is uncertain whether the bill requires them to act within well-settled principles of law. Of course the Democrats will almost unanimously seize upon this opportunity which has been offered them, chiefly by the efforts of three Senators who took very little pains to aid the party during the canvass.

The speech of Senator Edmunds on Saturday is said to have converted Senator Stevenson, a Democrat, to the support of the bill. This is very likely, as any discussion will render it more attractive to Democrats than Republicans. The bill cannot be discussed without constantly considering the attitude of parties; but it is, after all, most open to attack as being an unconstitutional expedient, and in no sense a well devised measure, based upon any fixed principles of law or justice. Whatever opposition may exist will be discovered in a day or two, and there are some who expect it to be strong enough to defeat the measure; but this expectation seems now too sanguine.

OPINIONS AMONG PUBLIC MEN.

VIEWS OF PROMINENT BOSTONIANS—THE MERCHANTS GENERALLY IN FAVOR OF THE MEASURE—LAWYERS OPPOSED—POLITICIANS' VIEWS.

Special Dispatch to the New-York Times.

BOSTON, Jan. 21.—A variety of opinions are expressed by representative Bostonians on the Electoral bill. The merchants, and business men generally, can be said to be in favor of it; not because of any special virtue in it, but because it appears to them to offer a way out of the dilemma and secure a settlement of the Presidential question without serious trouble, and leading merchants are moving for a meeting in Faneuil Hall on Monday at noon, to be addressed by men of both parties. But the lawyers and men prominent in politics do not give their unqualified support to the measure proposed so readily, and are disposed to question it seriously. "I wish they had not drawn the Supreme Court into the muddle," is the most frequently heard remark when lawyers are discussing it. Some lawyers, however, express the opinion that this feature is the very best. Judge Hoar says that the measure will bear little legal scrutiny, but it is common sense, and will go through. Mr. Dana is represented as opposing it as entirely unconstitutional, and establishing a dangerous precedent. Speaker Long, of the House of Representatives, a lawyer of considerable prominence, indorses it, and argues strongly in its favor. Men who are prominent in politics appear to be divided. The Republican Congressional Representatives elect from this part of the State are all understood to be against the measure excepting Walbridge A. Field. Mr. Pierce's successor, though Gen. Butler keeps very quiet, and is heard only through others. Gov. Rice argues for it as the lesser of two evils. He says it is extra-legal and extra-constitutional, but not unconstitutional, and it seems to him to be the only solution which can be offered, and deserves careful consideration from the fact of its having been matured by some of the most eminent men in both parties. The plan, he thinks, may be wise as an expedient, but should not be allowed to become a precedent. The majority of the Democrats here appear to be in favor of the measure. Leopold Morse, the Congressman elect from the Fourth District, is for it. Frank Bird is opposed to it. He holds that it is better, so long as the difficulty cannot be settled according to the Constitution, to refer the whole matter back to the people, rather than establish a precedent which might be mischievous in the future.

AN AMENDMENT TO THE BILL.

A DEMOCRATIC CONGRESSMAN SAID TO HAVE AN AMENDMENT TO THE BILL—THE JUDICIAL FEATURE OF THE BILL.

Dispatch to the Associated Press.

WASHINGTON, Jan. 21.—Prominent Democrats of the House, while favoring the plan of the Joint Committee as a basis for settlement of the Electoral question, says that he, and others of his party, will insist on an amendment before giving to it their support. The amendment is in the direction of the judicial feature of the bill. The Democratic caucus to-morrow will further consult upon the subject, and probably arrive at a conclusion as to the course they shall pursue.

There are many more members of both parties who do not give the bill their unqualified approval than there are members who unhesitatingly approve it. All want the subject thoroughly discussed before final action. The general impression is that both houses will agree upon some plan for settling all questions connected with the Electoral vote.

It was ascertained to-day that the President has said it is his intention to sign the bill providing for the counting of the Electoral vote in case it passes both houses of Congress.

OPPOSITION IN THE LEGISLATURE.

REPUBLICAN ASSEMBLYMEN OPPOSED TO THE CONGRESSIONAL PLAN—A MAJORITY IN FAVOR OF SENATOR WOODIN'S RESOLUTIONS.

The impression having erroneously got abroad that the Republicans of the Legislature were generally in favor of the "Compromise" bill now before Congress, a representative of THE TIMES yesterday visited some of the members from this City, and obtained the following opinions:

Assemblyman J. C. J. Langbein said that the general feeling among the Republicans of the Legislature was opposed to the adoption of the Congressional plan, and that the Republican majority in both houses would stand by Senator Woodin's resolutions. It was the almost unanimous feeling that by adhering to the old constitutional method, the election of Hayes would be assured, but that the proposed commission would be pretty sure to result in the choice of Tilden. It was abandoning an extremely favorable position for one that was, at the best, problematical. The Constitution plainly said that "the votes should be opened by the President of the Senate in the presence of both houses, and then counted," and the presumption was that it was the duty of the man who opened the votes to count them. Then there was the question of legality. If Congress itself had not the power of election it certainly could not delegate that power to others. If the election took place in any other way than according to the Constitution, and this commission were to declare Hayes or Tilden elected, the defeated party would have it in their power to raise the question that he had not been chosen under the Constitution. It was not in the power of Congress to change the requirements of the Constitution. That could only be done by three-fourths of the States, and in the present state of that instrument there was no doubt that the Republicans had a decided advantage, which it would be gross folly to abandon.

Assemblyman Robert H. Strahan said that, personally, he considered the Electoral bill a bad thing for the Republicans, and that he thought this feeling was shared by the Republican majority in both houses of the Legislature. The position of the Republicans—that the President of the Senate was empowered to count the votes—was strictly in accordance with the views of all the greatest constitutional lawyers, including Kent and Story. For the Republicans to throw up the solid legal advantages which they now possessed for the doubtful decision of a questionable tribunal would hardly be considered statesmanship from any point of view. In conclusion Mr. Strahan repeated his opinion that both the Senate and Assembly would pass the Woodin resolutions, and adhere to the position taken by the masses of the party generally—that the Constitution and the laws afforded a better mode of settling the dispute than was offered in the proposed compromise.

Assemblyman William H. Corse said that at first the "compromise" had met with considerable favor, but that on a careful examination its tendency was discovered to be so hostile to the rights of the Republican Party and the plain requirements of the Constitution, that the feeling concerning it had been changed to one of opposition. He agreed with the gentleman mentioned above, that there would be no wavering in the Republican ranks at Albany.

Mr. Elliot C. Cowdin said that he had been too much occupied of late to give the subject such consideration as its importance demanded. For some time past he had avoided any discussion of the Presidential question, believing that it was a purely legal one, to be decided as such under the Constitution and laws. There being only two candidates who had received Electoral votes, one or the other of them was certainly elected; on this point there could be no dispute, and there ought to be no compromise.

THE ELECTORAL PLAN.

FURTHER EXPRESSIONS OF OPINION BY THE REPUBLICAN PRESS OF THE COUNTRY.

From the Cleveland (Ohio) Leader.

The more carefully the details of the plan and its logical results are studied, the less we believe it will commend itself to the better judgment of the country.

From the Milwaukee (Wis.) Sentinel.

The country will expect the two houses to adopt the plan proposed, or some similar one, without delay, thus relieving the country from this state of nervous unrest.

From the Meriden (Conn.) Republican.

If the country is ready to override constitutional authority, and wipe it out by summary process, when its provisions stand in the way of a candidate's election to the Presidency, the new plan ought to be adopted.

From the Pittsburg Gazette.

This so-called "compromise" is a rope of sand. It has no cohesive power, and is of no value, except in the presence of a spirit of conciliation, which would more speedily settle the business without its cumbersome machinery.

From the Cincinnati Times.

We do not believe such a poor piece of political tinkering can receive the indorsement of either branch of Congress. We are certain it will receive the emphatic condemnation of the people. Any Representative of either party who records his vote in favor of this scheme will almost certainly be summarily repudiated by his constituents.

From the Syracuse Standard.

We are not quite ready to approve of the measure in all its details, and we are at a loss to discover where the authors can find constitutional authority for such a plan for electing a President, but if that is the only way out of the difficulty that exists in Presidential matters, we shall not object to the plan, and cheerfully abide the result.

From the Louisville Commercial.

We are not prepared to accept the bill very enthusiastically, believing, as we do, that Hayes and Wheeler were elected, and preferring the old way of certifying that result to the country. Practically the decision of the result is put in the hands of some Justice of the Supreme Court, and we believe the Constitution meant it to be in the hands of the President of the Senate.

From the Auburn Advertiser.

We think, therefore, that the plan proposed is hardly worthy of its name. It does away with the simple provisions of the Constitution, constructs in place of them an awkward piece of machinery that contains many opportunities for innumerable delays and frauds and intrigue without number, besides bringing the Supreme Court into the arena of politics, while its nature is in direct violation of the Constitution without offering any really more practical or sensible solution of this or similar complications.

From the Cleveland (Ohio) Herald.

If, in spite of the confessedly "extra-constitutional," and undoubtedly unconstitutional, scheme for "smothering, if not entirely suppressing," a constitutional officer, the "committee contrivance" is carried into effect, the result will be peaceably submitted to by the Republicans, whether that result be in favor of Tilden or Hayes. But it is nevertheless our duty to point out that the proposed scheme is without warrant in the Constitution; is undoubtedly a clear violation of the meaning of the Constitution, and establishes a precedent that is likely to prove a serious danger in the future.

From the Lockport Journal.

After all we don't quite like the looks of the "white heap," and should have preferred straightforward action under "the Constitution as it is." If the Supreme Court must be appealed to for the settlement of doubtful constitutional questions, we would prefer the court "as it is"—not "picked and culled." We can scarcely call to mind a case where Democratic leaders have gone in for the settlement of a question for the welfare of the country or for general harmony and good will to men, that they did not, as the result proved, have all the while an eye single to partisan success.

From the Bangor (Me.) Whig.

We believe the proposed bill to be unconstitutional, unwise, and unnecessary. It asserts a power of Congress over the votes of the States that is not granted in the Constitution, and it proposes to reopen a dispute over a verdict which has been rendered by the Electors of the States, the only body having authority to render it. "Expediency" is always inexpedient when it violates fundamental principles, and we object to overriding the plain letter of the Constitution for no better reason than that certain lawless demagogues are threatening to make trouble and that certain other people are ready to make fatal concessions "rather than have a fuss."

From the Portland. (Me.,) Press.

Whatever objections there may be to the proposed agreement, and there seem to be few if any, it will be unhesitatingly acknowledged that a faulty agreement is better than no agreement at all. Better even, and of more consequence than the adoption of any plan, however good, is the spirit of conciliation and of regard for law and constitutional authority evinced by the members of the committee. The wise example will be set which in all probability be followed in both houses, though in each house there may be found men in whom partisan zeal outruns patriotism and discretion; let us hope these are few in number.

From the Adrian (Mich.) Times.

The plan is abortive as a solution of the difficulty, and this, perhaps, from the very nature of the difficulty itself. The trouble arises solely from the post-election tactics of the Democratic Party. Defeated at the ballot-box they have resorted to the policy of the bully, the ruffian and the sneak thief. We object to the will of the people indicated by the election of Hayes, being possibly jeopardized in defference to the howls of the defeated party. The measure is before Congress and the people. We sincerely hope that the people's Representatives at Washington will visit upon this effort at a compromise, under circumstances in which compromise is cowardice and worse, the defeat it deserves.

From the Hartford Post.

Men say accept it and get rid of the question. As well urge that we all take refuge in the fool's paradise. Follow the Constitution and the question may be settled on the 14th of February; adopt this mode, and it will not be determined before the 4th of March, and very likely not then. If the business is prolonged till Gen. Grant's term has expired, the President of the Senate will become President, and we should instantly have another Presidential campaign on our hands. A delightful prospect truly. Nothing is to be gained by the new plan, in point of time, and by means of it this unrest and suspense may be prolonged for a whole year, or the Republicans may lose by a technical decision what they have fairly won, and what they can hold if they have the nerve to stand on their constitutional rights.

From the Chicago Journal.

It appears that the joint committee of Congress propose to that body to "abdicate," and instead of having the people elect the President, to leave the matter to lottery. We object to the plan, because it is submitting to an irresponsible, and, as we believe, an unconstitutional tribunal, the settlement of a question which has already been settled by the people; because the tribunal referred to is, as we believe, partisan, prejudiced in advance; because, whichever way the question is settled, public confidence in the Supreme Court will be affected, for, be the members of that body ever so chaste as ice they shall not escape calumny. But it is "a way out of the difficulty," say a great many well-meaning men. So is into the fire a way out of the frying-pan. The entire Congressional plan settles nothing, but leaves the door as wide open as before for the future, besides establishing a precedent of the most alarming and dangerous character.

From the St. Louis Globe-Democrat.

We are not disposed to find fault with the plan of counting the vote adopted by the Conference Committee, but it is no little humiliation, after the worship which has been lavished upon the Constitution, to find that we are compelled, in a very ordinary emergency, to resort to a device which has no savor of constitutionality about it. As far as the Constitution provides for counting the Electoral vote, it provides that this shall be done without any assistance or intervention of the Supreme Court. This objection, however, is only on the question of form, and we have always insisted that the Constitution was a total blank as far as regarded any provision for obviating a dead-lock between the two houses. If both houses are willing to renounce that right, on which each has insisted, of a separate veto on the counting of any vote, by agreeing to give the casting vote to the Supreme Court, we believe that the country would acquiesce in it.

From the Albany Journal.

We accept the compromise plan because it assures a solution of the Presidential complications in which all will acquiesce: because it disarms the violent Democracy; because it will give confidence to business; because it is as fair as any such compromise could be; and because an undoubted compromise may be better than a possible conflict and disturbance. But while accepting it, let it be understood also that the only necessity for it is the revolutionary and threatening attitude of the Democratic managers. Another thought must not be overlooked. The plan is accepted as, under the circumstances, the best way out of a bad scrape; envy; but it is none the less a departure from the straight course. It is open to these objections: That it asserts the power of Congress to judge of the certificates of the States; that it thus makes Congress master of the Presidential elections, as the Constitution designed that it should not be; that the presumptive reason for calling in Judges is that questions of law are to be settled, and, if so, they should be referred to the whole court as a court; and finally that it is an expedient and not a system. But we believe that through the departure from law the law will still prevail. In accepting the plan we must not fail at the same time to point out these truths.

VIEWS OF ONE OF THE FRAMERS OF THE CONSTITUTION ON THE PRINCIPLE INVOLVED.

In 1801 the House of Representatives passed a bill depriving the President of the Senate of his rights under article 11 of the Constitution. This bill is said to have formed the basis of the compromise measure now before Congress. In debating, Mr. Charles Pinckney, of South Carolina, one of the purest and ablest men of the day, and a distinguished member of the convention, said:

"I have some claim to expect your indulgence, while I review not only that subject but the principal features of the bill, while I endeavor to show that it is a serious invasion of some of the most important rights solemnly and explicitly reserved by the Constitution to the State Legislatures; that it is a bill more alarming in its consequences than even the alien or sedition law.

"Knowing that it was the intention of the Constitution to make the President completely independent of the Federal Legislature, I well remember it was the object, as it is at present—not only the spirit but the letter of that instrument—to give to Congress no interference in, or control over the election of a President. * * * * * It never was intended, nor could it have been safe, in the Constitution to have given to Congress thus assembled in convention the right to object to any vote, or even to question whether they were constitutionally or properly given. This right of determining on the manner in which the Electors shall vote, the inquiry into the qualifications, and the guards necessary to prevent disqualified or improper men voting, and to insure the votes being legally given, rests, and is exclusively vested in the State Legislatures.

* * * * * * *

"It was intended to give your President the command of your forces, the disposal of all the honors and offices of your Government, the management of your foreign concerns, and the revision of your laws. Invested with these important powers, it was easily to be seen that the honor and interest of your Government required that he should execute them with firmness and impartiality; that to do this he must be independent of the Legislature; that they must have no control over his election; that the only mode to prevent this was to give the exclusive direction to the State Legislatures in the mode of choosing Electors, who should be obliged to vote secretly; and that the vote should be taken in such manner, and on the same day.

* * * * * *

They well knew that to give to the members of Congress a right to give votes in this election, or to decide upon them when given, was to destroy the independence of the Executive, and make him the creature of the Legislature."

RESULTS OF THE CONFERENCE.

THE RUSSIAN AMBASSADOR'S EFFORTS TO AVERT WAR—THE REPRESENTATIVES READY TO TAKE THEIR LEAVE OF THE SULTAN—RUSSIA'S APPEAL TO EUROPE—THE ARMY IN ROUMANIA.

LONDON, Jan. 22.—Dispatches from Constantinople say: Gen. Ignatieff at the meeting of the Conference on Saturday, after alluding to the efforts he had made to avert war, declared that if the Porte should disregard the armistice or take any action hostile to Montenegro and Servia; or if the Christian inhabitants of Turkey should be subjected to any hardships, Europe would treat such proceedings as provocation, and would consider what course ought to be adopted. He also remarked that the European plenipotentiaries had received petitions from the Christians of Macedon, Thessaly, Epirus and Crete. It had been impossible to consider these papers, as the scope of the conference was limited; but he was anxious to state that they had been received.

All the plenipotentiaries have assembled at the Austrian Embassy, and signed the final protocol of the conference. The Ambassadors of the European powers have requested audiences with the Sultan, for the purpose of taking their leave. The Sultan will probably receive them to-day.

A morning newspaper's dispatch from Pesth says it is reported in Vienna that the Porte intends after the departure of the Ambassadors to publish a manifesto to Europe, giving an account of the proceedings of the conference. A Berlin special represents that Russia seems inclined to revert to the Berlin Memorandum as a scheme for the settlement of the Eastern Question.

The Berlin correspondent of a morning paper telegraphs that Russia is beginning to represent to the Powers that the demands of the conference having been rejected, it devolves upon Europe to take more forcible proceedings. Should Europe, as is certain, find it impossible to agree on joint action, Russia will be able to declare that the failure of the conference is the defeat of Europe, not of Russia. Meanwhile it appears that Russia wishes to make some arrangement with Austria respecting a joint occupation of Bulgaria and Bosnia. Count Andrassy will hardly agree to this, whatever he may be driven to do if the Russians act on their own responsibility. The steady reinforcement of the Russian Army probably means no more than that the Russians will cross the Pruth, but without any immediate intention of crossing the Danube. It is probable that Turkey would tolerate the presence of the Russians in Roumania for a short time, after which the financial strain caused by the large armaments which she has been compelled to keep up would compel her to choose her course.

The Pera correspondent of a morning paper says it is probable that the Porte, after the departure of the Ambassadors, may voluntarily grant larger concessions than those demanded by the powers. Gen. Ignatieff, in his speech on Saturday, remarked that Russia's moderation must not be misinterpreted. It did not originate in weakness, but in the Government's sincere desire to act in accordance with the wishes of Europe. Europe reserved to itself the right to take future action with regard to the grievances existing in Epirus, Thessaly, and Crete. The Vienna correspondent of the same paper states that the truth of the reports of heavy French purchases of grain in Hungary is denied.

Another dispatch from Pera reports that Hobart Pasha has been instructed to offer admission into the Turkish fleet to a number of British naval officers.

FRANCE AND GERMANY.

EFFECT OF THE RECENT HOSTILE UTTERANCES OF THE GERMAN PRESS.

LONDON, Jan. 22.—A dispatch from Paris says: The recent hostile utterances of the German press have caused a very serious impression there. The French journals advocate a strict actitude of non-interference in regard to foreign affairs. They deny that any extraordinary measures of Army organization are on foot.

The Standard's Paris dispatch says the recent killing of a German sailor by some French seamen at Smyrna is unduly magnified by the German press into an international difficulty. The French Government has ordered an inquiry, and will give every satisfaction. The affair was the result of a drunken brawl.

The Post's Berlin dispatch states that the feeling of resentment against France, because of her supposed hostility at the Constantinople Conference, continues unabated both in official circles and among the general public.

MISCELLANEOUS FOREIGN NOTES.

LONDON, Jan. 22.—The Chinese Ambassador has arrived at Southampton.

The arrival of Don Carlos at Constantinople is announced.

Viscount Gage, of Ireland, is dead.

A special from Pesth reports that a deputation left Szeegdin on Saturday for Italy, to offer Kossuth a seat as Deputy in the Hungarian Parliament.

A telegram to the Daily News, from Rome, says the Pope has privately notified four Italian, two French, two Spanish and two Austrian ecclesiastics, that they are to be nominated Cardinals at the next Consistory.

CONDITION OF THE RIVERS.

WASHINGTON, Jan. 21.—The Chief Signal Officer reports that the Mississippi River has risen 23 inches at Cairo, three feet and six inches at Memphis, 17 inches at Vicksburg, and three inches at New-Orleans, and remained without change from St. Paul to St. Louis. No change has occurred in the Missouri River. The Red River has risen six inches at Shreveport, and the Cumberland 17 inches at Nashville. No change of importance is reported from the Tennessee or Alleghany Rivers. The Monongahela rose seven feet and two inches at Brownsville, but was falling at last report. The Ohio has risen four feet and 10 inches at Pittsburg, fallen 15 inches at Cincinnati, and risen eight inches at Louisville; it is now six feet above the danger level at the latter place, and two feet and five inches above it at Cincinnati. The Savannah River has risen one foot and 20 inches at Augusta, and the Potomac two feet and four inches at Harper's Ferry. The latter river was at a stand at last report, with little ice floating.

The principal rainfall has taken place in the watershed of the Mississippi below Memphis, not enough above that point to affect the river.

MAKING NEW SENATORS.

THE ILLINOIS SENATORSHIP.

THE DEMOCRATS TO SUPPORT GEN. ANDERSON—GOV. PALMER WITHDRAWS HIS NAME—GEN. LOGAN'S FRIENDS STILL CONFIDENT.

Special Dispatch to the New-York Times.

SPRINGFIELD, Jan. 21.—The Democratic caucus to-night decided to support Hon. William A. Anderson, Gov. Palmer withdrawing, and, in a strong speech, urging his friends to vote unanimously for that gentleman. If they do so, Anderson will be elected. A few Democrats are protesting against Anderson and swear they will never vote for him, but it is doubtful if any of them are brave enough to defy the decree of the party. There may be no election to-morrow, as a few Democrats threaten to vote for a straight Democrat instead of for Anderson. It is not believed they will hold out very long. Gen. Logan says he can be elected, but he has been waiting for this condition of affairs, and knows where his votes are coming from. His friends hope that he is right, but some of them fear he is too sanguine.

NEW-JERSEY'S NEXT SENATOR.

GOV. BEDLE INDUSTRIOUSLY PLOTTING IN HIS OWN BEHALF—MR. M'PHERSON DETERMINED AND CONFIDENT—MR. GREEN'S FOLLOWERS HOPEFUL AND EARNEST—THE REPUBLICANS QUIET AND KEEPING THEIR POWDER DRY.

From Our Own Correspondent.

TRENTON, Saturday, Jan. 20, 1877.

The second week of the legislative session left everything adrift upon a doubtful sea. The street talk is still of Green and McPherson, in the main, although it has at last been drilled through the craniums of some doubters that the serene smile of Gov. Bedle has been a mask for much industrious plotting in his own behalf, and that Mr. Leon Abbett carries more dynamite in his pocket than the average politician, and that consequently there may be an explosion under the joint meeting which will project the disfigured remains of several prosperous candidates into the Delaware River. Still, the "dark horse" has few demonstrative backers, and the gentleman who is eager to bet that he can "name the winner" remains in strict seclusion. Nearly all the Democratic lobby and legislators remained over after the adjournment, on Wednesday, and the struggle developed new energy and acrimony. Next morning the Green men asserted that McPherson looked like one who had experienced a hard Winter, and that his prospects were badly frost-bitten. On the other hand, Mr. McPherson quietly said that it required a very low temperature to freeze him out, and that as yet he didn't feel chilly. He had been addicted to winning in politics, he said, from a very early age, and he found it difficult, at his time of life, to break off from the habit. I am inclined to discredit all rumors that Mr. McPherson has been, or will be, forced out of the fight. He has already risked too much of money, and effort, and reputation, and hope in this enterprise to make any terms with his adversaries possible. It is now or never with him. He has enlisted for the war, and must fight it through to the end, however bitter. In the early days of the session it looked as if Gov. Bedle would easily choke off Mr. Green at the critical moment, and adroitly secure for himself the results of all the toil and trouble of the State-house Ring, but since maps of his rather crooked trail have been published, and it can be plainly seen in what direction he has been edging and sliding, his path may prove a thorny one.

After all, Green and McPherson still hold the lead and the "feeling" between the two has become intensified into a bitterness beyond all precedent. Mr. Green's friends speak lightly of McPhearson's chances and claim that he is "bluffing on a very small pair." They point with fine scorn at his chief of staff and his corps of sappers and miners, and quote those wise words of the copy-book, "A man is known by the company he keeps." They profess an unstaggering faith in that State pride which will at last repudiate the audacious pretensions of one who lays claim to the crowning honor in the gift of the Commonwealth, solely because he spent a given number of dollars in a political canvass. It cannot be denied that there is much truth in all this talk, and it can be plainly seen that somehow Mr. Green has come to be the more democratic representative of the character and sulvation of the State, and his more enthusiastic adherents are convinced that he stands as a breakwater against the tempestuous horde of political adventurers who are sweeping up to the very foundations of Nassau Hall, and threaten to submerge that venerable institution of learning, the Calvinistic theology, the daily bath, and the swallow-tail coat in one common ruin.

It is a very different view which one gets from the Clan McPherson. Buckets of war paint stand thickly around among the bottles, and the gray eye of the chief flashes with mischief. He will have no weapons "blunt as fencers' foils which hit but hurt not." He whets his scalping-knife in public, and makes no secret of his purpose to "raise the hair" of Kelsey and Little and all the State-house Ring. He urges with much cogency that he was a good enough Jerseyman to represent his county in the State Senate—a good enough business man to organize and carry forward to the full tide of successful experiment one of the grandest commercial enterprises in the world—a good enough politician to have wrested the Legislature from Republican control. He does not deny that Mr. Green had a large number of ancestors killed, wounded, and missing at the battle of Princeton, but he invites attention to the fact that it is Mr. Green himself who is canvassing for the Senate, and not his Revolutionary sires. Mr. McPherson's men-at-arms are very boisterous and boastful, and seem anxious to prove that they are earning their wages. They are especially affirmative about their leader's virtue, and if any skeptic has the hardihood to question his super-eminent fitness for the United State Senate they refer him at once to that severe moralist, Delos Culver, Esq.

The most significant collision between these rival forces was on the question of an early caucus. Mr. Green's managers saw that his grip upon his men was growing firmer, and therefore favored delay. Mr. McPherson, who is alert, wary and unrelenting in his pressure upon the weak points of his adversary's line, was ready for a sudden attack, and therefore he desired an immediate caucus. The caucus was postponed until Monday evening, but this can hardly be scored as a victory for Mr. Green. The lazy Mr. Abbett, who had threatened both aspirants into making him President of the Senate, now deceives them both by pretended support. He voted for the early caucus to put McPherson off his guard, but took pains to secure enough votes to defeat this measure, and thus deluded the confiding Green. The truth seems to be that Mr. Abbett's infernal machine was hardly completed, and he was willing to run no risks from a premature explosion.

A few enthusiasts who believe that both Green and McPherson will be eliminated, imagine that the battle-field of Monmouth ought to furnish some votes for Joel Parker, and they look upon him as the coming compromise. But Mr. Parker has grown too logy, and needs too much lifting and pushing. There is no spring or buoyancy about him, and if he ever reaches a Senatorial chair he must be rolled up into it on skids. Chancellor Runyon is definitely out of the field. Since the committee of 15 has been patented at Washington he expects Mr. Tilden to be counted in, and he has assurances that after the 4th of March he can utilize, as Secretary of War, the martial experience which he acquired during his career of three months in the Federal Army.

Meanwhile, the Republicans talk very little, but they keep their powder dry. There has been a little effort to bull Mr. Frelinghuysen's stock, but the market is heavy, and one can speak disparagingly of our Senator in Republican circles without fear of being challenged to mortal combat. Elderly people remember the early days of our war and the Peace Congress, and, in critical times like the present, when backbone is needed, there is a prevalent fear that he may weaken. The occasion is too serious for any so-called complimentary vote, which, when carefully analyzed, is a left-handed compliment at best, and Mr. Frelinghuysen is in a promising way to be quietly relegated. It is no secret that the Democrats distrust some of the weaker brethren, and when one seems disposed to coquette with Republicans a body guard of duennas is organized for the protection of his virgin purity, and his governesses relax none of their adhesive vigilance day or night. Cortlandt Parker, or Phelps, or McCarter could either of them throw 40 solid votes into the contest, which to the demoralized Democracy would be an alarming send-off. Finally, the contagious example of other States and the delay in holding the caucus may altogether break the caucus power, and it would not be surprising if the joint meeting began to ballot on the Massachusetts plan with half a dozen nominations.

THE ASHTABULA BRIDGE.

TESTIMONY OF THE MASTER MACHINIST BEFORE THE CORONER'S JURY.

CLEVELAND, Jan. 21.—The Coroner's jury at Ashtabula met yesterday morning at 9 o'clock. Mr. Albert Congdon, the first witness, testified as follows: At the time of the construction of this bridge I was employed by the Lake Shore Road as master machinist; knew something about the construction of this bridge, as I had charge of the work in making the bridge; found a lack of material to fill the place for which it was designed; told Mr. Tomlinson about it, and he wanted to know if he had better let Mr. Stone know it; told him he had better; a short time afterward I was told to take the plans and finish the construction of the bridge as I thought it should be done; do not know how far the work had progressed at the time I assumed control; the braces were not marked so as to designate the position they were to occupy; never calculated the strength of the tension of compression members; did not say much to Mr. Tomlinson or any other man about the bridge, as I did not consider myself a competent bridge man; from the time of Mr. Tomlinson leaving I had the management of constructing the bridge; as soon as the bridge was completed it was shipped to Ashtabula; there was a recess in the angle-block into which the lateral braces fitted; the lateral braces on the top chord were fastened to the outside of the angle-block by a lug passing up about three inches through the angle-block; this description applies to the bridge before it was shipped; as soon as the bridge was shipped, Mr. Rogers told me that Mr. Stone had given him orders to erect it, but he did not know how; I asked him why he did not go and tell Mr. Stone so, and he said that he did not like to; I then told him as much as I knew.

SOUTH AND CENTRAL AMERICA.

QUIET IN CHILI AND PERU—THE WAR IN COLOMBIA—THE CENTRAL AMERICAN COFFEE CROP.

PANAMA, Jan. 10.—Advices from the South Pacific are favorable. Chili is quiet and prosperous, and the same may be said in a modified sense of Peru. At least, in the latter Republic the condition of affairs was improving at last advices, which were to Dec. 28. The revolution in Ecuador is reported to be at an end. In Colombia there was still a state of actual warfare when the latest advices were dispatched from the interior, but hopes were entertained that peace would speedily be restored.

From Central America nothing of interest has been received since the last mail left for New-York by the Cresent City, on the 21 inst. The coffee crop had not begun to be shipped to any great extent. The first of the crop will go to San Francisco, owing to the better price commanded there. Everything is quiet on the Isthmus. The dry season has come at last, and everybody is more cheerful. The United States steamers Pensacola and Omaha are still here, also the Daring. Business continues very dull.

LOSSES BY FIRE.

A YOUNG MAN SEVERELY INJURED.

Shortly before 11 o'clock last night a fire broke out on the first floor of the three-story brick building No. 125 West street, occupied by John Fuhrs as a butcher store. The fire extended to the coffee and cake saloon of Ewald & Mantz, adjoining, and to No. 124 West street, occupied by Klopenburg & Renken as a liquor store. The firemen, although promptly on hand, did not succeed in checking the progress of the flames until a second alarm had brought reinforcements to their aid. The fire burned fiercely for nearly an hour, but did not extend beyond No. 124 West street.

The losses are as follows: Fuhrs, the butcher, at No. 125, sustained a loss of $2,000 on stock and fixtures. Ewald & Mantz, the proprietors of the coffee saloon, lose $500. The loss of Koppenburg & Renken is estimated at $1,500 to stock, &c. John Marks, fancy goods, loss $1,500; White & Wood, shipping office, damage to fixtures, $100; J. Jeneman, who kept a barber shop on the second floor of No. 124, sustained a loss of $300. The damage to the buildings is estimated at $2,000.

Max Fatchen, aged 19, who was asleep in the barber shop on the second floor of No. 124, was aroused by the smoke, and becoming frightened jumped out of the second-story window to the sidewalk, and was seriously injured. He was cared for by his friends.

A large barn, two miles and a half from Worcester, Mass., owned by William T. Brown, was burned yesterday morning. In the barn were 19 head of cattle, a horse, and three pigs, all of which perished. A complete outfit of farming tools, 20 tons of hay, carriages, wagons, and a large amount of grain were also burned. The loss is $9,000, and the insurance $6,000, distributed as follows: $1,500 each in the Manchester, of Manchester, and the Liverpool, of Liverpool; $2,000 in the First National, of Worcester, and $1,000 in the Worcester Mutual.

A fire at Rockford, Ill., yesterday morning, destroyed the furniture factory of Upham & Herrick; loss about $50,000; insurance, $1,500 in the Fire Association, $1,000 in the American of Philadelphia, $1,000 in the Hudson of New-Jersey, $1,000 in the Millville, and $500 in the Patterson. The night-watchman is supposed to have perished in the flames.

The fire at Baeder, Adamson & Co's glue works, at Philadelphia, on Saturday night, caused a loss of about $20,000, which is partially covered by insurance.

MARINE DISASTERS.

WASHINGTON, Jan. 21.—The Signal Service Observer at Cape Hatteras reports to the Chief Signal Officer as follows: "The schooner John A. Viles, of Boston, Mass., went ashore one mile south of Hatteras Inlet on the 7th inst., with a cargo of hay and potatoes for Charleston, S. C. The Captain, E. A. Wyman, and crew of six men were saved in their own boats, there being no life-saving crew. The vessel and most of her cargo will be a total loss. No assistance was asked from the wrecking service."

CHATHAM BEACH, Jan. 21.—The steamer Perit will prove a total loss, all hope of getting her off having been abandoned. A large portion of her cargo has been saved.

RACING AT CHARLESTON.

CHARLESTON, Jan. 21.—The meeting at Washington Course closed yesterday. The first race for all ages, one mile dash, purse $120, was won by Asteroid, with Ascot second, Abdallah third, and Rutledge fourth. Time, 1:51. The second race was for all ages, one mile and a half, for a purse of $120, and was won by Conrier, with Libbie L. second. Time, 2:49. The third race, for three-year olds, one mile, post stakes, purse $100, the second horse to save his stake, was taken by Lynchburg, Meinbrace second. Time, 1:55. The fourth was a hurdle race for all ages, two miles, over eight hurdles, for a purse of $120; Jim. Hinton came in first, Prang second, and Dead Shot third. Time, 4:11.

BURIED FOR TWELVE HOURS.

UTICA, Jan. 21.—Charles Wooliver, who was buried in the quicksand of a forty-foot well at Mohawk at noon on Saturday, was rescued at midnight. He was alive and apparently well, but died within an hour and a half, and was conscious to the last. He leaves a widow and four children.

A MURDERER CONVICTED.

HARRISBURG, Jan. 21.—Frank Wilson, colored, who was on trial for the murder of a white man named John Rudy, was to-day convicted of murder in the first degree.

*MURDER I

seemed a cross between a Byronic hero and a Spanish matador. There he was a force, though somewhat of the prairie tornado sort, which scatters and breaks everything promiscuously; here he has always seemed impeded by parliamentary proprieties; finds little opening for his peculiar style of declamation; saves his lungs and grows gray decorously—and stout. I am afraid that Mr. Blaine has made a similar mistake. He will always be respectable in the Senate—he would have been redoubtable in the House. Still, young blood is needed in this branch of the National Legislature, and something more of vigorous will, drive, and audacity. Lowell, in his Fourth of July ode, says rather ungraciously:

"Who sit where once in crowned seclusion sate
The long-proved athletes of debate,
Trained from their youth as none think needful now!

Is this debating club, where boys dispute
And wrangle o'er their stolen fruit,
The Senate, erewhile guerdon of the few,
Where Clay once flashed and Webster's cloudy brow
Brooded those bolts of thought that all the horizon knew?"

What say to this, "Our Boys" over yonder, Cadet Burnside, Master Morrill, that ingenuous youth Cameron, that hobbledehoy Frelinghuysen, Jones, the ruddy stripling, and those promising lads, Hamlin and Howe? Seriously, I disagree with the Cambridge odist, and think his judgment harsh and unjust. I hold that the Senate has too far "put away boyish things," that a little more youthful fire, dash and disputatiousness, wit, and satire, would improve that too honorable body. As for those "long-proved athletes ot debate," represented as sitting in "crowned seclusion," brooding and coddling their Senatorial dignity, has the poet forgotten what food for mirth, what targets for scorn and ridicule they were to Mr. "Hosea Biglow"? Here is a good example:

"'Slavery's a thing that depends on complexion—
It's God's law that fetters on black shins don't chafe—
If brains was to settle it, (horrid reflection,)
Which of our 'onorable body 'd be safe?'
Sez John C. Calhoun, sez he.
Sez Mr. Hannegan,
Before he began agin,
'That exception 's quite oppertoon,' sez he."

I knew something of the old Senate, and it was by no means wholly composed of sublimated patriots or intellectual giants. I do not believe that there were among them debaters better "trained from their youth" than Senator Thurman or Senator Conkling. Senator Morton can swing as ponderous a sledge-hammer of argument as did Stephen A. Douglas. Clay sometimes "flashed in the pan." He was often ineffective from too much heat and haste. He could be petty upon occasion, and personal and unparliamentary; imperious he was always. "Webster's cloudy brow" was sometimes portentous of nothing in particular. In his latter days, at least, unless when aroused by some great occasion, there was more weight in the manner than in the matter of his speech. There was an awful Olympian authority in the simple utterance of his favorite phrase, "In my opinion," and in the way he rumbled out "Constitution" and "Massachusetts," which inclined people to stand from under till they got used to it. There were times when he was not grand, though always grandiose; times when he delivered himself of his solemn sentences with rather a dull doggedness of purpose than the force of genuine conviction, and when even his Cassandra-like prophesies, since so wonderfully fulfilled, were unillumined by a single flash of that Hebraic fire of poetry which burned deep in the soul of the man. He could be drearily prosaic, though now and then he was playful, in a stately, ponderous way—that minuet-step of humor which he only allowed his royal genius to take in public.

The glamour of Clay's manner and the majesty of Webster's port had always much to do with the effect of their speeches. The voice of the one and the eye of the other had also wondrous spells of mastery. But from Mr. Schurz, Mr. Carpenter, and Mr. Conkling we have had, of late years, speeches embodying some of the finest elements of Mr. Clay's oratory, and surpassing it in some respects, while Mr. Sumner and Mr. Edmunds have given us orations which Webster would have been proud to father. As for brief speeches, on special occasions of state, or sad occasions of national loss—efforts, if so they may be called, requiring wit, delicate tact, or tender and generous feeling—what orator, in the palmiest days of the Senate, ever surpassed Senator Antoony? Against the noble memory of Silas Wright stands the living Bayard—suns reproche as a politician and a gentleman—proud of his integrity, steadfast in the principles of his party, as he understands them—a Democrat "dyed in the wool," but the wool of fine and strong fibre. As a clever manager of men, a consummate tactician, the venerable Senator from Pennsylvania need fear no comparison with "the favorite son of New-York," while he is said to be yet more true to his friends, even the most humble. If friends sometimes abuse that characteristic, as "'tis their nature to," it still remains in itself more admirable, more hearty and human than that arrogantly virtuous egotism that, as it mounts to power, coolly kicks away ladder after ladder of personal service. I doubt not that Senator Cameron joined in the late laugh over his canonization by his pious beneficiaries of Hilton Head, who, in their effusive gratitude, named their little church "Saint Simon's Chapel." Some people profess to be shocked at the sacrilege of the thing, and say that the edifice named in honor of this great political magician should rather be called "the chapel of Simon Magus." But if the poor negroes were guilty of a new form of the grave ecclesiastical sin of "Simony," it was unconsciously. They doubtless believe they have the right to elect their own saints—else what is the good of a fifteenth amendment? By the way, I am told that Senator Cameron saved the only fine old tree left to us on New-Jersey avenue, near the Capitol. We had remonstrated and entreated in vain; he sang "Woodman spare that tree," to a persuasive Senatorial air, and prevailed. If I were the Pope and the College of Cardinals, I would canonize him for that act alone. May the old tree live a hundred years to keep his memory green!

It seems to me folly to compare this Senate with that of 30 years ago. The issues, the emergencies and exigencies of to-day would have perplexed, burdened, and taxed those great men to such a degree that there would have been less expounding of the Constitution and pesing for immortality in that little circular chamber where the gods of debate lightened and thundered for a narrower horizon than ours. This really is no time for oratory; great events, mighty complications, and fatal crises speak for themselves. They follow each other so fast that there is no getting ready for them with an oration apiece. It would have taxed the Maires of Paris to have suitably addressed all the allied sovereigns raining down upon them at once. I half believe that if Webster himself could be sent back to us by some celestial Returning Board, he would stand majestically mute, as he "viewed the prospect o'er" and realized the piteous predicament of his beloved Union. He might not feel with the weakest of us a dreary sense of drifting through a fog toward sunken reefs of treason and disaster, or the Niagara of utter ruin, but something of apprehension would surely shake his great heart, though he might only give grim expression to the half dread, half impatience of Falstaff—"I would it were bed-time, and all were well." I doubt if even his genius could forge a key for the great "lock," and I think even his mighty brain would be puzzled by the problem of "dual State Governments." By the way, it has occurred to me that had heaven seen fit to prolong the lives of those worthy abnormal gentlemen and Southern citizens, the Siamese twins, a compromise might have been effected in one State at least, by appointing them to a double Gubernatorial chair. There would have been duality without division—the two heads that are better than one—a "tie" without a "lock." In case of any blunder, high crime, or misdemeanor of such an administration, there would hardly be danger of impeachment. It would be impossible to get at the Chang and the Eng of the matter, and investigators might go hang.

POST OFFICE CHANGES.

WASHINGTON, Jan. 21.—The following were the Post Office changes during the week ending Jan. 20, 1877:

E. Foster, Foster's Mills, Armstrong County; Franklin Showers, Kersey's, Elk County; Thomas M. Walker, Library, Allegheny County; John P. St. Clair, Lower Two Lick, Indiana County; Joseph Newland, Lucinda Furnace, Clarion County; Mary J. McCollough, Maders, Clearfield County; Daniel W. Reed, Pennsburg, Montgomery County; Anna C. Wise, Ridley Park, Delaware County; Jacob H. Brubaker, Rockton, Clearfield County; Francis M. Case, Sugar Creek, Venango County.

REMEDIES FOR MUNICIPAL BOND-HOLDERS.

A recent article having fully set forth the present legal status of municipal bonds, the question of remedies remains to be considered. In general, bonds in the hands of innocent holders for value, before maturity, have the quality of commercial paper and are unimpeachable, provided they are issued by the proper officers and within the scope of their delegated authority. But what practical remedy has the holder of a valid and defaulted bond?

1. If the statute has provided for a special tax and such tax has not been levied, he is entitled, as an original proceeding, to a writ of mandamus ordering the levy; otherwise, he must first sue at law and establish the validity and amount of his claim by a judgment. Thereupon, if the corporation can by law own property subject to execution, an execution is issued. Upon return of the writ unsatisfied, or "nulla bona," he is entitled to a writ of mandamus to compel the levy and collection of a tax to pay the judgment.

2. The Supreme Court has held (Amy vs. Supervisors, 11 Wall., 136, 1870,) that if the proper officers neglect or refuse to obey the writ without sufficient legal excuse, they become liable to the judgment creditor, in a private individual action, in damages to the extent of the injury sustained. A mere mistake as to their duty is no defense to such an action; but the court did not say whether the plaintiff may recover the amount of his judgment or must be limited to the actual injury sustained by the refusal.

3. In the case of United States vs. Boutwell, 17 Wall., 604, 1873, it was decided that, in the absence of any statute altering the common-law rule, the writ of mandamus does not reach the office, but only the particular person filling it; hence, either the death, removal, or resignation of the officer at once abates the writ and necessitates a new one. The practical importance of this will appear further on.

4. Just at this point in the proceedings the practical trouble of the bondholder usually begins. What will he do with his writ? It is not payment, and it does not execute itself. In fact, the custom has been to evade the writ by resigning, by refusing to qualify when elected, by neglecting to hold an election when vacancies have been made by resigning, by jumping out of the Court-house windows in order to escape service of the writ—as has been repeatedly done in Missouri—and even by flatly refusing obedience to it, as in the notorious Macoupin County case. Nevertheless, the proceeding must be by the writ only, and not by equity. This was first decided by the Supreme Court in Walkley vs. Muscatine, 6 Wall., 481, 1867, and in the more recent cases of Rees vs. Watertown and Heine vs Levee Commissioners, 19 Wall., 107, 655, 1873. These last two require special attention, being leading cases and extraordinarily strong for the bondholder.

The plaintiff, Rees, owned railroad-aid bonds of the City of Watertown, Wis., and after having execution returned unsatisfied, he procured, in 1869–70, three successive writs of mandamus, two of which were evaded by resignations, and the third by the neglect of all but a fraction of the people to vote at a special election, and the refusal of the persons so elected to qualify. He thereupon brought into court his bonds, with 14 years' accumulated interest, and boldly asked that the United States Marshal be directed to seize and sell any taxable property of the citizens, alleging that the authorities were virtually Trustees, and all property a trust fund, for the purpose. The Supreme Court, by Judge Hunt, denied this plea, holding that such piece of property is liable for only its proportionate share of debt; that the creditor had no right to collect his whole claim from one tax-payer, leaving him to indemnify himself as he could; and that a court of equity cannot, by avowing there is a right but no remedy to enforce it, create a remedy unknown to the law. In the similar Levee case, Judge Miller delivered the opinion, holding that the court cannot undertake the delicate function of taxation; that the practical failure of the regular remedy does not justify assuming an irregular one; and that mandamus is the regular and only proseeding. In both these cases Judges Swayne and Clifford dissented; in the Watertown case, the latter doing so "on the ground that equity will never suffer a trust to be defeated by the refusal of the Trustee to administer the trust, or on account of the misconduct of the Trustees." A later case, defeated on the same ground, was that of Hubbell vs. Watertown, in which the plaintiff sued 30 tax-payers individually.

It should be noticed that in the Watertown case, Rees took the bold position of asking that the United States Marshal take any property within the city which might be convenient, while in the Levee case the plea was that the District Judge be ordered to make the levy, which the Commissioners had refused to make; but in this case there had been neither suit nor judgment.

5. In New-England, by usage and practice, quasi corporations, or towns, counties, and parishes, are an exception to the common-law rule that corporations are not personally liable for the debts of the corporation; accordingly, private property may be taken to satisfy a public judgment. But generally, although in 1869 the Supreme Court—by a tie vote on the question of reversing the Circuit Court's decision in Morgan vs. Town of Beloit, Wis.—narrowly missed declaring the contrary, private property is only proportionately liable through a tax; and mandamus, whether it effects anything or not, is the only remedy. Thus far it has proved a very barren one.

But there are two suggestions. One is, that the decision as to personal liability of recusant officers affords a basis for an individual action; it is surprising that this has not been tried in the Macoupin case, unless municipalities are thoughtful enough to select for officers persons without property. The other is, that bondholders may, perhaps, find a hint in treatment, in the decision of the Watertown case and of the case of Supervisors vs. Rogers, 7 Wall., 175, 1868. The Circuit Court had directed the United States Marshal to levy and collect certain taxes, and this was sustained by the Supreme Court; in the Watertown case the court declared that the prior case depended, in this respect, wholly on a statute of Iowa, which was that the court "may direct that the act required to be done may be done by the plaintiff or by some other person appointed by the court." In the light of the reasoning in the Watertown and Levee cases, it is considered by Judge Dillon, in his commentary on the cases, that the distinction is rather strained, for he thinks that the Iowa statute was not intended to cover such an "act" as levying a tax. However, the fact remains that the Supreme Court, in its reasoning on these cases, did intimate that, while it is the province of the Legislature to regulate taxation, it could put it within the power of the court to order Federal officers to interfere if necessary. When a city or county is defiant and evades mandamus, it may be possible, therefore, for bondholders to make a successful appeal to the Legislature. But from the courts, at least as at present constituted, they will get only the barren relief of a writ which is evaded as often as granted.

OPPOSED TO COMPROMISE.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR.

THE FUNCTIONS OF JUDGES.

WHY JUSTICES OF THE SUPREME COURT SHOULD NOT FORM PART OF THE PROPOSED TRIBUNAL—A QUERY AS TO THE CAPACITY IN WHICH THEY ARE TO BE CALLED UPON TO ACT.

To the Editor of the New-York Times:

There is one point connected with the composition of the body to which it is proposed to intrust the counting of the Electoral vote, which, it seems to me, cannot have been duly considered by the eminent men who have devised this scheme. I would respectfully ask, then, in what capacity would the Judges of the Supreme Court sit on that commission? Even granting—which, however, I do not grant—that the Senate and House of Representatives have certain powers under the Constitution in deciding what votes are to be counted; granting that they may intrust those powers and their own discretion in their exercise to a joint committee of the two houses, and granting—which is still more doubtful than either of the above suppositions—that they may associate with them five other men, not members of either house, on such a committee—I then ask, supposing that these five men are Judges of the Supreme Court, in what capacity do they act on this commission? Is it as Judges or as private citizens? Can it be as Judges? Does not the function of a Judge under our law and that of England imply issue joined between two parties on some specific point of law or fact on which, in view of testimony and argument presented on either side, a decision shall be had? Is a Judge one to whom is given a roving commission to search out and discover the evidence on which he himself is to decide a point? And if these five Judges are charged with such a commission, and accept the office, does it not at once bring them down from their high judicial position, deprive the questions before them of that definiteness which is needful to secure a judicial decision, and make their opinions worth no more than those of a similar number of men of equal capacity and honesty with themselves? Connected, as they will be, with 10 others, who will almost inevitably be chosen as partisans, with foregone conclusions on either side of the question, must not their action and their conclusion be stripped of all judicial character or importance? And if, as seems to be supposed will probably be the result, the final decision should be secured by a majority of one, and that one understood to be in sympathy with the party in whose favor he may decide, what respect, after all, will be secured for a conclusion reached under such an arrangement?

But let us suppose that these five men have thus considered the case extra-judicially, and committed themselves on one side or the other; suppose, then, they should be called on to act judicially in the matter; that either Mr. Hayes or Mr. Tilden be invested with the Presidential office, and that some one disputing the right of the incumbent should resist the Executive and seek information quo warranto to be exercised by the Judiciary. I believe that all admit that such a writ would lie, and that the only tribunal before which it could be argued is the Supreme Court of the United States. But in what condition is that court left for judging the case, when five of its members have already disqualified themselves by a public and conspicuous declaration of opinion? Would the country be any better satisfied by a decision of that court under these circumstances? Clearly not. It would not do for the most important question that could come before them to be decided by a court half of whose members had disqualified themselves to consider it. Nor do I see how any judge, fit to sit on the Supreme Court bench, could consent thus to lay aside his proper functions. J. R. D.

THE NEW ELECTORAL PROCESS.

WANTED, A NEW METHOD FOR COUNTING THE ELECTORAL VOTE—THE CONGRESSIONAL PLAN A BUNGLING, PARTISAN JOB.

To the Editor of the New-York Times:

I have read the report of the Joint Committee of the Senate and House on Counting the Electoral Vote with much interest. It is evidently an invention to provide a new method of determining an election of President not contemplated by the Constitution. That being so, I would like to inquire what right seven men of either or both houses of Congress have to arrogate to themselves the sole opportunity of inventing in this emergency. This is a nation of sovereigns. Every voter is the peer of every Senator and Representative. It is also a nation of inventors—pre-eminently so. What presumption, therefore, for 14 men to assemble themselves as a joint committee in Washington to invent a new Electoral process, and leave 40,000,000 of their peers or constituents, including some of the greatest inventors of modern times, out in the cold!

This is a monopoly of the worst kind. It cannot be tolerated on principle. But in practice the invention now announced is a bungling job. Partisans will be appointed under it by the two houses, or else traitors. Then the Supreme Court is dragged in, with two partisans on each side, or at least suspected to be, and they are to choose a fifth, whose vote is to control. Suppose the four Judges cannot agree, will they consent to "flip a copper" for the choice? Quite likely. But then how much better it would have been to have done that in the first place, and save the peace and dignity of the Supreme Court! After the proposed performance that tribunal will follow the fate of its compeer in Mexico.

The Supreme Court there decided that its own Chief Justice was de facto and de jure President. An appeal to arms followed, and the Chief Justice is a fugitive to-day, and the Supreme Court is stripped of all its moral influence, which is all it can possess here as well as there. No! spare the Supreme Court, whatever else is done outside the Constitution! The damage would be irreparable. Instead of this, call on the country at large to invent a scheme to suit the case, which shall, like that proposed, be outside the Constitution, which latter has expressly designated the Vice President as the arbiter and authority on that subject. That being shut off as antiquated, let Congress call on inventors for plans, offering a reward of $1,000,000 for the best; $100,000 for the next best, and so down to a "chromo" for the poorest. Let a board of two Democrats and two Republican inventors, who do not submit plans, decide which is the best by a majority vote, and if they can't agree let Peter Cooper, as the inventor of gins and of financial theories, be the fifth member with a casting vote, the decision thus arrived at to be final. On 30 days' notice plenty of inventions would be submitted, doubtless many not thought of before, which would add value to the aggregate. The writer would certainly compete, and has at least half a dozen ready now, with more to follow.

There must be three grand divisions to the inventions, thus: Physical, mechanical, and mental. Of the physical, one example would be for Hayes and Tilden to stand on their heads in the Supreme Court-room in the presence of a "full bench," the one who could stand thus longest to be the winner, the Chief Justice noting the time. This would test the endurance of the brains of the two candidates—the very element most important in the Executive chair. It would also cause a friendly rivalry between the two great States of Ohio and New-York, which would gladly send 100,000 men each to see their champion in the contest. The betting would also stimulate business throughout the country by setting money in circulation.

Of the mechanical devices there would be an almost infinite variety. Thus, for the President of the Senate, either singly or jointly with the Speaker of the House, to fix copper in the presence of the two houses, would be an inexpensive and speedy method. Let the Chief Justice, if the Supreme Court must take a part, decide beforehand which candidates shall be staked on the head and which on the tail, and then examine and certify to the coppers as they lie. But this could as well be done by "tellers" of the two houses, the great object of the neutral position of the Supreme Court in political matters be attained, and both parties be satisfied.

Again, a great lottery wheel could be built, into which the Senate or the House, or both, in the persons of the members thereof, could be placed in layers. Then steam could be applied to a rotating motion of the cylinder after its hatches were closed. When the motion had been kept up for an hour, let the Sergeant at Arms open the proper orifice and put out seven of the members who first came to hand, and then close the doors. Let them at once proceed to build the President and declare the result. Then let all members who would agree to abide by the result come out and organize the two houses and ratify the choice. Those who would not thus agree should remain and be rotated another hour or more, until they joinly and severally agreed to "abide the inevitable." This process alone would prevent civil war. Even A. S. Hewitt would stop further proclamations under an hour or two of this treatment. This mechanical appliance is a sure cure for all the ills threatened to the Republic. Enterprising builders would even new contract to have one ready by the 14th of February next. A caveat is already secured on this invention—let inventors take notice.

Of the third, or mental class, there are also many varieties. Let the two candidates do as do candidates for civil office in China. Let them be locked into separate cells and write out essays on a given subject, in given time, and the best writer, in the opinion of the Supreme Court, or the Board of Education of the District of Columbia, take the vacant Executive chair. China has been a nation 4,000 years to our 100, and such is the result of its experience. Why throw the wisdom of the centuries away? Or Hayes and Tilden might be put into a spelling-class, the first one to miss, according to Webster's Unabridged, to retire. Or exercises in "boxing the compass backward," or reciting the Shorter or Longer Catechism would do. The advantages of this latter plan are evident, but especially that it brings the candidates themselves before the people. They would be "put through their paces" in public, and the best would win. How much better, thus than to let the question of our next Presidency hinge on the votes of a few darkeys or rather "colored citizens" in the swamps of Florida or Louisiana, where things are so tangled up that Evangeline and Gabrielle, with all their love, missed each other.

Mr. Editor, although I have but just entered into the portals of this subject, time and space forbid a present inspection of the interior. Meanwhile, if my suggestions are heeded by the arrogant assumptionists at Washington, they will forthwith insert the following advertisement in all the dailies, weeklies, and monthlies in the Union:

WANTED—A NEW METHOD OF COUNTING THE ELECTORAL VOTE OF THE UNITED STATES.—The Joint Committee of both houses invite their fellow-citizens to send in sealed plans for the above purpose, under the following rules: First, that designated by the Constitution will not be considered. Second, those least likely to bring the Supreme Court into public contempt will be considered first. Third, a reward of $———— will be paid to the successful competitor whose plan shall have enough of chance about it to satisfy both parties beforehand as to its fairness. Originals are to be sent to the Vice President at the Capitol and duplicates to the Chairmen of the Democratic and Republican National Committees at their private residences.

This will at least satisfy inventors. T. F.

GEN. DIX'S VIEWS APPROVED.

To the Editor of the New-York Times:

Without inflicting any legal opinion upon the question of the day, I cannot but say that there are thousands of intelligent and patriotic citizens who thoroughly indorse Gen. Dix's admirable and pertinent letter and your vigorous leaders on the subject. I do not charge upon the eminent Senators and Congressmen who have agreed to another "compromise" lack of knowledge or deficiency of patriotism; but where are the clarion tones of the statesman—the ruler of men—in the report or the plan which suggests an abandonment of the safeguards of the Constitution, and degrades the fifth unnamed Judge of the United States Supreme Court to the level of a partisan? The President of the Senate is, by the concurrent voice of the founders of our Republic, and of their successors for a generation, the officer and the authority to open and to count the Electoral votes. Let the responsibility continue with this officer, whose power is fixed by the Constitution. Nobody questions the integrity or the firmness of Senator Ferry. He is equal to the occasion. He will open the legal certificates and count only such as comply with the constitutional and statutory requirements. If he commit an error there is a remedy, although the aid of the Supreme Court has not yet been invoked in such a case. Were the Vice President capable of lending himself to a fraud, the result would be inevitable infamy for individual conspirators, and political death to the party in whose interest law, justice, and the rights of the people would be outraged. In these days it is glorious to find a man in public or in private life who is not afraid of the responsibility attending upon the performance of duty. Never before has there been such need of intelligence, firmness, and courage in high places. Gen. Dix did not flinch when confronted by secession schemes to destroy the Union; it seems that for him, at least, the memory of 1861 bears with it a consciousness of duty to country.

A PLEA FOR THE LADIES.

AMERICAN WOMEN SUPERIOR TO THOSE OF EUROPE—UNJUST CRITICISMS—A GERMAN'S OPINION—LADIES WHO EARN THEIR DAILY BREAD.

To the Editor of the New-York Times:

The article in your issue of the 16th inst. "Where are the Women?" signed "A Woman," reads very well. Prima facie, it is a clever handling of a hackneyed subject, viz.: the great outcry that the present generation of women or ladies (whichever you like best,) is brought up in idleness, superficiality, and deficient of all qualities which may fit them to be good daughters, wives and mothers. This great outcry is chiefly directed against the women of this country, and in the clearest conviction and the experience of the writer of the present article, (himself a native of Germany,) there is no greater injustice nor a more arrant piece of humbug than this senseless accusation.

I admit that the thoroughgoing housewife, such as, for instance, we find in Germany, is not so current here. But it is the different social arrangements and different style of living in this country which are chiefly to blame (or to praise) for this difference. Starting in life for a young couple is not such a cumbersome affair here, generally speaking, as in the old country. It is not necessary to have a house of a certain size and pretension to begin with, nor to keep a certain number of servants, nor to "represent" as it is technically called, and thus to maintain one's social standard. The young folks, if the income is small, are content to rough it a little; to board for a year or two to save expenses, or else, not being able to afford a servant, the husband will be satisfied with a rather monotonous diet of beefsteak and potatoes, so that his darling may not have to work her pretty fingers off in attending to kitchen drudgery. This, though I confess it is not my individual taste, I nevertheless highly respect. Notwithstanding that, owing to these circumstances, less importance is attached to the requirements of boiling and roasting, scrubbing and dusting, I contend there is just as large a proportion in this country as anywhere else of women who will be model helpmates to their husbands, will make the most of a limited income, and, what is the chief point, will always have a cheering smile and a loving word for the man of their choice.

Admitting even that the American girl of the period, (I use the word in its better sense,) is generally not quite as much of a housekeeper as she might be, let us consider what we find in her as an offset. No foreigner arriving here, if he has any correct taste and a disposition to be fair in his judgment, can fail to be impressed with the elegance, the "savoir-vivre," displayed in all positions, and the inimitable "tact" of the ladies native of this country, down even to the lower classes, which in most other countries are represented only by slovenly, rough-mannered, uncouth specimens of female humanity. The writer of the article "Where are the Women?" laments that the "women" are all gone, to be replaced by "ladies," but I candidly confess that I see no cause of regret in this, while at the same time I am quite as much opposed to misnaming any woman a "lady" whose bearing and conduct does not entitle her to that distinction, no matter what her station in life may be. I have been always most agreeably impressed when I have met, either behind the counter of a New-York store, in the halls of a Massachusetts factory, or anywhere else, a young lady at tending to her lowly duties with the affable dignity and refined elegance which, in most other countries, belong only to the higher walks of life. I remember, being lately in the office of a manufacturer in a large Western city when a young lady of rather pretty appearance walked in with a subscription-list for a new publication. The proprietor politely rose, shook hands, and offered a seat, putting down his name for a copy after a short conversation. When the lady had gone I was informed by my friend that she and her sister had, until lately, worked in his factory, and that, on the sister's health breaking down, the little girl I had seen had managed to secure an opening with some large bookseller's firm, and was now supporting both of them very comfortably. Now, I must say that, recalling to my memory what pictures of degradation and brutishness I had seen in some of the manufacturing districts of England and elsewhere, this little incident struck me as exceedingly pleasant, and very creditable to everybody concerned in it, also a very strong argument in favor of every young or old woman trying to be as much of a lady as she can. I know of no spectacle more touching, more charming, and more worthy of respect, than a handsome, well-bred girl bravely fighting the hard fight for daily bread, without losing caste in any sense. By right I should make no mention here of the advantage (being a natural one) of external appearance, which nature has so bountifully bestowed on the daughters of this soil. I will simply say that on this subject, to use a Yankee expression, they "beat creation."

I do not think it necessary that a young woman, to fit herself for the duties of life, must cultivate only the homespun virtues, to the exclusion, or at least neglect, of the amenities of life. On the contrary, I think a more refined education will quicken the intellect, and the greater the intelligence the greater the capability of adapting one's self to all circumstances of life. I do not think that a perfect cook makes the best wife; I do not think that (in general) the thoroughly natural desire of a young girl to impress favorably by a pretty appearance, refined manners, and tasteful dress, is a thing to be reproved and checked, or conducive to harm; in short, I do not think that being a lady is prejudicial to being a true woman, while I quite as firmly believe that a true man at heart will be oftener found with the appearance and bearing of a gentleman than in the rough and uncultivated individual who affects to scorn as effeminate all culture and refinement.

FROM VARIOUS QUARTERS.

AN OLD MAN'S FALL.

A RESPECTED CITIZEN OF ANNAPOLIS PROVES TO BE A DEFAULTER TO THE AMOUNT OF $75,000—ONE OF HIS SONS INVOLVED.

The Baltimore American prints a letter from Annapolis, Md., bearing date 19th inst., which says:

"On the southern extremity of our city, near the head of Spa Creek, stands a dwelling of the architecture of the last century, partly surrounded by an ample and beautiful garden. Its interior presents a handsome and costly appearance, with luxurious furniture, instruments of music, paintings of art and portraits of ancestors, both military and civic, all of whom bear a striking resemblance to the living inmates of the building. Here for years, in unostentatious affluence, Hon. George Wells, now 76 years old, has dwelt, and reared sons and daughters, all of whom, by their courteous demeanor and genial disposition, had won friendship and respect of our entire community, rich and poor alike. When but 27 years of age Mr. Wells was appointed a Director in the then Farmers' Bank of Annapolis, on the part of the State, and ten years after was chosen as its President. From that time until the middle of this week the entire community, save those in the secrets of the bank, believed him the possessor of hundreds of thousands of dollars clear of the world. He was generally looked upon as the owner of the bank.

When the news of his resignation reached the city it was thought that he had retired from the cares of business with ample fortune for himself and family. But soon whispered rumor began its busy work, and when the facts were sought for the authorities were reticent, only offering assurances that the bank was safe. At last it was ascertained to be a fact that the late President had used the money of the bank without the knowledge of the Directors to the extent of about $75,000, all in about the last two years. He would present notes as passed on regular discount days which the Directors had never seen, and the officers of the bank never suspected that there was anything wrong about the paper. The notes, which were signed with the name of Joshua Brown, it was ruinous to expose by his knowledge, although it is said that such was the confidence Mr. Brown reposed in the President that he permitted him to use his name whenever he desired.

Immediately upon the discovery of the irregular proceeding and before its exact extent was known, the Directors asked Mr. Wells for a transfer of his property to the bank, which request was immediately complied with, and Mr. John B. Wells, second son of the late President, also came forward and transferred his farm to the bank, saying that his father's misfortunes were his own. The property transferred to the bank included everything possessed by the family, consisting of about 1,500 acres of land in the county, and several houses and lots in this city, which, I was informed to-day by one of the Directors, will, at the assessed value, cover all the notes above mentioned.

Arthur W. Wells, Mayor of Annapolis, about 28 years of age, is also involved to the extent of several thousand dollars, and his notes were indorsed by merchants and others of Annapolis, whose names cannot be ascertained. But the mortgaged property, it is said, will more than cover all, so that parties outside the family will lose little or nothing.

The Farmers' National Bank of Annapolis was organized as a State bank in 1805, and converted into a national one several years since. The public have the utmost confidence in the institution, and deposits have been made as usual. A few ignorant persons, with trifling deposits, were alarmed sufficiently to draw their funds, but it amounted to nothing like a 'run.' The capital of the bank is in the neighborhood of $300,000, including a surplus fund of $40,000. Where has the money gone? What did they do with it? has been the curious inquiry of the astonished Annapolitan since the surprising denouement. Fine farms, handsome salaries, and no extravagant mode of life to eat up all revenues—then where has all the money gone? Hundreds are ready to give this reason and that, but the most plausible, I think, might be found as follows: Arthur Wells is the youngest son and the apple of the father's eye; he was the chief clerk in the bank, and also engaged in the oyster-packing business. He is a rollicking, good-natured, and sociable fellow, unmarried, full of life and gayety, and at the last corporate election the young Democracy took a motion to nominate him for the Mayoralty. He was elected. His salary as a bank clerk and Mayor made his salary over $2,000 per annum, but a small sum for one of his liberal habits. His oyster-packing establishment failed to pay, and it is rumored that out of a business of $33,000 last year, not one-third was paid by parties receiving the oysters in the West. This money had been advanced very probably by the father, and the non-payment by the Western parties made it a dead loss. This Winter also cash was required—no doubt advanced by the father in the hope that the delinquents would pay and all yet come right. But, alas, the end was near. The father unconsciously, perhaps, mentioned a payment that he had made on one of the surreptitious notes, and from that clue the dawning discovery was made. It is a sad spectacle. Bereft in his old age of wealth and ease, and his gray hairs to go down in sorrow to the grave. Three years ago, living in affluence, esteemed rich and honored in the community, and now the picture must be reversed—poor, by many scorned, derided, and dishonored."

MR. MIDDLERIB'S MISTAKE.

From the Burlington Hawk-Eye.

Day before yesterday, Master Middlerib, with a boy's long foresight, got tired of his sled and began to think of the long Summer days that were coming, when he would go fishing. And thinking of these things, he got out his fishing-pole and examined it, and, after fooling around with it for a while, he leaned it up against the wood-shed, and ran out in the street to chase after a runaway sleigh, and never thought of it again. After supper Mr. Middlerib went out to look up the wood-shed, remarking that it was a stinging night, and he wouldn't blame any man for keeping warm if he could find a wood-shed open. In a few moments the family, gathered around the fire in the cozy sitting-room, heard Mr. Middlerib struggling into the kitchen door, evidently in a state of great excitement.

"By George, boys," they heard him say, in tones of suppressed agitation, "it beats anything I ever saw."

And then there was a great rattling and scuffling of feet.

"By dad!" exclaimed Mr. Middlerib, "this beats my time; this just walks away with any of the old settlers' stories, this does."

And then there was more rattling and scuffling, and the kitchen door was kicked back by a very excited foot.

"Well, Sir," they heard Mr. Middlerib say, "I never would have believed it; by George I would'nt. It beats the snakes. I never—"

Here curiosity impelled the family toward the kitchen.

"What is it?" inquired Mrs. Middlerib.

"What is it?" echoed her husband, "you may say what is it. Bring a light, quick. Most wonderful thing I ever heard of. Clothes-line's frozen so stiff that when I ran against it I broke a piece 16 feet long right out of it, square as a lath, and it snapped in two again about the middle. Can't get it in the door hardly, it's so stiff. By jocks, never heard of such a thing before. There's a—"

And then the lamp illumined the scene and disclosed Mr. Middlerib, his countenance all aglow and his hands nervous with excitement, struggling with the pieces of Master Middlerib's fishing-rod. The tableau was greeted with loud and long-continued applause, and the laughter and tokens of approbation continued long after the red fire had burned out and the curtain was down, not entirely ceasing until Mr. Middlerib threatened to wear out the limberest end of the rod upon the noisiest spectator. And away on about midnight, when Mrs. Middlerib thought, from the sounds in the room, that her boy had the croup, she went in to see, and saw him sitting bolt upright in bed, pounding his knees with his fist, and stuffing the corner of the sheet into his mouth, and not a bit croupy.

SIMULTANEOUS DEATH OF AGED PEOPLE.

The Baltimore American prints a letter from a resident of Adams County, Penn., under date of Jan. 18, which says: "Our neighborhood was thrown into a state of excitement on Monday last by the following sad event: Henry Sterner, aged 73, and his wife, aged 71 years, two well-known and highly-respected people, have for many years resided on a small farm in Union township, Union County, Penn., about two miles from Littlestown. They had living with them a young lady, Miss Sterner, a granddaughter, about 18 years of age. At 5 o'clock on Sunday evening Miss Sterner left home to attend prayer-meeting at Littlestown, leaving the two old people apparently in good health. After she returned part of the way home with a neighbor, and as the night was very dark and rainy, she remained at the neighbor's house all night. Returning home at 6 o'clock in the morning, she found the kitchen door wide open and her grandfather lying on the floor, apparently dead. She summoned the nearest neighbors, and Mr. Sterner was put to bed, when it was found that he was still alive but speechless. Search was then made for the old lady, and after some time she was found behind the barn lying on the snow, dead, still holding a tin horn in her hand, and partially covered with snow that fell during the night. Miss Sterner, before leaving home, had placed a candle on the table, to be lighted by the old people when needed, and as it had not been lit, it is supposed that soon after she left home the grandfather was stricken with paralysis and fell to the floor, where he remained exposed in the cold until found in the morning. His wife must have seized the horn and rushed out to summon the neighbors to her help, and, after giving two or three feeble blasts, dropped dead, as is supposed, from heart disease. Mr. Sterner remained insensible, and died on Tuesday. They were both buried to-day at St. Bartholomew's Lutheran Church. He was leader of the choir of this church for many years, and was with the congregation in the discharge of this duty on the Sabbath previous to his death.

NEW PUBLICATIONS.

FEBRUARY MAGAZINES.

HARPER'S.

—Harper's Monthly is always true to its original conception as a magazine intended to suit all comers. It plays the part of a popular review by condensations of new and old books of travel, accompanied by profuse illustrations. Of this kind of paper is "The Land of the Incas," founded on the works of E. George Squier, published by Harper & Brothers; a topic which has naturally lost none of its savor, notwithstanding the number of centuries that have seen it treated of in histories and volumes of travel, notwithstanding the stacks of works, in all languages, which relate its wonders. North American history, on the other hand, claims attention in a short illustrated paper called "And who was Blennerhasset?" This relates the splendor and misfortunes of an enthusiast, who found England too contracted for his liberalism. The appearance of the redoubtable Aaron Burr is the signal for his ruin. "The Log-book of the Savannah" carries one back to the days when skippers pooh-poohed the idea of crossing the Atlantic by the aid of steam alone. The Savannah was the first ship to cross with the assistance of an engine, but her sails were still relied upon as the most probable solution of the question. H. C. Bolton tells the story. Foreign travel is supplied by Mr. Wirt Sikes, who has selected Wales for his subject. Cardiff and the Valley of the Taff are brought before one in a pleasant pen-sketch and numerous illustrations. Moncure D. Conway tells us all about William Lovett, "working man, chartist, prisoner, and author." Although to all appearance the most English of Englishmen, it seems that William Lovett was born at a fishing village, near Penzance, in Cornwall, and was therefore a Cornishman. Lighter literature begins in this number with a short story called "Notwithstanding." It is in the popular vein; a misunderstanding; contrasts in the two heroines; insufferableness in the hero, and union of the impulsive heroine with the cool calm St. Croix. The contrasts are well maintained and the writing good. "Noel Brewster's Secret" is begun and concluded in seven chapters. "Erema; or, My Father's Sin," has also seven chapters allotted to it, but does not conclude. Part eighth of "A Woman Hater" is here, together with several short poems, stories, and the monthly modicum of "Garth," Mr. Julian Hawthorne's novel. The most noticeable contribution is the last, being reprints of four letters written by Macaulay to the late Henry S. Randall. They present to Americans certain possibilities of the future which are not pleasant to consider, but which will have to be met in one way or another. Fortunately, Macaulay writes without knowledge of the actual state of political affairs in the States which have the balance of power, and his forebodings are, therefore, deprived of a good deal of their force. He draws an alarming picture of the fate of the United States under a Government following the principles of Jefferson when population shall have become thick, and times of commercial distress arise. The letters are clever, but there is nothing in them to change the opinion of those who suspect that Mac aulay, for all his ability, was a man of little mental weight. Mr. Curtis has some very good remarks on Webster in the course of his Easy Chair disquisitions. He wishes the wholesale panegyrics on that great man to be received with caution.

THE ATLANTIC.

—If the other magazines may be said to have caught the Atlantic napping, comparatively speaking, on the first of the year, the Atlantic has made a push for its old supremacy in the February number. Three of its old warriors have rushed to the front to confound with veteran pens the aspiring contributors of other monthlies. Whittier leads off with a long poem in the old English ballad metre, called "The Witch of Wenham," for all the world like a north country lay resuscitated by Bishop Percy or Wordsworth. It has not only the innocent simplicity of those old poems, but their limpidness and sweetness as well; and although the story of the witch hailing from the alliterative village of Wenham requires 57 stanzas to tell itself in, nevertheless we are sorry to have done with it. When the pretty witch has been arrested and locked up, she has moments of doubt as to her own innocence:

"The day died out, the night came down;
Her evening prayer she said,
While, through the dark, strange faces seemed
To mock her as she prayed.
* * * * * * *
And o'er her, with a dread surmise
Of evil sight and sound,
The blind bats on their leathern wings
Went wheeling round and round.
* * * * * * *
He set her on his pillion soft,
Her arms about him twined;
And, noiseless as if velvet-shod,
They left the house behind."
* * * * * * *

Mr. Longfellow's is the next name that ought to send confusion into the hearts of rival editors. He contributes "A Dutch Picture" in his best vein. It has a slightly rollicking swing to the metre, very much in keeping with the piratical old trader he celebrates:

"Simen Danz has come home again
From cruising about with his buccaneers;
He has singed the beard of the King of Spain,
And carried away the Dean of Jaen
And sold him in Algiers."

As usual, Mr. Longfellow says enough about Simon Danz to make us interested in him, and not too much to weary us. Both he and Mr. Whittier have learned the art of not saying too many things in a given number of words, or, to borrow a simile of a much-abused fellow-art, they have learned to make their pictures say a great deal with very little paint. The third contributor of gray-haired rank has not allowed age to depress his spirits, although his subject is secretly a very grave one. As a comic afterthought, the editors of the Atlantic have tacked on to this number a long poem by Dr. Oliver Wendell Holmes, called "How Not to Do It." It was read to the Harvard Class of '29 on Jan. 4, 1877, and probably for that reason assumes so peculiar a position in the magazine. The subject is the present political deadlock, but it is treated from Dr. Holmes' old standpoint of the humorist. The first stanza will give the vein of the poem and possibly make the reader wish to see the rest:

"I like, at times, to hear the steeple's chimes,
With sober thoughts impressively that mingle;
But sometimes, too, I rather like—don't you?—
To hear the music of the sleigh-bells' jingle."

The bearing of a poem beginning in such a genial strain becomes clearer as one proceeds—it is meant to act as a drop of oil on the troubled waters of politics.

Henry James, Jr., contributes an installment of "The American," a story in the field that Mr. James has already explored with so good effect, the field of the American in Europe. So far it bids fair to be the strongest novel he has yet published. Political, but in a very different sense political, when compared to Dr. Holmes' easy verses, is an article written by "A South Carolinian" on the present state of affairs in that State and the South generally. It is a very important contribution to a topic which has chiefly consisted of charges and counter-charges. From it appears the very natural fact that wrongs and crying wrongs have been perpetrated by both sides; that, in a general summing up, neither party has anything to boast of. The writer is said to be a South Carolinian born and bred, and speaks with the authority of an eye-witness and the calmness of a person who is above being a partisan. The outlook is not encouraging, but, such as it is here presented, may serve to dampen the zeal of those who think that all the right is on one side and all the wrong on the other, according to their leaning in favor of the former slave or his master. Mr. Howells begins with this number one of his carefully elaborated stories. A song, set to music, graces the end of the magazine, according to the recent policy of the editors, and the new department which embraces contributions of no great length on all sorts of subjects from anonymous sources, is fuller and brighter than before. Mrs. Kemble still gossips in her rather feeble strain about people of a bygone age. As usual, the Atlantic is stronger, comparatively speaking, in poetry than in prose.

SCRIBNER'S.

—The editors of this pleasing magazine show no signs of weariness in their efforts to amuse and instruct. It is a curious fact that the various monthlies do not, to any appreciable extent, encroach upon each other's audience. The success and extraordinary growth of Scribner's seems to be entirely independent of the readers of the Atlantic and Harper's. Apparently the person who reads one would not subscribe for either of the others, although his own magazine were not in existence. Among the contributors to the February Scribner's we find many names remarkable in one way or another. Here is Gen. George B. McClellan, who may represent the arts of war, writing on a distinctively peaceful subject, "A Winter on the Nile." J. G. Holland, whose name always stands for a host of readers, furnishes the third installment of "Nicholas Minturn," wherein the wrecked party return igneminiously to New-York, and Nicholas passes through the toils of managing mammas and too-grateful daughters. Mr. Holland may be classed as a representative of the press. Miss Kate Field writes, something in the vein of a correspondent and reporter, on "A Morning with Sir Julius Benedict," giving the latter's personal reminiscences of Weber, Beethoven, and Paganini. Thus, we have gossip on music from a lady whom we will, in order to complete our category, call the representative of the stage. Saxe Holm, who is one of the high-lights of magazine fiction just at present, is also not wanting. The first installment of "Farmer Bassett's Romance" is from the pen of that enigmatical person. The professor in literature is supplied by Hjalmar Hjarth Boyesen, who prints a short story in his well-known vein, called "How Mr. Storm Met his Destiny." Prof. Boyesen's story has many of his best points. It is of to-day, and has for actors Scandinavians in America. There is not much new in the plot, but it is one that always satisfies, while the ameliorating influence of a baby upon the grim cynicism of Storm allows some play for satire, which is not at all ill-natured. The style is easy and natural, telling the story, without reminding you unnecessarily of the cleverness of the story-teller, and so diverting your mind to the person of least importance in the case, the author. "Traditional Music in the French Pyrenees," by N. Sturgis, will be found delightful by musical people. Mrs. S. B. Herrick supplies popular science in an illustrated paper, "The Microscope among the Flowers." Mr. Tryon Edwards approaches a sacred subject in a very practical manner, in "How do I know what is the Bible?" A serial of exceptional power is Fanny Hodgson Burnett's "That Lass o' Lowrie's," of which the seventh installment appears. E. S. Nadal tells appreciatively of Gilbert White and his beloved Selborne. Scribner's maintains its position at the head of the illustrated magazines. Mr. Nadal's article is charming, both in illustration and style, while few of the other papers are without some such adornment. Mrs. Laura Winthrop Johnson has a poem called "The Outcast." The following is delicate enough and short enough to quote. Its maker is hidden under the initials R. B.:

UNAWARES.

When roses bloomed, I found a friend—
On sped the changing year;
The ripe leaves fluttered to their rest,
And fields stretched white and drear.
But when the blue-bird built its nest,
Spring whispered in my ear,
"Thy friend, O foolish heart! hath grown Too dear—too dear."

Under the well-known head of "The Old Cabinet," Mr. R. W. Gilder draws some fine distinctions in the matter of art, in the course of a pleasant talk about pictures. The February number is headed by one of the usual illustrated papers, having a local interest. This time it is on trout-fishing in the Rangeley Lakes.

ST. NICHOLAS.

—St. Nicholas has discarded his holiday attire and settled down to a quiet year's work without the assistance of legendary variations to the cover of his magazine. The frontispiece is by S. F. Barnes, and depicts Major André, of revolutionary fame, drawing his own picture from a reflection in a looking-glass. The text in explanation is by Charles Barnard. Then we have some nonsense verses by Margaret Eytinge, and after that "Clever Joe," which smacks of some distant French original. Mr. Walter Satterlee has a picture of two small darkeys reading a valentine. "The Indian Girl and her Messenger-bird" has an illustration by Miss Ledyard, which shows no deviation from her idiosyncrasy of tipping her sentimental little figures up on the ends of their toes. Ernest Ingersoll tells the children welcome facts about one of the commonest household pets, the canary bird. This article is well supplied with wood-cuts, one of which exhibits a number of fancy varieties of the bird, produced by careful breeding. "Pattikin's House" is the first installment of a small story, which has the distinction of illustrations by Miss Hallock. The larger picture shows her excellence of drawing, her conscientiousness and grace, but leaves something to be desired in general composition. There is an air about it as of a picture altered from its first conception. It seems also to have suffered grievously at the hands of the engraver, a mishap that often befalls the work of this talented young draughtswoman. The smaller picture of "Pattikin" is much more satisfactory. St. Nicholas seems to have engaged Mr. Richard A. Proctor for permanent astronomer attached to his court. Mr. Proctor explains with text and large black diagrams the position of the stars in February. "His Own Master," by J. T. Trowbridge, carries the hero on through the deeds and horse talk of persons by no means pleasant to know. The story is getting exciting, however, and evidently Mr. Trowbridge intends to run a sharp race with the dime novels. But he also throws in the high-pressure love of grown-up novels. This is the position just before the row-boat upsets on the western river:

"Jacob glanced over his shoulder to look at his course. His face was full of wild energy, and a dark, wild beauty, with the lurid light upon it. Florie sat in the stern watching him, without saying a word."

Illustrations are supplied by C. S. Reinhart, and are as painstaking as usual. It is seldom that Mr. Reinhart reaches higher than that, but he does sometimes. "L. T. C." contributes an infantile poem having a delicacy of its own. It may be called a decided success, in view of the audience it speaks to:

"Pitter, patter! pitter, patter!
Hear the rain
Beat against the window-pane!
Clitter, clatter! clitter, clatter!
Tells the tale;
Now the rain is turned to hail!
Soft and light,
Pure and white!
On the ground
Not a sound!
Now we know
It is the snow!"

Herbert E. Copeland contributes a paper giving an amusing array of fish faces, as they appear in the Aquarium when swimming toward the beholder. The usual number of rebuses and answers to questions close the children's magazine.

POPULAR SCIENCE MONTHLY.

—Prof. Proctor is a man who does not let a piece of work escape him, even if it be to call attention to an achievement in astronomy by an American. The American is Prof. C. A. Young, of Dartmouth, and the achievement is in such delicate and new use of the spectrum analysis as to measure the rate at which luminous bodies are approaching or receding from us. This comes very opportunely in the wake of Mr. Proctor's late "scare" about a star which was going to fall foul of our sun and burn us up in no time. He controverts Father Secchi's claim to the first use of the spectroscopic analysis for this purpose, and attributes it to himself and Mr. Huggins, while Prof. Young is given the credit of extraordinary and successful use of an instrument already employed for measurements in Europe. The latter Professor has also a paper here entitled "Distance and Dimensions of the Sun," illustrated by diagrams and charts. Mr. E. Lewis, Jr., comes nearer home with the subject "Ups and Downs of the Long Island Coast." He tells the story of the singular history of that island very well, going so far as to sketch the upheaval of the coast some 300 or 400 feet, and a subsequent fall of from 600 to 700 feet, when marshes and deposits were formed on what is now high ground. Beyond that he does not attempt to go:

"Here we pause. Further observations may confirm or correct our conclusions. Geology has not a more tangled skein than is presented in the structure of Long Island. There is evidence of minor oscillations, and pauses of movement, during which great clay deposits formed in depressions upon the surface, now deeply covered with drift or stratified sand, affording also some evidence that interglacial periods, perhaps of mild climate, occurred; but more observations and more facts are needed to justify a definite judgment on the subject."

There is a short paper devoted to travel in Sweden and Lapland, by C. Chamberlain, and an instructive essay on the production of cognac brandy. One of the most constant contributors to the Revue des deux Mondes, M. A. Mézières, appears in a translation under the title "The Trial of Galileo," the original having appeared in that able French review. The first part of Alexander Bain's "Education as a Science" is here also, although the author has died since his contribution was announced. George M. Beard, M. D., has a very popular paper on a subject which has exercised many minds both in private and public. The physiology of mind-reading will be a piece of welcome news to the thousands of persons who have puzzled their brains to account for singular phenomena exhibited by performers in private houses and open halls. He coins the word "muscle-reader" to take the place of "mind-reader," averring that no performer can do more than tell the locality of a hidden object and the direction in which it may lie. But this knowledge can only be learned from an unconscious quivering of the muscles of the patient when near the hidden object on which he has honestly concentrated his mind. Curious examples are given of the dexterity which continued practice has developed in performers in "mind-reading."

APPLETONS'.

—The very healthy liking for papers on nature and natural history has spread to Appletons' Journal. Ernest Ingersoll follows in the steps of Mr. Burroughs with an article on "Our Winter Birds," containing some clever illustrations. The frontispiece acts as illustration to a serial novel by the author of "Comin' Thro' the Rye, which begins in this February number. The name of the novel is "Cherry Ripe," and we observe Miss Mignon being wheeled about a garden by her duenna and maid in a wheelbarrow, while the face of a young man appears peeping over the wall. Mr. Reinhart is guilty of this picture, which, although not ill-composed, is exasperating with an air of forced archness in the central figure. "Agnes Abercastle" is the title of Mrs. Sherwood's contribution. We, then have a fragment of one of George Sand's shorter stories, a translation of her Tour de Percemont, which seems to have been written during one of the ebbs to which her genius was liable. Junius Henri Browne knows all about "The Men Who Fascinate Women," but refrains from giving any specific as to how the fascinating quality may be obtained. Balm to many a harassed soul is administered, however, by the very just observation that the blighter of women need not be physically handsome, and that sometimes he is a moral monster. "Two Women, 1862," is an effusion of such peculiar idiocy that it would be well for the Eastern States to attribute it to a writer of Southern birth, and the Southerners to fix it on the shoulders of some Western author. We can conceive of States fighting each other over the question. None would be so hardy as to acknowledge stuff of this kind:

THE LADY.

"O chivalrous Kentucky, help the bride,
Though thou hast wounded with thy rebel sword
The foeman bridegroom!
* * * Can it be that girl
Who rides in front? I thought her left behind
In that small town. Ciel! would I could hurl
The slim thing down this bank! Would I could bind
Those prim, long-fingered, proper hands of hers
Behind her drooping, narrow-shouldered back,
And send her home!"

ENGLAND AND RUSSIA.

ENGLAND'S POLICY IN THE EAST. By Baron Henry de Worms. London: Chapman & Hall.

A year ago this work would have fallen flat, even in political circles. But England is now at the very top of a great crisis, and society is steeped to the lips in foreign politics. The unpretentious volume of Baron de Worms was, published a fortnight ago, on the eve of the Christmas festivities. It hit the national sentiment, and the first edition was sold out in 10 days. While we write the printers are at work on the second edition, and the book is said to have the special patronage of her Majesty's Government. Apart from the reputation of the author, the book has this additional significance, that Lord Beaconsfield and his Ministry give it their general approval. Let us see, then, what England wants, and what, according to Worms, are the Ministerial views in regard to the present situation.

Baron de Worms urges that the Crimean war was fought not for the purpose of assisting the Sultan to oppress his Christian subjects, nor to defend them, but simply to protect English interests in the East against the aggression of Russia. The object was only imperfectly attained. Russia was shut out from the Danube by depriving her of a portion of Bessarabia; but the articles of the Treaty of Paris forbidding Russia to keep ships of war in the Black Sea, which were at the time regarded as the most effectual protection against Russian ambition, have ceased to exist. The united voice of Europe in 1870 condemned the high-handed way in which Russia repudiated those provisions; though it must be admitted that a first-class power could not be expected to submit for an indefinite period to so humiliating a restriction of its natural development. The truth is that, although Russia was beaten in the field, no sufficient precautions were taken to prevent the recurrence of such a state of things as made it necessary for England to make war upon her in 1853. Her military power, which was then almost crushed, is now far greater than it was at the time of the Crimean war; her communications with South-eastern Europe are enormously improved, and she has successfully employed the interval during which she has been reorganizing her political and military system in securing a most powerful and extensive influence over the Slavonic subjects of the Porte. The fruits of the Crimean war are as good as lost, not because it was a mistake to enter upon that war, but because the English and French did not push their victories to a more practical conclusion. The Baron de Worms from this point traces out the origin and progress of the present disturbances in the East, and lays them at the door of Russia—the work of active Russian agents—and thou he goes on to explain why Russia wants Constantinople.

The author declines to go out of his way to ascribe the underhand machinations of Russia to humanitarian influences, when the lessons of history and the present wants of the Russian nation clearly point to their true cause. The removal, by Peter the Great, of the Russian capital from Moscow to the vicinity of the sea at St. Petersburg, showed the importance which Russia attaches to a seaboard, and her history ever since has recorded her incessant efforts to develop her naval power in the south. She is now in possession of the whole coast of the Black Sea from the south of the Caucasus to the neighborhood of the Danube. Some of her largest rivers flow into that sea, and her most flourishing commercial ports, with the second of her naval arsenals, are on its shores. The Black Sea, in a word, is the natural maritime outlet for one-half the European territories of Russia. But the road from the Black Sea to the Mediterranean, the East, or the Atlantic, lies through the Bosphorus and the Dardanelles, which are commanded by Constantinople. It is obviously the interest of Russia, therefore, that the Turkish capital, which is the key of the Black Sea, should be in her hands. But this is not all. The possession of such a country as Turkey, with unrivaled and still undeveloped resources, would give an extraordinary impetus to Russian industry and commerce; it would enrich her middle classes, extend her territory, multiply her population and her military forces, add to her revenue, and secure for her policy a most powerful influence in the affairs of Europe, by enabling her to become a first-class naval power. And it is no disgrace, under these circumstances, says Baron de Worms, that she should aspire to the possession of Constantinople. Indeed, if she had eschewed miserable intrigues, abandoned petty subterfuges, and frankly avowed her object, it would not lie in the mouth of any great European State to blame her. England retains Gibraltar, though part of the territory belongs to a foreign power, because it is her interest to do so; and she would also regard this as a sufficient justification for occupying Constantinople and Egypt.

What England wants is this: It is her business, the author urges and the Ministry upholds, to look at the matter from an English, not a Russian, point of view. The Russians want Constantinople for their own sake; England wants to keep them out of it for hers; and, putting out of the question the moral right given her by the Treaty of Paris, she is just as much entitled to prevent the Russians, if she can, from taking Constantinople, as they are to attempt its conquest. The practical issue is, is England to step out of her way to let Russia do her will, even if—which, as has been shown, is very questionable—a few millions of Slavs will have their condition improved by her doing so? Yes, say sentimental politicians, England should support the oppressed, however much her interests may suffer. Such a doctrine may be admirably suited to the hermit's cell, but has nothing to do with the rough code of morals accepted in the practical affairs of life. The sentimental idea would lead to the giving up of India and Gibraltar, and starving nobly in the consciousness of possessing virtues that are not of this world. Not England only, it is argued, but every great power in Europe, has an interest in keeping Russia out of Turkey. It is therefore necessary, from a political point of view, not to allow the Russian power in Eastern Europe to extend beyond its present limits. Even from a philanthropical point of view this is also desirable, because the Turkish Slavs themselves would suffer, seeing that Russia, who has shown herself to be cruel, tyrannical, and intolerant in Poland, Khiva, and Circassia, is not likely to become humane, tolerant, and liberal in Turkey. Political autonomy for the Turkish Christians is only another name for Russian predominance, and every incident of the past goes to prove that, in the present crisis, Russia is not working for the Turkish Slavs, but for herself. England has used all proper influence in regard to the atrocities which marked the outbreak of the insurrection, and in sending her fleet to Besika Bay, as a double security against Russian aggression and Turkish fanaticism, she received the moral support and expressions of public gratitude at the hands of Germany, Austria, France, and Italy, and the action was unanimously approved by press and Parliament at home. The English policy in Lord Palmerston's day was, and it is now, one of interest—to maintain the Roman Empire as a barrier to Russian aggrandizement. Turkey understands this, and if England should leave her to the tender mercies of the Government of St. Petersburg, she would probably retaliate both upon her old ally and her Christian subjects by raising the standard of Islam. In that case the Selavs and Greeks would find themselves exposed to the horrors of a religious war, waged with all the intensity of fanaticism; and England's danger would be no less, for it must not be forgotten that 40,000,000 of the subjects of her Indian Empire are Mohammedans. Already influential meetings have been held at Bombay and other places in India, to urge upon her Majesty's Government that their Turkish brethren should not be allowed to fall a prey to Muscovite ambition. Once they should be fully convinced that England will not help the Turk in his hour of need, all the fierce animosities of race and religion would be unchained, and the Indian mutiny might be repeated, with the additional danger that the peaceful element of the Empire would be turned into an implacable enemy. The question of internal reform is now entirely subordinated to the higher issue of checking Russian aggression. That England should quietly look on while Russia is establishing herself in a position from which she may at any moment sweep down upon her communications with India, must be simply inconceivable to those who still believe in British pluck and the traditions of Anglo-Saxon greatness. Such conduct, Baron de Worms urges in strong and eloquent language, would reduce England to the position of a vassal of Russia, depending for its prosperity and comfort on the good pleasure of the Czar. Rather than sink so low, England will fight to the last, and the sooner the conflict begins in downright earnest the better.

While every effort is to be made to keep the peace, it is to be understood that all hope is over if Russia should attack the integrity of Turkey. England would have to enter heart and soul into such a war, and the expense of blood and money would be so heavy that every concession should and will be made short of permitting an actual attack on the integrity of the Turkish Empire. If England should feel compelled to fight, it is thought that Austria must, for her own sake, be her ally; while the policy of Germany would, to a great extent, be influenced by the course of the campaign. Bismarck could never permit the Fatherland to be closed in on the north and east by the power of Russia. Sooner than that she must fight against Russia, even at the risk of a Russo-French alliance against her. France has large interests in the East, which would be damaged by the extension of Russian power in Eastern Europe. Italy is similarly placed; and, indeed, it is believed by her Majesty's Government and the great and growing war party in England, that a determined effort on the part of Great Britain to resist Russian encroachment would at least meet with the sympathy of all the European powers; and it is a settled point with the rulers of the nation that John Bull must and will, in his own interest, fight for the integrity of the Ottoman Empire.

ANCIENT STREETS AND HOMESTEADS OF ENGLAND. By Alfred Rimmer. With an introduction by the Dean of Chester. New-York: Macmillan & Co.

It has been generally admitted that the ancient plans of street-building such as are to be seen in Chester, Shrewsbury, and other old towns in England, have an advantage in point of picturesqueness over the uniform blocks of towns in this country; but an American visitor has declared that the old buildings are not only more beautiful, but are more convenient, than the new. It certainly would be a great advantage to have the covered Chester rows as a protection against the snows of our Winters and the fierce heats of our Summers. The lower floors of the stores in Chester open upon a raised platform, which is roofed; this platform supplies the place of a sidewalk. Did we have such an arrangement of shops here, there might be many a cool and pleasant stroll among them on hot Summer mornings by people who now never venture out till dusk. The American writer says:

"Chester is far beyond any city we possess in the New World in point of convenience. Country towns are run up there on a uniform plan, and in some of the streets in the cities of the Far West are great blocks of pretentious warehouses and stores that look like bankruptcy itself. A tradesman commencing business has but little option—he must either take one of these, or else he is out of the world. And if he takes a place that is so much too large for him, he has to purchase more goods than he can pay for when the time for payment comes round. I speak of no imaginary evil, but one that actually exists, as I have found out to my cost; but here in the rows are shops and stores of all sizes, so that a tradesman commencing business may suit himself with premises to his proper requirements, yet not be out of the business world."

The leading chapters of Mr. Rimmer's book on the old streets of England describe Chester. In the introduction, which Dr. Howson, the Dean of Chester, has contributed to the book, he says that it is largely the interest in Chester manifested by Americans which induces him to do what he here does for the information of the world concerning the peculiarities of the old town. Dean Howson corrects, or supplements, Mr. Rimmer's comments upon several points, especially in his conclusions concerning the jail at Bedford in which John Bunyan was confined. Mr. Rimmer says that the jail was the gate-house at one end of the bridge over the River Ouse, but Dr. Howson thinks that the jail was in another part of Bedford. The jailer's door, by the way, still survives, built into the wall of a granary. There is a picture given by Mr. Rimmer of the neighboring village of Elstow. Elstow still has the bells in the ringing of which Bunyan rejoiced and afterward trembled, and still has the green where he danced. Dean Howson makes one curious suggestion. The "wicket-gate" of Pilgrim's Progress is commonly pictured as a garden gate or a turnpike gate; but the term really denotes a small doorway cut out of a large door. Concealed behind a tree at the west end of Elstow Church, is just such a small doorway in the broad wooden surface of the great door. Through this opening Bunyan no doubt often passed when a child, and the Dean believes that if this door were to be drawn and engraved, we should see the exact image of what was before Bunyan's imagination when he described the first steps of Christian's pilgrimage.

This book, no doubt, supplies a want that has been much felt, or in part supplies it, for the subject is by no means to be exhausted by a single volume. The abbeys, cathedrals, and parish churches have often been engraved and described, and their annals have been recounted in innumerable books. The ancient mansions of England have been lithographed by Richardson and Nash, and the families in whose hands they are have had a natural pride in preserving both the mansions themselves and their records. These edifices have powerful friends and no enemies; but it is very different with the old streets, which are fast disappearing before the ravages of improvement. Ruskin has said of the architecture of the old streets that "it is passing away like a dream, without any serious attempt having been made to preserve it, or, indeed, even to delineate it." Entire blocks of precious old buildings have been swept away, which a little ingenuity and caution might easily have altered so that they would be entirely suited to their new requirements. "It is difficult," says Ruskin, "to understand the contempt and envy with which future generations will look upon us, who had such things, and who allowed them to perish."

England is, however, still very rich in the ancient remains of its towns, as will be seen from Mr. Rimmer's beautiful and profuse illustrations. The author accompanies his text with pictures engraved from his own drawings, and we follow him with pleasure through many of the old towns of England—Chester, Shrewsbury, Oswestry, Exeter, Wells, Glastenbury, Weymouth, Banbury, and many other places, whose architectural adornments are as beautiful as their names are attractive. Old churches, quaint market-places, picturesque gates and bridges, and charming inns fill the book. A drawing is given of many an old inn, which now stands precisely as it stood 300 years ago, and in which one can get to-day a good bed, a cut of mutton, and a pint of sherry.

In treating of the subject of bricks, a building material which Mr. Rimmer thinks is not held in as high estimation as it should be, the author discusses the brickwork of Lincoln's Inn, Hampton Court, and Hurst Monceaux. Bricks are an unpopular material. A traveler no sooner hears that any building is made of brick, than he immediately concludes that the work is necessarily commonplace and ugly, and may be therefore passed over. "Now, a bread red wall," says Mr. Rimmer, "is one of the most dreary objects of modern civilization, and, indeed, the side of a square, broken only by rectangular windows, as exhibited in London squares, has doubtless had a depressing and injurious effect on the duration of human life. Russell square and Bedford square are familiar instances of this, and yet how unfavorably they contrast with old Lincoln's Inn buildings. But the same architecture that prevails in Lincoln's Inn would abundantly serve all the purposes of a London square of modern times. The corbelling out of the chimney, and the way in which the octagon and the gables blend together, is artistic to a passing degree, and well the designer knew the value of the material he had in hand." Mr. Rimmer thinks that an artistic variety of coloring may be secured in brick buildings. But this variety is not to be sought by means of parti-colored bricks; the contrast in this kind of decoration is too strong to be pleasing. The proper contrast of colors may be got from the natural light and shade of octagonal turrets and deep recesses. If there be means by which brick buildings may be made picturesque, no part of the world should be more in haste to use them than this country.

LITERARY NOTES.

—Mrs. Steele's Condoned is Chapman & Hall's latest novel.

—The young heroine of Miss Mather's new novel, Cherry Ripe, is a charming creature.

—Mrs. Carey Breck's new work in "The Sunday Echoes Series" is entitled The Miracles.

—Macmillan & Co. have published the Log-Letters from the Challenger, by Lord George Campbell.

—The late Prof. John Grote's Treatise on the Moral Ideals, edited by Joseph B. Mayor, is just out in England.

—Wide Awake for February has a portrait of the yong poet, Edgar Fawcett and a pleasant sketch of his literary history.

—The English edition of Mr. Van Laun's translation of Moliere's Dramatic Works in six volumes, is now completed.

—Astronomical Myths is the title of one of Macmillan's latest books, based on Flammarion's The Heavens, and prepared by J. F. Blake.

—Dr. Franz Hueffer, the author of The Future of Music, is one of the most frequent contributors to current periodical literature in England.

—The history of the Abbey Church of St. Albans has been written by J. W. Comyns Carr, and is fully illustrated with etchings and wood-cuts.

—Murphy & Co., Baltimore, have just published The Faith of Our Fathers, by the Roman Catholic Bishop of Richmond, Right Rev. James Gibbons.

—Mrs. Ella Rodman Church, author of The Golden Days, contributes a very useful paper to Appletons' Journal for February on "How to Furnish a House."

—Charles Reade is contributing to Harper's Weekly a series of short illustrated articles, under the general title of "Good Stories of Man and Other Animals."

—Mr. Charles Eliot Norton is preparing a memoir of Chauncey Wright to accompany his Philosophical Discussions soon to be published by Henry Holt & Co.

—Lovell, Adam, Wesson & Co., No. 764 Broadway, publish an American edition of John Skelton's abridgment of Christopher North's Comedy of the Noctes Ambrosianæ.

—Dr. Dominick McCausland's Adam and the Adamite, or the Harmony of Scripture and Ethnology, is already in a fourth edition. It is published by Bentley & Sons, London.

—The English Art Journal for January has an interesting article on "Studies and Sketches, by Sir Edwin Landseer," and one of its fine engravings is a portrait of Gen. "Stonewall" Jackson.

—The author of Helen's Babies is certainly versatile. The Scripture Club of Valley Rest is the latest book which he is engaged upon. We have already announced its immediate publication by the Putnams.

—Suggestions for a Public Religious Service, in Harmony with Modern Science and Philosophy, is the title of a curious pamphlet published by Trubner & Co., which has circulated to the number of 4,000 copies.

—Rev. H. M. Grout, of Concord, Mass., one of the Boston Monday Club men, is preparing a volume of sermons by clergymen of different denominations on the Moody and Sankey movement, which Lockwood, Brooks & Co. will publish in the Spring.

—M. D. Conway's sketch of the great Chartist reformer, William Lovett, in Harper's for February, is the model of what a biographical article should be, and will prove of much value to the working men who are interested in co-operative movements.

—In the measure of "Locksley Hall," but not otherwise in imitation of Tennyson, S. Miller Hageman, of Princeton, N. J., ventures into print with a bright and sparkling poem, entitled "Silence," which is published by Dodd, Mead & Co., and contains many notable lines.

—Mr. James T. Fields is compelled to ask persons who make manuscripts to remember that he is neither publisher nor editor, and that they will be more promptly served by J. R. Osgood & Co., or by Mr. Howells, the editor of the Atlantic Monthly, than they can possibly be by himself.

—The Spiritualists and The Detectives, by that king of detectives, Allan Pinkerton, of Chicago, whose other recent publications, including The Expressmen and Detectives, and The Model Town and Detectives, have reached a circulation of over 40,000 copies, will be published in a few days by G. W. Carleton & Co.

—Hurd & Houghton's Beauties of De Quincey Sketched from his Writings is published in the library style of Crabb Robinson's Diary, which we recently noticed, and gives striking examples of the pathetic and the humorous, the quaint and the ludicrous, the serious and the sublime, in which De Quincey's writings abound.

—Dr. Tryon Edwards' article on "How do I Know What is the Bible?" in the February Scribner, is a movement in the right direction. This magazine has won considerable reputation for its unsectarian articles on religious subjects, and Dr. Edwards' paper furnishes information which is not generally accessible to the readers of magazines.

—A tablet to the memory of Steele, the essayist, has been placed by Mr. V. Davis in the Parish Church of Carmarthen. It bears the following inscription: "Sir Richard Steele, Knight, Author, Essayist, First Chief Promoter of the Periodical Press of England. Born in Dublin, March 12, 1671. Buried in this church and below this tablet, Sept. 4, 1729."

—Capt. F. Burnaby's Ride to Khiva is at last definitely announced by the Harpers for Feb. 1. At the same time they will publish Selections from the Writings of Lord Macaulay, by Otto Trevelyan, uniform with the Life and Letters. Arthur Arnold's Through Persia by Caravan will be issued by the same house about the middle of next month, and they have just ready for the press a new novel entitled The Sun Maid.

—The "Contributors' Club," in the Atlantic, is rapidly becoming one of the characteristic and appetising features of the magazine. Nine out of ten of all its readers will turn to this department for February before they read anything else, and they will not be disappointed in its contents. It recalls the Noctes Ambrosianæ of Christopher North, and has something of the intellectual sparkle of Dr. Holmes' "Autocrat of the Breakfast Table." The discussion of literary, social, and art matters is bright, fresh, audacious, and sensible.

—College criticism of current literature is not always judicious, but in these early essays you often trace the hand which in the future will do the best work. The volumes known as the Oxford Prize Essayists contain the earliest public writings of the leading men in England during the last 40 years, and when you find articles like those on "George Sand and George Eliot," and "The Personality in the Writings of Edgar A. Poe," in the Yale Literary Magazine for December, it is plainly seen who are to be the capable critics of the coming generation.

—It is welcome news to lovers of art to know that J. R. Osgood & Co. are thinking of republishing Frederick Wedmore's Studies in English Art. The demand for the work has been so great in this country that the English edition could not be imported fast enough for purchasers. The same publishers announce that they are to bring out, by special arrangement with the author, Felix Narjoux

There is no special reason, according to our Washington dispatches, to expect any vigorous organized opposition to the bill for electing a President by commission. But Mr. MORTON will speak against it in the Senate and Mr. GARFIELD in the House. Both are able men, and masters of the subject. Mr. MORTON has labored for years to avoid the present dispute, and his opponents will not find him unprepared to sustain his convictions as to the latest invention for getting out of it. Mr. GARFIELD'S brief speech the other day on the limitation of Congressional jurisdiction in the Presidential matter was very clear and sound. Possibly the number in opposition may show better in voting than in talking, and in any case nothing but caucus dictation can carry through this extremely "judicial" and "impartial" measure.

It seems that the pretentious Independent Party of Illinois is unable to command the United States Senatorship in that State, although its representatives hold the balance of power. It was announced with a flourish, at the beginning of the year, that the occasion would be improved to send Mr. TRUMBULL back to the Senate, or to elect Judge DAVID DAVIS, or at least to promote Gov. PALMER; but the choice of the Democrats has finally fallen upon Mr. ANDERSON, the Representative from one of the Egypt districts in the present and next Congress. This gentleman is a man of moderate ability, but with a good war record. Gen. LOGAN is confident that he can defeat him.

The expected report on the Texas Pacific Railroad job is ready at last, and will be dropped into the House as soon as an opportunity offers. The statement that the committee would be unanimous in favor of the bill was clearly an invention of the lobby, and was designed to prepare the way for a favorable reception of the scheme. Mr. KASSON and a strong minority will report against the bill. They will give abundant reasons and argument for their opposition. There will, however, be some curiosity to learn the grounds upon which the other members of the committee propose a job which is intended to take out of the public Treasury so many millions that no accountant has yet been able to figure up what Mr. Mantilini would call "the demnition total."

It must be admitted that Turkey has come out of the much-vaunted conference with flying colors. It was thought that the gravity of the situation demanded a more imposing array of diplomatic talent than the various foreign legations at Constantinople could afford. Therefore, with much parade the conference was organized. When Turkey was admitted to this august assembly, the original programme was deviated from to that extent. It was a considerable concession. This enabled Turkey to carry out that shifty policy which has always been its refuge in time of trouble. SAFVET PASHA, when an objectionable point was pressed, mildly demurred, said he could not consent to receive it, and invariably added that the Sultan, his master, must give the final answer. In this way the steady determination of Turkey to resist any scheme which would involve an infraction of its sovereign rights was pursued, but without offensiveness. All the same, however, the resolution was maintained to the end, and the great powers break up the conference having secured nothing but delay. The conference was to have agreed upon some scheme which should guarantee the promised reforms in the Christian Provinces. It remains to be seen whether Turkey will be allowed to execute these reforms in her own way, or whether there will be a fresh discussion on the part of other diplomatists.

Mr. DAVID DUDLEY FIELD, as TILDEN'S Congressional lawyer, does not receive the unmixed applause of his brother Democrats in the House. Mr. MORRISON'S committee on Louisiana affairs, for example, is supposed to have dealt very thoroughly with ex-Gov. WELLS, Gen. ANDERSON, and other witnesses summoned in the case. But Mr. FIELD does not seem to approve of what has been done. He brushes aside all the work of the committee, and is going over the same ground with the same witnesses, who are now summoned before his committee. We call the Committee on Privileges and Elections Mr. FIELD'S, for, though Mr. KNOTT is at the head of it and Mr. FIELD at the tail, the latter, as attorney for the Claimant, may be said to "run" the committee. Mr. FIELD is earning any fee which could have been paid him for leaving his practice and undertaking the case; and those Democrats who were working for party more than for TILDEN should understand that the great criminal lawyer is merely special counsel.

MR. EDMUNDS' EXPLANATION.

We gave our readers, yesterday morning, a verbatim report of the speech of Mr. EDMUNDS, in explanation of the measure for referring the Presidential election to a commission of fifteen. It is not too much to infer that Mr. EDMUNDS has said about all that can be said for the measure, and has added about all that he could think of against the constitutional power of the President of the Senate in the premises. We are sorry to say that he has given us very little on either of these points to reconcile us to the plan which is likely to be pressed in all haste through Congress.

Mr. EDMUNDS dwells with a good deal of emphasis on the large vote and small majority found in the last election. But it is a cardinal principle of representative government that when an election has been held, its result must be accepted as the law declares it, no matter how nearly divided the vote may be. There was a larger vote in 1860 than ever before, and of that vote Mr. LINCOLN received only a minority; but Mr. LINCOLN'S right to the Presidency was sustained by a costly and bloody war. What was then defended was the authority of the Constitution, and that is what is important now. The number of votes which bring about the result is of no consequence, but it is of incalculable consequence that the result shall not be resisted, or evaded, or surrendered. Whether Mr. EDMUNDS' "Yankee notion" of an outside commission to take into its hands the election which the country has already made is a sound measure or not does not depend on any equality of parties in the late canvass. It depends on whether that plan is or is not authorized by the Constitution, and that is a point—with all respect to the distinguished Senator from the Green Mountains—which cannot be disposed of by a sneer at the newspapers.

Mr. EDMUNDS has a tolerably high appreciation of the value of the committees' contrivance. "There is no human agency," we understand him to say, "there is nothing short of the overruling Providence of the Almighty that can furnish a juster test of human rights than" the principle on which he says his commission rests. This is certainly a clear indorsement, and if we were as sure that Mr. EDMUNDS had come as near to the overruling Providence of the Almighty as he evidently thinks he has, we should say no more about the scheme. We might not think it was according to the Constitution, but then the Constitution was the work of fallible human beings, and it would be foolish to allow it to prevent us from taking counsel of the semi-inspired intellects of more modern times. We might think that Mr. EDMUNDS' invention would do more mischief in the future than it can do good now, but what right would we have to count risks from a device which only the Almighty could improve upon?

We may say, however, that we do not share Mr. EDMUNDS' view of merits of his project for switching "the Presidential question off the course provided for it by the Constitution" upon a side track, where it is to be left for a select commission to deal with. We know of no authority in the Constitution for any such disposition of the case. To adopt Mr. EDMUNDS' own line of argument on another point, if the framers of the Constitution intended to give authority to Congress to throw the decision of a Presidential election into the hands of one Supreme Court Judge, chosen on some unknown principle of selection by four others, if the authors of the Constitution meant to authorize Congress to do such an extraordinary thing, "how unfortunate it is" that they did not use words which would convey that meaning. That they did not use them is very evident from the fact that Mr. EDMUNDS is unable to cite them. We may be sure he would have pointed them out if they had existed. What he does do in the direction of constitutional argument is to say that Congress has the power in a general way to define the duties and powers of officers of the Government, executive or judicial. And this is true where the officers themselves are provided for, directly or indirectly, by the Constitution. But the commission is not provided for immediately or remotely. It is not a "tribunal," in any sense, that Congress may create. It is actually a substitute for Congress. It is allowed by the bill to exercise the powers of Congress. It is even directed to find out what those powers are. So far as constitutional sanction goes, a President chosen by the commission will be like the god who, tradition says, rested on an elephant, and the elephant on a tortoise, and the tortoise on nothing. A President so chosen could say his office was given him by the power of Congress interpreted by a commission, but where the commission is to get its authority from no one knows.

Mr. EDMUNDS' argument against the power of the President of the Senate to decide what votes the Constitution directs him to open is ingenious, but it is not complete. So far as it is addressed to the real issue, it is a clever attempt at reductio ad absurdum. If the President of the Senate, being directed to open all "certificates" must decide what are certificates, then the House, being directed to elect a President where there is no majority of Electors appointed given to any candidate, is the exclusive judge of when the contingency arises. "No one can avoid this conclusion," he says. Perhaps not, but if Mr. EDMUNDS were in the House and such a contingency arose, he would have to avoid that conclusion or else show his want of common sense. His argument amounts to this—that since the President of the Senate must decide what are certificates before he can, under the Constitution, open them, because that single duty rests on him and on no one else, therefore the House may assume to decide the same question over again, though no duty devolves upon it whatever.

We have only a word to add concerning Mr. EDMUNDS' speech, which is important rather from the importance of its subject than from its own value, and that relates to his explanation of the choice of the four Judges designated in the bill. The Vermont Senator may be verdant enough to believe that these were selected because they represented one the "far-off borders of New-England," one "the centre of the great commercial populations," one "the great North-west," and one "the Golden slope;" but if he has been fooled with any such trash, he ought not to lay claims to a wisdom exceeding everything but that of the Almighty. These Judges were selected because two of them were Republican and two were Democratic. If they were not, why were they instructed, in filling a possible vacancy, to have regard to "the impartiality and freedom from bias sought by the original appointments?" Mr. EDMUNDS' explanation of this point—one of the most important—is almost too absurd to be sincere.

TEXAS AND PACIFIC AGAIN.

Fearing defeat, the trainers of this champion job forebore last Winter to bring it up for its assault upon the public Treasury, but in deference to the established rule that an expiring Congress has the least power of resistance, and in the expectation of using the political complication as a cloak, they propose now to make an effort. The Texas and Pacific is usually known as the Thirty-second Parallel line, projected to run from Shreveport and Texarkana to San Diego, California, 1,675 miles. The Southern Pacific of California, generally understood to be practically the same as the Central Pacific, formerly offered to build a road eastward through Arizona and New-Mexico, to connect with the Texas and Pacific, without Goverment aid, provided the land-grant of the latter was transferred to it. It has nearly completed its road from San Francisco to Fort Yuma, and 220 miles of the eastern end of the Texas and Pacific, from Shreveport and Texarkana to Fort Worth, are also in operation, leaving the 1,200 miles between Fort Yuma and Fort Worth—about two-thirds of the whole—yet to be built. In Texas, the Texas and Pacific has a very curious parallelogram of roads, three sides of which are already in operation.

But neither Shreveport nor Texarkana being a real terminus, four branches are proposed, which we will sketch for the reader's information, suggesting that he lay a map before him prior to reading. One branch is to run from Shreveport to Vicksburg, 170 miles, thus completing a continuous line to New-York. This sounds rational, but the Vicksburg, Shreveport and Texas Company has now in operation 72 miles, almost an air line, between Shreveport and Monroe, and private enterprise may be trusted to take care of the remaining 98; the branch would be a longer line, or else virtually a second track of the present one. Another branch is to run 320 miles, from Shreveport to New-Orleans. This also sounds reasonable, but there are three other ways of reaching that city: first, by the Houston and Texas Central, (touching the Texas and Pacific at Dallas,) by rail 265 miles to Houston, thence by steam-ship via Brashear City; second, by the surveyed line from Houston to New-Orleans, 335 miles, of which 171 are now completed; third, the Waco Branch of the Houston and Texas Central is to be extended to Weatherford, on the Texas and Pacific line, 23 miles west of Fort Worth The distances by the New-Orleans connection by all-rail lines compare thus: from Dallas to New-Orleans, via Houston, 600 miles; Weatherford to New-Orleans, via the Waco Brauch and Houston, 630 miles; Weatherford to New-Orleans, via Fort Worth, Dallas, Shreveport, and the proposed branch, 568 miles.

Another branch is to run from Texarkana to Memphis, 246 miles. But there is already a line in operation, consisting of the St. Louis and Iron Mountain, from Texarkana to Little Rock, and the Memphis and Little Rock, thence to Memphis; the distance by this nearly direct route from Texarkana to Memphis is 270 miles, and for all through business this may be shortened 17 miles on the Texas and Pacific line by taking the Sherman route from Fort Worth to Texarkana. Another branch is to leave the main line at Double Mountain, 209 miles west of Fort Worth, (a point not far from 24° west longitude,) and runs 436 miles north-westerly through Texas and Indian Territory to Vinita, a point in the north-eastern corner of that Territory, where the Atlantic and Pacific and the Missouri, Kansas and Texas lines intersect. The distance from Double Mountain to St. Louis would thus be 800 miles, against 885 miles by way of Sherman and Vinita.

The summary therefore is that not only is a guarantee of fifty to sixty millions asked for the incomplete portion of the main line, (although about a year ago the Southern Pacific offered to build one-half of it without aid,) but these four branches are proposed, of which we may say briefly that the last described would be merely an 85-mile short cut for the through business, passing in Texas through an unsettled country, and in Indian Territory through one reserved from settlement, and could not possibly earn the interest of its bonds; that the Memphis branch would only duplicate a completed line, and the Vicksburg branch one substantially completed; and that the New-Orleans branch is unnecessary. The scheme covers a guarantee for 1,200 miles of main line and 945 miles of useless branches, and may be expected to reach a total of $100,000,000. The branches, at least, would not make good the guarantor.

Of course, the approaches to the Treasury are made gradual and soothing. The bonds are to be the company's, not the Government's at all, and only the interest, 5 per cent., gold, is to be guaranteed; this means in English that the Government is to pay the interest and take its chance of reimbursement by retaining transportation, charges, &c. The security of the proposed first mortgage is fanciful, because foreclosure would not help the case of the interest. The most curious safeguard is the provision for retaining in the Treasury at least $5,000 a mile of the company's bonds, with full power to sell them in case the transportation charges and a lien granted on the company's earnings should be insufficient to reimburse the interest advances. This "security" is worthy of Col. Sellers, for it means simply that if the Government finds itself in the lurch as to getting back the interest paid on the bonds already out, it may relieve itself by putting out more bonds—in other words, by borrowing money—upon which it will be forced to pay interest.

There are sundry specifications in the scheme which it is hardly worth while to discuss. The line is to be an open highway forever, and all combinations are to be prohibited; but "combinations" have a way of taking the sting out of statutory prohibitions. The issue of bonds is to be strictly limited to necessary cost of construction; but it is easy to make a road cost any sum fixed upon, and that is not less than the maximum of the subsidy. The outcome will be, that by some sort of dickering and "Construction Company," certain parties will get a lot of bonds, on which the Government pays 5 per cent., gold, and without paying very much for them. Is the country so soon forgetful how the existing Pacific roads saddled it with a debt of $64,000,000, the vaunted security proving illusive as soon as an attempt to use it was made? The southern or Thirty-second Parallel line is not indispensable at present; the scheme is a thoroughly bad one as presented, and the work will be done within reasonable time without a dollar of aid, if Congress will but firmly decline to consider it.

THE STATE PRISONS.

No one can read the report on the State Prisons from the committee appointed to investigate them without feeling that their condition is a disgrace to our civilization. It need not be said at this late day that the care of criminals is a matter demanding the utmost discretion, intelligence, and integrity. If the charge of these offenders be committed to ignorant and dishonest persons, the State is not only saddled with increased expenses in the administration, but it finds the criminal classes multiplying and growing worse. For prisons managed as most of the New-York prisons have been are merely nurseries of crime. The convicts going forth from them recruit the criminal ranks. Each penitentiary trains a new class of thieves, burglars, and murderers. The State not only finds itself in debt some $500,000 a year for a branch of administration which should not cost it $100,000, but experience proves that the money is spent to a large degree without effect. The report shows that prison officers are in fraudulent collusion with contractors to cheat the public; that convicts aid each party in the dishonest business, and are paid by each; that favoritism and such indulgence of particular convicts prevail in each prison as completely defeat one great end of punishment; that no proper discipline is observed anywhere, and the only wonder is that more escapes do not take place continually. Where there is such lack of discipline, there can be no paying industrial work, and a natural effect is that the cost of each prison runs far beyond its receipts. This corruption and laxity of administration also generate inhumanity. Brutal punishments are used; the sick and feeble are left without food or care; the dying pass away without a human being standing at the bed-side or a word of sympathy or religion being addressed to them; convicts are compelled to serve more than their time through carelessness; keepers extort money from the unfortunate, and the discharged are robbed of their little property. A Deputy Sheriff has been known to force money from a criminal, and the Penitentiary Doctor to extract fees from the scanty earnings of these convicts. And yet, with all the cruelty and brutality of the Sing Sing and other prisons, it is not this which most burns itself into the feelings of the prisoners. The evidence shows that their principal complaint was against the favoritism and injustice of the administration.

The whole management of these places of punishment seems filled with corruption and fraud. They appear to be contrived for the purpose mainly of filling the pockets of dishonest officials, such an atmosphere of peculation penetrates every part of the prison, and aids to degrade the convict. It is fortunate that on this commission there was an official more familiar with "the ways that are dark" of our prisons than any other person in the State, who could easily ferret out the frauds and abuses of these establishments. Mr. PILLSBURY, too, has proven in his own prison, (the Albany County Penitentiary,) that a prison can be carried on without political interference, and thus be excellently managed, and cost the community nothing. He and his associates have pointed out, what is clear to every one, that all this corruption, fraud, and bad discipline come from the prison officials being appointed for partisan reasons, and that no true reform can take place in these establishments till prisons be taken "out of politics."

Under the impression of this fact, the recent constitutional amendment was passed. We have always felt, however, that it did not go far enough. An official to be appointed by the Governor and Senate ought, in years such as this, when these are of opposite parties, to be the best one for the place. We believe Mr. PILLSBURY to be such a one. He has an unequaled opportunity of showing his independence of party as Superintendent of the State Prisons, and his administrative ability by appointing all the prison officials solely from fitness, and by sweeping out the rogues and thieves who are now plundering the public. Yet it may well happen in some future year that the Senate and Governor shall be of the same political party, and that the man who is appointed Superintendent can only be chosen under promise of bestowing liberal patronage, and all the old evils come in again. His appointment by some of the Judges might have prevented these possible evils. Even such a man as Mr. PILLSBURY now will be under a strong pressure, which only a man of high character can resist, to admit the old abuses.

PAUL AND PLYMOUTH.

Recently the Rev. Dr. SEE, a Presbyterian minister residing in Newark, was tried for the offense of permitting a woman to preach in his pulpit; and although he defended himself by the plea that the New Testament prohibition of female preaching was contained in St. PAUL'S epistle to the Corinthians, and hence was not binding upon the Newarkians, to whom ST. PAUL notoriously never wrote anything, he was finally found guilty by his fellow-ministers. If SEE felt hurt by this verdict, he has since been abundantly consoled. Rev. HENRY WARD BEECHER, and the learned and pious Mr. SHEARMAN, have both rushed to Dr. SEE'S defense, and if this fact does not convince him that he was right, he must be strangely lacking in respect for those two eminent men.

Last Friday night, Mr. BEECHER, after having exhausted the question of the divinity of Christ, by announcing that in his opinion "very little is settled," and "very little ever will be settled," as to that question, proceeded to express his indignation at seeing "a pack of fools over in New-Jersey debating whether Dr. SEE did right or wrong in permitting a woman to preach, and attempting to prove him wrong by the New Testament." There is no doubt that this language is open to the accusation of being plain and personal; but there are times when it is the duty of a Christian minister to speak the truth without regard to consequences. When Mr. BEECHER sees a body of Presbyterian ministers actually appealing to the New Testament as an authority upon matters of morality and religion, it is no wonder that he becomes indignant. He has been preaching and practicing a gospel of large liberality during a long and busy lifetime, and yet here is an entire New-Jersey Presbytery which still believes the supreme authority of the New Testament. If these Presbyterian ministers had sufficient intelligence and piety to take the broad ground in respect to all religious and moral questions, from the divinity of Christ to the preaching of women, that "very little is or will be settled," Mr. BEECHER would doubtless have recognized them as brothers in the faith. As it is, he must naturally look upon them as a pack of superstitious, strait-laced fools, and, with his passionate love of truth, he could hardly be expected to refrain from describing them as such.

Having relieved his mind by this outburst of pious indignation, the distinguished Plymouth theologian maintained with great ability Dr. SEE'S ingenious argument that an epistle to the Corinthians has no binding force upon the Newarkians and Brooklynites of the present day. He first showed that the ancient Greeks in general, and the Corinthians in particular, were an infamous set of people. When Mr. SHEARMAN suggested that SOCRATES was the only Greek who, "if he had lived in these days, would have kept out of State prison," Mr. BEECHER refused to regard SOCRATES as an exception, and insisted that "there is not a church with any self-respect in this country that would keep him in; they would kick him out." The Church founded by ST. PAUL at Corinth being thus composed of infamous men and women, whom Mr. SHEARMAN, with all his skill in defending criminals, could not save from State Prison were they now living, it follows, in Mr. BEECHER'S opinion, that what ST. PAUL may have written to the corrupt Corinthians is a matter of no consequence. When the apostle forbade women to preach, "it was this civilization and this condition of women which he had in mind," and consequently we of the nineteenth century need give ourselves no concern with his obsolete and purely local rules.

Why Mr. BEECHER did not pursue his argument a little further, and prove that ST. PAUL himself was little better than a State prison convict, and hence deserves no sort of respect from moral and Christian men, is rather strange. If that reckless Saint thought that people of infamous character were fit to be formed into a church, he could have had no adequate conception of what constitutes morality and religion, and must have been very little better than his Corinthian accomplices. This argument would completely overthrow the authority of ST. PAUL'S Epistles, no matter to whom they may have been written. It might possibly seem inconclusive to a pack of Presbyterian fools in New-Jersey or elsewhere, but to really intelligent and pious people like Mr. SHEARMAN and other modern saints, it would be perfectly satisfactory.

Still a great deal of comfort can be obtained by spiritually-minded persons out of the simple idea that rules which may have been binding upon the Corinthians have no application to modern Christians. Thus when ST. PAUL commands those who have "renounced the hidden things of dishonesty, not walking in craftiness," Mr. SHEARMAN can reflect, as he gazes abstractedly at the portrait of the late JAMES FISK, Jr., that the apostle was merely addressing the Corinthians, among whom were, doubtless, worldly and wicked lawyers. If a pack of fools, or even a single fool, should gravely quote the Scriptural assertion that no adulterers shall inherit the Kingdom of GOD, the devout believer in Plymouth theology can point out that this may have been true enough so far as the Corinthians were concerned, but that it obviously has no application to other people, and when Mr BEECHER reads ST. PAUL'S confession of the strictness of his own life—"lest that by any means, when I have preached to others, I myself should be a castaway"—he can avoid the foolish error of imagining that any modern minister need apply to himself so purely local and personal a remark.

Now that Mr. BEECHER has nobly espoused the cause of Dr. SEE, and has told the other Presbyterian ministers of Newark what his opinion of them is, the latter will promptly withdraw from the ministry, and Dr. SEE will thus be enabled to invite women to preach in his pulpit without fear of consequences. To suppose that an assembly of ministers whom Mr. BEECHER has openly called a pack of fools can survive so withering a denunciation by so eminent a man, would be folly. Members of other Presbyteries should take warning by their fate, and hasten to disavow all belief in the New Testament as a rule of action, lest they too incur Mr. BEECHER'S displeasure, and are crushed at some future Plymouth prayer-meeting.

AN ILLUSTRATION OF THE SPOILS SYSTEM.

If current reports are to be believed, the career of WINSLOW, the latest Treasury defaulter, is an instructive illustration of the hap-hazard methods of selecting our public servants. Convicted of forgery in his native country, and cashiered from the Army for dishonest practices in this, he next tried his hand at managing a national bank in Chicago, which soon disgracefully failed in consequence of his unscrupulous operations. And yet, with such a record, he was able to obtain a position of peculiar responsibility in the Treasury, in which one man had but, a little more than a year before, proved faithless to his trust, and where of all places, unquestioned good character should have been required. The manager of a bank or business house who should select such a man, without scrutiny into his true character, for such a place, would be deemed insane. How does it happen, then, that a public officer, who is pecuniarily responsible for the safety of the funds intrusted to his care, and for the good conduct of his employes, could make such an appointment? The explanation is simple enough. It is the same that must be given for nine-tenths of the evils that infest the public service—the wresting of the appointing power from the responsible hands in which the Constitution placed it, and its usurpation by Congressmen. The appointing power of executive officers has become the mere shadow of a name. It consists simply in the signature of their names to appointments dictated by members of Congress. When a vacancy occurs, the system which prevails does not permit them to seek out a proper man for the place, or even to select the best-qualified applicant. The only choice which is allowed them is that of deciding which candidate possesses the most influential backers or is most persistently pressed.

If a rogue is able to find an influential Congressman unscrupulous or careless enough to recommend him for a place, he need not fear that any scrutiny of the appointing power will bring his true character to light. The system has become so perverted that the appointing officers regard themselves as aquitted of any responsibility for appointments made at the dictation of Congressmen, while as a matter of fact the latter are under no real responsibility. They suffer no loss or inconvenience if the appointee proves to be a rascal or an ignoramus, nor does public opinion hold them to any accountability. Neither does such a result impair their "influence." If a member's appointee turns out to be a rogue, whose true character should have been known to his indorser, the honorable gentleman will demand the designation of the new appointee as coolly, and obtain it as easily, as if nothing had occurred to impair confidence in his recommendations. When a prominent Supervisor of Internal Revenue was removed under suspicion of complicity in the whisky frauds, the Senator who procured him the place, and who was his social and political intimate, was allowed to select his successor, and great pains were taken to let the world know that the appointment was satisfactory to the Senator, lest, we suppose, the public should think that the department was smarting under the great man's displeasure.

If the responsibility for appointments were simply transferred from the executive to the legislative branch of the Government, the system would be bad enough, but it would be endurable. There would be some one whom the people could hold accountable for bad appointments. As it is, no one is responsible. In the transfer of the appointing power from the hands in which the Constitution placed it to another branch of the Government all true responsibility fell to the ground. It is natural that this result should follow. The Constitution prescribes the functions of the several branches of the Government, and so long as each acts within its proper sphere it is easy to place the responsibility for improper acts where it rightfully belongs. But when one branch of the Government surreptitiously exercises the functions of another, the constitutional theory of responsibility is broken down. If by the growth of a vicious system the decisions of the Supreme Court should come to be dictated by the President, though announced in the name of the court, it is plain that neither President nor court could be held accountable for bad decisions. The President could not be, because the Constitution does not invest him with judicial powers; the court could not be, because it would be known that it had merely registered the edict of another. But such a system would be no more pernicious nor a more flagrant violation of the Constitution than the system of appointment which prevails. It is only because long familiarity with the spoils system has deadened the public sense of its enormities that it is tolerated for a month.

The only cure for the present evils is the adoption of a system of selecting the public servants, from which the influence of Congressmen shall be utterly excluded, and which will have reference solely "to the honesty, fidelity, and capacity of the appointees." There is no middle ground. So long as Congressmen have a voice in the appointments, they will insist on having the sole voice. They will resent, as they do now, any independent investigation by the appointing power into the character and capacity of their nominees as an insult to themselves. Not till the Government is able to choose its servants with reference to the needs of the service, and not to the needs of politicians, will the service be rid of incompetency, dishonesty, and the whole brood of evils which partisan greed and recklessness have quartered upon it.

FATAL RAILROAD ACCIDENTS.

BANGOR, Jan. 21.—Herbert H. Young, an employe of the Maine Central Railroad, was run over and killed by a shifting engine on Saturday afternoon.

PORTLAND, Jan. 21.—Woodbury B. Jackman, a brakeman on the Grand Trunk Railway, fell between two cars, was run over and killed, near Oxford on Saturday evening.

A BOAT-HOUSE DEMOLISHED BY A GALE.

HANOVER, Jan. 21.—The boat-house of the Dartmouth College Navy was destroyed by a heavy gale last night, together with its contained boats, shell, and sculls. The loss is estimated from $2,000 to $3,000.

THE FINE ARTS.

EXHIBITION OF WATER-COLORS.

RECEPTION OF THE AMERICAN SOCIETY OF PAINTERS IN WATER-COLORS — THE ERROR OF EXHIBITING WATER-COLOR PAINTINGS BY GAS-LIGHT—A REVIEW OF THE PICTURES EXHIBITED.

It must be for the reason that people will not come at any other time that art receptions, and particularly receptions involving examination of water-colors are held in the evening. Any picture which is painted in daylight ought to be seen by daylight, in order to do the painter justice, but if this be true of oil paintings, whose body of color and solidity of tone often appear to but little disadvantage under the gas, how much truer is it with water-colors, whose delicate shades of coloring and transparent mediums the yellow light reduces to hues which the painter never had in mind. The leveling effect of gas-light was painfully evident on Saturday night, when the American Society of Painters in Water-colors gave their little private reception at the rooms of the Academy of Design. The prettiest and most sensitive of the water-colors were the surest to suffer from the harsh glare of the gas; a sketch, which by daylight had shown a quiet sentiment of its own, now appeared to be wanting in the only thing that distinguished it from its ersuder neighbor. We would advise, therefore, that the lovers of art who go to-night to the Twenty-third street building should not content themselves with the view they get at the reception, but, having picked out their favorite pictures, return during the following week to examine them away from the influence of artificial light. A slightly gray day will prove the best; the effort will be surely repaid by fresh pleasure in the vivid colors and bright effects which day-time reveals.

THE NORTH ROOM.

The catalogue begins auspiciously with a rapid sketch of a head by P. Bouvier, done with a bold brush. It is warm in color and strongly painted. It is not for sale, having been loaned for exhibition by Mr. R. C. Hawkins. Near by hangs one of A. H. Wyant's graceful efforts in water-color, showing considerable attention to details. William Magrath has in No. 8 "Crochet Workers," a theme which we find recurring again and again throughout this exhibition. He is a careful and painstaking workman, who sometimes makes a very happy hit in tone, but his large-eyed, round-featured, stage peasants become a trifle wearisome. They make one wonder whether among the number of pictures rejected by the Hanging Committee there might not be one or two less careful but more interesting sketches by other hands. On the same wall is a specimen of Killingworth Johnson's work, No. 13, "Burning Brush." Undoubtedly the product of a man who understands his pencil and knows how to say what he wishes, this picture does not hold its own as well as many an inferior work. There is great precision, (in the good sense,) but also coldness. It lacks a quality which we find to some small degree in No. 15, "Reveries," by Alfred Kappes, an artist who has little of the restraint and air of experience visible in Killingworth Johnson. "Reveries" presents to us a girl, seen only quarter face, forming a sketch delicate in tints, harmonious, decidedly clever. There is an element of hope, of a future, in some of Alfred Kappes' sketches.

The next number is called the "Reaper's Child." Mr. A. F. Bellows has succeeded in giving his paints a woolly effect exceedingly disagreeable. This very possibly arises from defective drawing as much as anything else, but the coloring is also crude. Dibdin is represented close by with a picture of Bruges—one of those commonplace subjects of his which in bygone ages may have been fresh enough to arouse a kind of interest—the interest of persons who wish to be instructed in the appearance of Flemish towns. It is excellently painted—like the other thousands of correct views. But of course there is nothing in it beyond the mere reproduction of the place, such as a photograph might furnish. To get something more than that one has to glance only a short distance to No. 24, "A Windy Day," by Henry Turner. Here the thick clouds have settled down over a bare upland until there is only light enough left to distinguish a house. The reddish tints of the upland show through the darkness, the clouds and foreground itself are full of the motion of wind, although there is comparatively little at hand to explain the motion forcibly—no peasant women, such as Achenbach loves to paint, with their skirts streaming out before them in the gale. This is an excellently-felt little picture, of which the painter might justly be proud. Somewhat in the same line is No. 26, "Twilight on the Moor," by Mr. A. T. Bricher, in which we find it difficult to realize the author of glassy breakers and sandstone sea beaches. It is a little thing, of excellent sentiment, yet, with the customary perversity of artists, the painter himself doubtless thinks it a very slender affair. We judge this from the very low price he sets upon it, in comparison with the large pictures of corresponding cost which occupy so much space in other rooms.

Passing to the other walls of the North Room, we notice a clever but exaggerated sketch by M. R. Oakey. (No. 38,) and a modest one by Mr. Gay. (No. 39,) both of them women, and a characteristically bold picture of a girl and book, by Winslow Homer, (No. 42.) The girl lies at full length, clothed in a dress to match her hair. The seat of honor is accorded to a huge erection, by Louis C. Tiffany, (No. 43,) "Palace of the Pasha Ali Ben Hassein," at Algiers, a picture which strikes us as one of the worst specimens of the art which truckles to Mammon. The very figures are ashamed of themselves, and, knowing that they have been made simply for sale, refuse to be human beings. Beyond it hangs a picture, No. 46, "Gathering Wood," which Mr. C. S. Reinhart must have composed in his happiest mood. It is the least ambitious, but the best water-color he has to show, being remarkable not only in drawing, wherein his strength lies, but in color as well. Nos. 58, "Guitar Player," and 63, "Male Figure," are by foreigners, the one being Placencia, the other Villegas. They seem to use their transparent colors in a very liquid form; the style is dashing, and opaque colors are freely used to finish the prominent points. That by Villegas is harmonious in tone. Another foreigner, Beme-Bellecour, is poorly represented by No. 64, "Teasing the Cat," and No. 48, "Lady Reclining." No. 73, "Durham Cathedral," is an immense stretch of colors for anything that professes to have an artistic purpose. We fear that in this and other similar pictures, Mr. Colman is working for the pocket only, and not for his artistic sense. No. 74 has clear and distinct drawing, by John Thorpe. There are cattle pieces, by the same hand, in the corridor, that are less painfully elaborated, but no wise interior. A. F. Bellows has another large expanse in No. 82, "Coaching in New-England," the quality of which is even more spongy than usual. The trunks of his elm-trees are soft, like old cork, while figures devoid of good drawing stand on an unreal roadway. A. T. Snider is still sinning, as of old, in No. 92, "St. Michael's Mount," everything being finished up to the unreality of metal. On the other hand, Jervis McEntee manages to give, with few tints, a finely-felt rendering of nature at a certain season of the year in No 101, "A Nipping and an Eager Air." No. 104 shows Vibert at his customary priest and cavalier, a species of genre picture of which we have long had a surfeit. Its merits as a study are, of course, undeniable. There is good work also in No. 105, "Chrysanthemums," by J. E. Wiley, Jr.

THE EAST ROOM.

The room on the Fourth avenue side of the building generally occupies in the minds of Hanging Committees a sort of middle ground between the paradise of a large room and the purgatory of the corridor. This year, so evenly do the water-colors average, Messrs. R. S. Gifford, Shurtleff, and Livingston can congratulate themselves that no one need feel hurt. The East Room averages no better and no worse than the North, unless the absence of large pictures turns the scale in its favor. In No. 114 we find one of those French sketches of which there seems no end—clever, sprightly, but smacking of a school rather than an individual. The individual is Mamey, No. 115, "Reading About the Celestial Country," is a very youthful production, which deserves to be better. There is in it an unreality of color and a weakness of drawing which cannot fail to suggest sentimentality, as if the painter had never seriously realized life. But the next picture—No. 116, "The Old Fort, Canonicut Island," the work of a man of far greater experience—has less hope in it than the faulty exaggerations of No. 115. The picture has plenty of admirers, but we cannot conceive how any one who has stood on the Dumplings at Newport and looked on that scene can reproduce it by such a travesty. If the old fort and Narragansett Channel ever did look like Mr. Richard's picture, it was his duty not to tell any one, but to wait for a better day. There is good in No. 119, "A Winter Landscape," by Louis Apol; and all of Mr. Winslow Homer's uncompromising spirit in

No. 122, "Blackboard." Why is it that one always remembers Mr. Homer's things? In the first place, (we hazard to answer,) because he always has something to say, and, in the second, because he tells the truth, as far as in him lies to see it, without hesitation or remorse. This unusually rigid schoolmarm, pointing to the blackboard, must give Mr. Homer's powerfully-organized senses an agreeable rasping. She is so stiff and individual, so true. Not far off is a Simonetti, No. 127, in which a courtier in white satin, with canary-colored sleeves, completes his costume. There is grace and harmony of color in this—yet the schoolmarm makes a deeper, more abiding impression. Perhaps the most attention shown to any picture in this room on Saturday night was to No. 135, "Reverie," by Killingworth Johnson. A woman in white leans her head against a mantlepiece in a way which must hurt her after a little time. It looks like a portrait, but as a picture is weak in sentiment. What gains attention to it is the careful, exquisite painting, smooth, and as if done with the finest brushes. The dress hangs in folds in front which confuse. Which way run the legs? and why those folds? Here seems to be one of those paintings which are charming at first blush and then pall. Above and to the right, is another Simonetti, clever and audacious, after the Roman school, representing a lady on a terrace looking at some one out of a pair of naughty eyes. She is showing her foot too, the wily serpent! Further along, and on the lowest line, is a curious "Windsor from Datchet," by Collingwood Smith, where the sun comes out through the twigs of a tree, as if were the nearest object to the beholder. It is clever and peculiar, showing strong English influences at work in the school. One of R. Swain Gifford's brightest thoughts is embodied here in an unpretending water-color on coarse paper, No. 152, "Scene on the Campania near Naples." The sentiment is excellent, the clouds particularly good.

Another of Marney's Rouen scenes appears under No. 153. One cannot shake off the feeling that there is little personality behind the name, but the handling is clever. It is very different with Prsdilla—No. 163, "View near Cassenova." Here we see the gray sky coming down over green waves, with something of the intensity and vivid reality of nature; and though the work seems to have been done hastily on rough paper, we are none the less content. No. 160, "Lincoln, England," by Samuel Colman, is another pot-boiler trying to reach the dignity of art by increase in size. Mr. Colman knows how to paint; it is therefore all the sadder to see him using his time in the province occupied by the photographer. No. 161, "Lake Placid, Adirondacks," R. M. Shurtleff, has decided merit in sky and water. The same may be said of several other pictures by this artist.

In No. 164, "The Grasshopper and the Ant," J. G. Vibert not only illustrates one of La Fontaine's best-known fables, but girds successfully at priests. What a bitter satire, indeed, to represent the frugal ant in the person of a fat monk just returning to the monastery with great store of tithings! The grasshopper is inimitably portrayed in the shivering minstrel, clad all in green, out at heel, his mediæval instrument tucked under his arm. Here is a man who can compose a picture which tells many things in one. The landscape is careless, and the snow not very successful. Perhaps that makes the figures more prominent. In No. 175, Purgatory Near Newport," Mr. W. T. Richards does better than in his picture of the Dumplings but the cross deserves far higher powers. Guardibassi, in "The Convalescent" No. 179, not only carries painting far, but understands the shades of meaning in different postures. The fraud of a doctor and the pretty hypocrite of an invalid are models of delicate falsehood. Winslow Homer exhibits in 198 "Rattlesnake," as indifferent a piece of work as we remember to have seen from his studio. R. Swain Gifford treats a very hackneyed subject with his usual skill in No. 209, "Oasis of Filiooh. Algeria." No. 210, "Irish Interior—Girl Winding Yarn," is equally hackneyed under William Magrath's robust pencil. Alfred Kappes shows in No. 218, "Lost," a readiness to strive for variety which, although it may sometimes go too far, is by no means a bad sign.

TRAGEDY IN IOWA.

AN EXTRAORDINARY STORY OF CRIME — A MAN MURDERS HIS WIFE AND ELOPES WITH HIS SISTER-IN-LAW, THE MURDERESS OF HIS CHILD — THE GUILTY PARTIES LYNCHED AND THEIR BODIES BURNED.

Correspondence of the St. Joseph (Mo.) Herald.

ALBANY, Mo., Jan. 15, 1877.

A man giving the name of Albert Kline came in this evening from Iowa, and reports the particulars of a horrible tragedy which occurred on Friday last, near the banks of the Platte River.

About one year ago a man by the name of Phil. Ames moved into that neighborhood, bringing with him a wife, a little child, and his sister-in-law. He secured a small piece of land, and erected upon it a neat two-story dwelling. For a time all things appeared to go on nicely inside the family mansion, but it soon became evident to those who grew intimate with the Ameses that there was a skeleton in the house. There was a coldness growing up between husband and wife, only equaled by an apparent warmth existing between the husband and the sister-in-law. The neighboring women noticed that the wife appeared often in tears, was neglected, and left unprovided for, while her sister received the smiles and caresses of the husband. Whole days the wife passed alone, having no company save the child, a bright, golden-haired girl of five Summers, who clung to her, and in whose existence she appeared to live and have her being. At length, on the 10th of November, the little child sickened and suddenly died. It was buried the next day—a rude country burial, a bitter cold north wind, leafless trees, and a cheerless grave, crushed out the mother's spirit and broke her heart.

Then it was that the spirit of Cain appeared to take possession of the husband. He frequently beat his wife, drove her from his bed, and forced her to occupy a miserable straw and husk pallet on the kitchen floor while the sister occupied the place which belonged to her. At length, the wife, driven to despair, told the story of her wrongs to Mrs. Rosa McGuire, and she laid the situation in the Ames household before her husband, and he soon had the men of the neighborhood worked up to a point of lynching the unnatural husband. They visited the house, and would have hung the monster but for the pleadings of his wife, who went down upon her knees before the angry crowd and begged the life of the man who had so wronged her, while her sister, at the first sound of danger, had sought safety in flight. The neighbors listened to the poor woman's appeal, removed the rope from the man's neck, and set him free. To say but a man possessed by a devil this would have proved a warning that would have turned him into better ways. But not so with Ames. Scarcely had the crowd dispersed when he went to the barn, saddled his horse, and returned to the house with a heavy curb bridle. Up stairs kneeling and at prayer with a photograph of her dead child in her hand, he found his wife. In an instant he had struck her to his feet with the curb bit, dragged her to the head of the stairs and threw her to the floor below, where he continued to beat her with the bridle until life had departed. In the meantime the sister had returned from her hiding-place. Another horse was saddled, the body of the dead woman was thrown across the saddle and, the sister riding one horse and leading the other, Ames walked alongside and held the body in position until they arrived at the river where a hole was cut in the ice and the body thrust out of sight. A young man returning home saw the parties journeying to the river, and when he reached the settlement told what he had seen. A number of armed men started in pursuit, and arrived at the river bank just as the murderers and their paramour were mounting their horses. They were called upon to halt, when Ames drew a revolver and fired into the crowd. The fire was returned by a volley, and the guilty woman fell dead from her horse, shot through the neck. The man put spurs to his horse, and attempted to escape in the dark, but a fortunate shot brought his animal down, and the murderer was captured. A rope was provided and all the necessary arrangements made for a frontier funeral, when the wretched man made a confession, the chief points of which are incorporated in the above statement, and he further stated that the sister of his wife had administered poison to her little neice in order to get her out of the way, and that they were planning the murder of the wife that they might live unmolested together. In this they were prevented by the mob of a few hours before, and that he then killed the wife as above stated. The rope was thrown over a limb, strong men pulled at the end of it, and the next instant a quivering body was suspended in air. A number of logs were then rolled together, brush was piled upon them, and the bodies of the two inhuman beings placed in their midst. A match was applied to the pile, and all that now remains to mark the spot and the tragedy is a bed of ashes. The body of the murdered woman was recovered on Saturday and buried by the side of her dead child.

ROMANCE IN NEVADA.

The Truckee Republican says: "A few days ago a couple visited Truckee on their wedding tour. They were married in Virginia City. The husband was a large, good-looking white man; the wife a delicate, fragile-looking Japanese woman. The advent of this strangely-assorted couple produced considerable comment. The man being interviewed, stated that he was legally married, and that it was a love-match. The couple seemed to be very fond of each other, and did not seem in the least to mind the curious stare of the crowd that watched their movements as they passed along Front street. She had discarded the peculiar costume of her nation, and was arrayed after the manner of a white woman. After remaining a few days in Truckee, the happy couple departed for their home in Virginia City."

PRIVILEGES OF CONGRESS.

DAVID DUDLEY FIELD'S MISSION IN CONGRESS—THE SPECIAL ADVOCATE OF TILDEN—USURPING MR. KNOTT'S PLACE ON THE COMMITTEE—JEALOUSY OF MR. MORRISON'S COMMITTEE OF MR. FIELD'S TRESPASS UPON THEIR GROUND.

Special Dispatch to the New-York Times.

WASHINGTON, Jan. 21.—Representative Morrison and the rest of his committee have returned from Louisiana, and will meet to-morrow to examine United States Marshal Pitkin. The examination of Marshal Pitkin and the disposition to be made of the members of the Louisiana Returning Board, now under arrest for contempt, will probably close the testimony. The preparation of the testimony for printing is being rapidly pushed forward, so that an early report may be made to the House. In connection with this Louisiana business, the fact that Knott's committee, which seems to have been turned over to David Dudley Field, has called before them ex-Gov. Wells and Gen. Anderson, members of the Louisiana Returning Board, and propounded to the witnesses the same questions propounded by Mr. Morrison, is causing considerable comment, and the members of the Morrison Committee are disposed to regard this action as an interference with them and a reflection upon the sufficiency of the last-named committee to discharge the duties confided to them. Wells and Anderson are now in charge of the Sergeant at Arms, at the instance of Mr. Morrison, for refusing to produce certain papers, and pending their duress Mr. Field has taken possession of them and traversed the same ground already gone over by Mr. Morrison. The conduct of Mr. Field, in this and other instances, gives color to the suspicions, freely expressed, that he was sent to Congress for the sole purpose of acting as Mr. Tilden's special advocate in the House. A few days after he was sworn in as a member, the House passed a resolution adding two members to the Committee on the Privileges of the House, and immediately following the passage of the resolution the Speaker announced Field as one of the two additional members. The appointment of a new member upon so prominent a committee caused comment at the time, and the activity of Mr. Field from the day of his appointment justifies the inference that the committee was enlarged that Mr. Field might be added to it, and that he was thus appointed for the special purpose of taking direction of the examination of witnesses and conducting Mr. Tilden's case generally. The members of Morrison's committee think Mr. Field should have waited until the witnesses were discharged by Mr. Morrison before going over ground already traveled. Mr. Knott is at the head of the committee, and Mr. Field at the foot, but since the appointment of Field Mr. Knott has had nothing to do.

THE LOUISIANA DIFFICULTY.

THE PRESIDENT AND THE DEMOCRATIC MEMBERS OF CONGRESS—NICHOLLS VIOLATING THE STATUS QUO—REPRESENTATIONS MADE TO THE PRESIDENT.

WASHINGTON, Jan. 21.—The Democratic members of Congress from Louisiana, who, with Col. Burke, yesterday called upon the President, and had a conversation with him about Louisiana affairs, express themselves perfectly satisfied with the result of their interview, the President having intimated no change in the policy regarding the two State Governments.

Intormation has been received here that the Nicholls Government of Louisiana, through Judge Houston, has enjoined the old Kellogg State Tax Collectors from turning over their moneys to the Kellogg State Auditor, Johnson, who was returned as elected. These Collectors are now in New-Orleans for the purpose of making their final returns from their several parishes. Gen. Augur having yesterday reinstated the old State Librarian removed by Nicholls, it is believed by the Louisiana Republicans in Washington that a proper maintenance of statu quo will require interposition by the national authority in the latter case as well as in that of the Librarian. The moneys are required to subsist the Charity Hospital and public schools, and the administration of the State. Marshal Pitkin has just presented the matter to the President, and urged that, to maintain the statu quo and to conserve these public moneys from being squandered, action should be promptly taken by him.

LEGISLATIVE WARRANTS CASHED—REPUBLICAN DIFFERENCES SETTLED.

NEW-ORLEANS, Jan. 21.—Telegraph manager Barnes returned this morning. It is understood that the Sergeant at Arms leaves on Monday with Casanave and Kenner, of the Returning Board. It is reported that on Saturday afternoon Legislative warrants to the amount of $80,000 were cashed by a prominent Republican.

At a conference of Republican leaders held to-night all differences of opinion were amicably adjusted, and it is thought that prominent party men, both here and in Washington, will henceforth work harmoniously together. Four of the Packard Metropolitan policemen heretofore concealed in the Supreme Court building, and evidently a party of observation, were detected on Saturday night, and at 2 A. M. Sunday the guard at the building was reinforced by Col. Augur's battalion of Militia. The men, it is said, confessed that their instructions were to take advantage of an unguarded moment to recapture the building. This morning's Republican announces that until further notice it will be issued only on Wednesdays and Saturdays.

NOTES FROM THE CAPITAL.

WASHINGTON, Jan. 21.—Late official reports to the Treasury Department from its agents abroad show conclusively that our securities are in demand. A party will leave here next week with the amount of the latest call, $10,000,000; and it can be stated that the funding is now in such successful operation that it is reasonably expected another call for an equal amount will soon be made. The Treasury authorities here are satisfied, from the tone and temper of advices which have been received from Europe regarding the successful funding of the loan, that the financial credit of the Government will be fully maintained, and that the outlook is brighter for a successful continuance of the funding than it has been heretofore.

The fact is officially stated that there is no statute under which persons can be punished for having in their possession dies or molds, by the use of which the coin of the United States can be counterfeited, and that in two cities of the South at this time dies are being made for such a purpose, and Secret Service operatives see the men come and go in supervising the work, but they are powerless to prevent the completion of the dies. They must wait for the overt act of stamping the metal before the work can be stopped or the criminals arrested. In accordance with this fact a bill has been introduced by Senator Sherman for the punishment of persons making, or having in their possession, dies, molds, &c., for manufacturing counterfeit coin of the United States or of any foreign country, such persons to be punished by a fine of not more than $5,000, and by imprisonment at hard labor for not more than five years.

In the next morning hour the House Committee on Pacific Railroads will make a report in favor of the Scott-Huntington Texas Pacific subsidy bill. A strong minority, headed by Mr. Kasson, will make a report against it. There are indications that the lobby will try to have the bill considered and acted upon as soon as the Electoral count question shall have been disposed of; but there is no reason to believe that they will be able to secure its passage.

The Indian Appropriation bill, now under consideration in the House, contains an appropriation of $1,000 to provide, under the direction of the Secretary having jurisdiction of Indian affairs, settlements, clothing, food, agricultural implements, and seeds for the Modoc Indians that have been removed to and are now residing within the Indian Territory. For the purpose of properly distributing the supplies appropriated for in the bill, it is made the duty of each agent in charge of Indians, and having supplies to distribute, to make out rolls of the Indians entitled to supplies at the agency, with the names of the Indians and of the heads of families or lodges, with the number in each family or lodge, and to give out supplies to the heads of families, and not to the heads of tribes or bands, and not to give out supplies for a greater length of time than one week in advance; provided, however, that the Commissioner of Indian Affairs may, in his discretion, issue supplies for a greater period than one week to such Indians as are peaceably located upon their reservation and engaged in agriculture.

Secretary Chandler announces as a deliberate forgery the following alleged dispatch which has been repeatedly published; none such having ever been written or sent by him:

NEW-YORK, Nov. 8, 1876.

To Gov. M. L. Stearns:

Hold Florida for Hayes and Wheeler; money and troops will be sent you. Z. CHANDLER.

The first annual report of the Treasury Department in regard to internal commerce has just been completed by Joseph Nimmo, Jr. This report is largely devoted to those commercial movements which indicate the course and conditions of trade at the present day. The economies of transport by rail are also quite fully discussed. Through this entire report runs the argument that the facilities of transport on railroads and on water lines in connection with the use of the telegraph and the public press in the dissemination of commercial information, have developed an immediate competition between markets which has baffled all attempts by the railroads to form combinations for the purpose of controlling freight charges. It is held that thus the law of supply and demand has reasserted itself in the carrying trade, but in a way unforeseen by the public or by the managers of railroads. In proof of this the fact is adduced that the railroads have during the last five years made many unsuccessful attempts to protect themselves against themselves, and against overpowering commercial forces.

Senator Anthony is still improving, and it is confidently expected will be out to-morrow. He sat up several hours to-day, and a number of friends were admitted to converse with him, among whom was Senator Burnside.

THE PUBLIC SURVEYS.

FEATURES OF THE EXPLORATIONS WEST OF THE HUNDREDTH MERIDIAN.

WASHINGTON, Jan. 21.—The annual report of the surveys west of the hundredth meridan, under direction of Lieut. Wheeler, of the United States Corps of Engineers, is now about ready for issue. It will exhibit many interesting facts regarding the topography and resources of the regions examined in Colorado, New-Mexico, and California during the last fiscal year. Under special instructions from the War Department, an examination was made to ascertain whether the waters of the Great Colorado River of the West could be diverted to the adjoining desert plains for purposes of irregration. The report thereon is accompanied with illustrations and tabulated data showing the problem to be difficult if not impracticable. Special investigations have been inaugurated with a view to distinctively delineate in colors upon the atlas maps of the survey, the ared, irregable, grazing, mineral and mountainous section of the whole region hitherto explored by the Wheeler expeditions, which have covered, since the year 1869, nearly 400,000 square miles. These expeditions have been sent out by the War Department primarily for the purpose of gathering topographical data for the mapping of the country, and incidentally to report on the mineral, agricultural, and other resources of the vast region west of the one hundredth meridian, and its geology, climate, &c. Maps of a large portion of the area have already been published.

The matured results of the survey are to be published in seven quarto volumes. Two of these, viz., Geology and Zoology, have appeared; a third, Paleontology, is nearly ready for distribution, and the remainder are well advanced. Topographical and geological atlas sheets are issued from time to time. There will also be issued a monograph upon routes of communication, showing the distances between points, elevations, wood, water, grass, &c. This information is much sought for by parties contemplating the location of colonies, the transfer of large herds to grazing ground, &c. The appropriations for this work in the last year, although limited in amount and not available until late in the Summer, have afforded gratifying results, the several field parties continuing their labors up to December, and returning to the head-quarters at Washington well laden with data to be elaborated and submitted directly to the Government, and incidently to the public, during the present office season. If Congress makes adequate appropriations, parties will be put in the field early in the coming Spring, as skilled assistants, instruments and outfits are all at hand ready for a campaign at any time.

THE ELECTION IN CINCINNATI.

THE USE OF DEMOCRATIC MONEY TO BE INVESTIGATED—SUBPŒNAS ISSUED FOR NEW-YORK AND LOCAL BANKERS AND OTHERS.

The Cincinnati Gazette has a telegram from Washington, dated 19th inst., which reads:

"The Republican members of the Dudley Field's Committee are about to do a little investigating for the benefit of their side. Mr. Field has been so curious in regard to the use of money in the campaign by the Republican National Committee as to suggest the propriety of asking a few questions in regard to the direction given to certain Democratic frauds by parties in New-York, who thought the Electoral vote in Ohio, as well as the Congressional vote in the Second (Cincinnati) District, might be controlled for Mr. Tilden's benefit. Sufficient information concerning the sudden transfer of money to Cincinnati has reached the members of the committee to justify the summoning of the following gentlemen, and subpœnas were ordered for them this afternoon, directing them to appear on Monday: C. N. Jordan, Cashier of the Third National Bank, New-York; Smith Weed and John S. G. Burt, of New-York; Theodore Stanwood, Cashier of the First National Bank of Cincinnati; Hugh Colville, Cashier of the Commercial Bank of Cincinnati; John R. McLean, of the Cincinnati Enquirer; Thomas E. Paxton and Alexander Long, Esqs., of Cincinnati. These classes of witnesses only are represented in this list—the New-York bankers who received the political funds in the regular order of business; the Cincinnati bankers to whom it was transferred, and eminent citizens, who knew of its timely arrival, and of the purposes for which it was designed. As yet the head and tail of this column must remain undescribed for fear that extradition treaties might be needed to secure proper witnesses. The New-York parties are wanted with such books as show the receipt of money and its transfer to the bank named in Cincinnati. The bank officers from the latter city are wanted with books showing their action in these transfers. The eminent citizens named are asked to be present to help secure a fair count. One element in the Cincinnati returns, about which the committee will want to know as much as possible, is a little matter of a certain $7,000, and certain bank officers having books or papers relating to that, will save themselves the trouble of a second trip to New-York or Cincinnati by bringing them on at once."

AMUSEMENTS.

THIS EVENING'S PROMISE.

A BOSTON THOUGHT.

The Boston Advertiser of Thursday says:

"Probably no one in Boston, however cynical, saw the poor fan-tailed pigeons in Music Hall, without feeling that after all he had something to be thankful for. If we have been evolved, what a deliverance it must have been when we finally escaped the fan-tail stage."

THE VOTE OF LOUISIANA.

FOURTEEN THOUSAND SUPPRESSED REPUBLICAN BALLOTS.

THE RESULTS OF THE WHITE LEAGUE CANVASS IN FIFTEEN PARISHES—THE INTIMIDATION AND FRAUD OUTSIDE OF THE BULL-DOZED DISTRICT—RICHLAND AND CLAIBORNE SAMPLE COUNTIES—WHAT SENATOR BOGY ADMITS AND WHAT HE DENIES.

From a Special Correspondent.

WASHINGTON, Friday, Jan. 19, 1877.

A few days since while vaiuly attempting to answer the convincing argument which was made in the Louisiana case by Senator Sherman, Mr. Bogy, of Missouri, stated that while it might be admitted that there had been some intimidation and violence in the five parishes which had become famous as the "bull-dozed districts," there was absolutely no proof that either fraud or violence had been practiced by the Democrats in any other part of the State. When Mr. Bogy made this assertion he displayed a woeful ignorance of the political condition of the Commonwealth to which he referred, for it is a well recognized fact in Louisiana that the Democratic ruffians who control and compose the White League committed even more terrible atrocities in the country lying outside of the five so-called bull-dozed parishes than were perpetrated in the districts thus designated. As to the fraud and violence in the Parishes of East and West Feliciana, East Baton Rouge, Morehouse and Ouachita, even Senator Bogy is forced to tacitly admit that there can be no question. Every impartial and fair-minded man who makes himself familiar with the facts in the case will come to the same conclusion. In the five counties named, a few weeks prior to the date of the last election, there were registered 5,134 white Democratic voters and 13,244 colored Republican voters. In 1874, when a reasonably fair election was held, the Republican majority in the counties referred to was 3,979, and in Presidential years they were counted on for a majority of not less than 6,000. At the last election, however, according to the Democratic claim, they gave the cause of Tilden and reform a majority of 4,495! In other words, the White League rifle clubs, by fraud, violence, murder, and outrage, prevented nearly 10,000 citizens of the United States from exercising the rights of freemen. For the Parishes of East and West Feliciana, Morehouse, and Ouachita the returns showed a Democratic majority of 3,878; in East Feliciana, where there were 2,127 registered Republican voters, not one Republican vote was cast, and in East Baton Rouge, where there were registered 3,552 Republican and only 1,301 Democratic votes, the agents of the "great reformer" claimed a majority of 617. It is, doubtless, a knowledge of these facts which has led even a violent partisan like Mr. Bogy to admit that "there may have been violence and intimidation in the five so-called bull-dozed parishes." This admission on the part of Mr. Bogy is good as far as it goes, but unfortunately it does not go far enough, for, as I have already intimated above, the White League supporters of Mr. Tilden did not confine their operations to the counties just referred to. They were exceedingly active all through the Red River country, and in the Parishes of Claiborne, Richland, Livingston, St. Tammany, and Franklin they succeeded almost as well as they did in the Felicianas or in East Baton Rouge.

THE TERROR IN RICHLAND.

As to the reign of terror which existed in Richland Parish just prior to the election there is abundant proof. The following statement, which is sworn to by Jefferson Perkins, is selected from a score of similar ones, and gives only a faint idea of the means to which the Democrats resorted to carry the election. It is testimony which can be relied upon, however. Perkins being one of the best known and most respectable colored men in the State. His statement is substantially as follows:

I am a farmer, 48 years old, and have lived in Louisiana nearly all my life. For many years I have been a resident of the Parish of Richland, and was in that parish on election day. Before then, and while the registration was going on, the Democrats were very violent in their language to the colored people, and frequently threatened to kill them if they voted the Republican ticket. During former campaigns I had been President of a Republican club, but during the last canvass, hearing that any colored man who organized a club would be killed, I did not dare call my party friends together. I live in the Fourth Ward of the parish, and know every colored man in it. There is not one Democrat among them, or one who would have voted the Democratic ticket at the late election, unless under duress and coercion. On Monday before the election I started up to Rayville, the parish seat, to get Republican tickets. After arrival at Rayville, Stephen Perkins, my son, came to Rayville and told me that an armed body of white Democrats had organized at Aito to follow and catch Cyrus Landrum, who also came to Rayville to get Republican tickets. My son became uneasy from this, and followed me to warn me of my danger. I then complained to Col. Moore, Sheriff of the Parish of Richland, and Col. Moore then told me if I agreed to scratch Leonard and Wheeler on the Republican ticket, and insert Farmer and Lucas, Democrats, that he would give me a letter of protection. Col. Moore is a prominent Democrat, and Sheriff of the parish. I not being able to do better, agreed to this arrangement. Col. Moore then gave me a paper or letter of protection against the bull-dozers. The letter was about in substance thus: "Let these men pass; they are all right." Col. Moore also demanded of me my promise not to issue the tickets until Tuesday, Nov. 7, 1876. This was Monday, Nov. 6. I then, the same day, went home to Ward Four, and the same night a band of armed bull-dozers, 30 or 40 strong, went about the ward revisiting colored men at their houses, and also in the Fifth Ward they tore off the boards from the residences of colored men, shot into their yards and killed their dogs, and shouted out that everybody next day must vote the Democratic ticket, and if they did not they would get something more the next night. On the next day, Nov. 7, the colored men at the poll of the Fourth Ward were so terrified that few of them had the courage to vote the Republican ticket. Sam Draper, Wash. Wagner, and their men, all colored, came to the poll, and, finding it was dangerous for them to vote the Republican ticket, they went away to find some other poll where they could vote with safety. Two of the Commissioners at the poll of the ward were Democrats, and the third was a colored man—my son—who had no control or voice in the arrangements for the election. A Democratic Commissioner received all the votes; he had the box placed where the voter could not put his own ticket in. Mr. A. P. Cooper, the Democratic Commissioner, who received all the tickets, would open them, so that he could read how each man voted. This was protested against by me; I was both a Constable of Election and a Deputy United States Marshal, but the Commissioner would not desist. A white Democrat, Mr. L. P. Daff, stood near the poll and kept a "spot-book," in which was marked how each colored man voted. Dr. Evans, Bill Elington, Ben Newbury, all white Democrats, came near the polls with shot-guns. Mr. Samuel C. Moore, a white Republican, who was present, told me that he had been stamped there that he could not vote the Republican ticket, and he [Moore] did not vote at all. The few colored men who voted the Republican ticket at that poll felt like they were risking their lives to do so, and the great majority of the colored men in the ward either did not vote at all, or were compelled, under the influence of threats and the acts of intimidation before mentioned, to vote the Democratic ticket against their wish and conscience. On the day of election a colored man named Whitefield, living on Mr. Joseph Duke's plantation, had a Republican ticket in his hand, which he voted. Mr. Duke said to him, "You have voted that ticket, now go home and take yourself away from my place." The man voted the ticket, and Mr. Duke immediately discharged him from his employment. Mr. McIntosh and Mr. Shirley, both white Democrats, said to some men in their employ, "If you vote the Republican ticket we will go for you to-night." And the men had to abandon their houses. Such a condition of things as above recited as regards Ward Four existed in all portions of the parish. There was no sense of safety among white or colored Republicans, and all merely for politics. Richland Parish is next to Ouachita and Morehouse Parishes, and the railroad runs through Richland to Monroe, and the people of Ouachita and Richland are passing to and fro over day between the two parishes, and the murders, whippings, and other outrages occurring in Ouachita for political reasons were freely talked of in Richland, and had the effect to increase the intimidation in Richland, bringing about a condition of terror which made a free election impossible.

FORCED TO VOTE THE DEMOCRATIC TICKET.

The following is the statement of Archer Benson, a respectable colored man, who was forced to vote the Democratic ticket in Richland Parish:

I am a qualified elector, and a Republican; at the last election voted at the general box in the Third Ward and the Democratic ticket. I was compelled and forced to vote the Democratic ticket. I am a farmer, and I was told by D. D. Donnell and Zachariah Fletcher, Democrats, about three weeks before the election, that if I did not vote the Democratic ticket my name would be put down on the list to be killed with eight others, colored Republicans. Among the ones to be killed were myself, Will Ross, T. J. Tyson, Henry Brown, Jeff Holliday, and Jim Davis, all living in the Third Ward in said parish. I know that Henry Allen, a colored Republican, living on the line dividing the parishes of Richland and Morehouse, and about a mile from my house, on the night before the election was severely beaten and had a rope drawn across his neck. The reason of this cruelty was because Allen said he would die before he would vote the Democratic ticket. The Democrats would not allow the Republicans to hold club-meetings in the parish during the late canvass. There are 200 colored Republican voters in the Third Ward, and 82 voted the Republican ticket at the last election. I live in the portion of the parish called Winn Island, Ward Three. There are about 20 colored Republican electors living on the island, and only one of these voted the Republican ticket; he had to leave his home and go into the woods to prevent being hurt by the Democrats. His name is James Davis. I saw him on his way to the woods and he told me he was afraid of the life he became to voted the Republican ticket. The Democrats would not allow Republican clubs in Ward Three, nor let us have or attend church at night. We were allowed to have church on Sunday, but Democrats would be present until it was over. About three weeks before the election, R. Justice, a prominent Democrat, told me, "Woe be to the unlucky nigger who would vote the Republican ticket." Mr. Justice's expression of countenance when he made this remark satisfied my mind that if I did not vote his way it would be certain death. He [Justice] lives also on Winn Island, and he is a terror to the colored people, and they dread him. He makes a practice to carry fire-arms on his person. There was a great deal of intimidation and threats of violence used by the Democrats against Republicans during the late canvass.

HOW THE ELECTION WAS CONDUCTED.

Mr. Samuel C. Moore, a well-known white merchant of Bayville, in Richland, who is referred to by the witness Perkins, tells a very interesting story particularly as to the manner in which the Democrats conducted the election in the parish named. His testimony, as sworn to before the Returning Board, was substantially as follows:

For several weeks prior to the election held on the 7th of November last in the Parish of Richland there were many acts of violence, threats, and intimidation used, which did prevent a fair, free, full, and peaceable election; and there were armed bodies of men, disguised, in many instances, who were white Democrats, and who were known by the name of bull-dozers, who patrolled my parish in the night-time, and by hanging, shooting, and whipping Republicans and colored men, so filled them with fear and terror that they dared not organize or attend Republican meetings, and who were compelled to attend Democratic clubs and speakings to prevent them receiving bodily harm, or losing their situations, or having their families scared or abused. I have had my life threatened many times. On the Saturday night previous to the last election a body of armed men assembled on the street in front of my store and my neighbor, Jones': the party were W. W Davis, E. Landers, F. J. Hudson, E. H. Moore, (Democratic Sheriff of the parish,) S. Scott, and others, all Democrats, who, hearing that the Republican tickets for my parish were either in my store or that of my neighbor, Jones, said they would have and destroy those tickets, if in no other way, by firing both stores, if by searching them after breaking them open they could not find the tickets. This body of men increased in numbers and in the violence of their threats until I became so much alarmed for my life and store that I slipped out of the side door, taking the tickets with me, and going to the Democratic Parish Judge, told him my danger; and, after he found it true, he counsoled the crowd to disperse, and succeeded in getting them to go away. On the day of election there were many armed Democrats, among whom were E. McMorgan, Dr. Evans, William Ellington, Benjamin Newbury, and many others, who, by their acts, threats, and intimidations made many colored men who wanted to vote the Republican ticket vote the Democratic ticket, among whom are Buck Seabury, George Harris, Peter Jibo, Hoocks Briant, Noah Woodson, and many others, who voted at the poll at which I was present in the Fourth Ward, besides many who did not vote, for fear of violence, the Republican ticket, and would not vote the Democratic ticket. I was prevented from voting at all, because I had been warned that if I voted the Republican ticket I would be killed, and I would not vote the Democratic ticket. I acted as United States Supervisor of Election on the 7th day of November, 1876, and not thinking the poll-list, tally-sheets, or reports and papers of the election were correct, I refused to sign them. Some of these irregularities were: the tickets in the box were more than the number of names of parties who had voted; the box was not sealed; the tally-sheets were kept entirely by Democrats and were altered at the will of the Democrats several times, and finally fixed up to suit them, when they were handed to me for signature without allowing me any chance whatever to examine them. For these causes I refused to sign them, though many threats were made against me for it.

RESULTS OF DEMOCRATIC VIOLENCE AND FRAUD.

Of course, the acts of violence, outrage, and fraud which are described by the witnesses whom I have quoted were not practiced without an object. They were all contributions in aid of Tilden, reform, and a solid South. Every unfortunate black man who was killed by the White League lost his life that "the great cause" might prosper. Every wretched black woman who was whipped was so outraged that what Mr. Abram S. Hewitt and Hamburg Massacre Butler join in calling "the great fight for better government" might succeed. In Richland Parish it succeeded only too well, for out of 961 registered Republican voters only 252 dared cast their ballots on election day, and the county, which at a fair and free election would give a Republican majority of 300, was carried for Tilden and Reform by a majority of 711. In nine other adjacent parishes which have never been generally counted among the bull-dozed districts, and where Senator Bogy claims there was an honest election, the Republicans were kept away from the polls very much as they were in Richland. The following table will show how extensively their votes were suppressed:

Names of Parishes.	Republican Vote Registered in 1876.	Republican Vote Cast in 1876.
Bienville	986	225
Caldwell	456	282
Claborne	1,290	427
Franklin	753	129
Grant	435	322
Jackson	391	33
Richland	961	252
Union	801	87
Washington	166	163
Winn	161	78
Total	6,080	1,978

From the above it will be seen that there were 4,000 Republican votes, more or less, suppressed in the nine parishes named. These, together with the 10,000 driven away from the polls in East and West Feliciana, East Baton Rouge, Morehouse, and Ouachita, make 14,000 Republican ballots that were suppressed in 15 parishes. On the day of election there were registered in the entire State of Louisiana 92,996 Democratic voters, and 115,310 colored Republican voters, the majority in favor of the latter being 22,314, and yet in the face of these figures Mr. Tilden's White League supporters had the hardihood to claim before the Returning Board that they had carried the State by a majority of 8,600. Now, because the Returning Board was not foolish enough to believe them, they assert that it was an illegal and an unconstitutional body, and Mr. Bogy and his associates in the Senate are working day and night to overturn its decision. HAMPTON'S OFFER TO TILDEN.

"IF OUR ALLIANCE IS A LOAD WE WILL UNLOAD"—ANSWER BY MR. MARBLE.

From the Charleston (S. C.) News, Jan. 18.

The following letter written to Mr. Manton Marble by Gen. Hampton, after the Abbeville conference, when it had been proposed that the Tilden Electoral ticket in this State should be withdrawn, is published by Col. Haskell as part of the reply to "A Tilden Democrat:"

WALHALLA, Sept. 19, 1876.

MY DEAR SIR: There are some matters pertaining to the contest in this State upon which it is very important that the views of Mr. Tilden and his special friends should be known to us. I hope that you will communicate with me, and speak with the same frankness I shall use with you. Our Executive Committee seems to apprehend that our friends at the North are embarrassed by our alliance with them. Of course, this apprehension places our party here in an awkward position If these apprehensions are well founded, how can we relieve our friends at the North of their embarrassment? Before our convention met I wrote fully to Mr. Tilden, telling him what would probably be its action, and asking his advice, so that we could promote the interests of the Democratic Party. He did not reply to my letter, and I was forced, by irresistible public opinion, to accept the nomination for Governor. We have made the canvass thoroughly conservative, and it has been a perfect success so far. With aid from abroad the State can be carried for Tilden. There is no doubt of its being carried for our State ticket, for our opponents would gladly agree to let us elect our men if we withdraw. Even President is not the contest. Of course, we are most anxious to aid in the general election, but you can understand our solicitude to find out how we can best do this. If our alliance is a load, we will unload. If our friends desire us to carry on the contest as begun, we shall do so. If you will give me your views on these points I shall be indebted to you. The inclosed extracts will show you the line I take in the canvass. Write to Columbia, care of Col. A. C. Haskell. With my good wishes, I am, very truly yours, WADE HAMPTON.

To MANTON MARBLE, Esq.

The reply of Mr. Marble by telegraph to Col. Haskell is as follows:

SEPT. 20, 1876.

It is agreed here that your friend's persistence and his present efforts and plans are wise and advantageous. MANTON MARBLE.

MONDAY, Jan. 22—A. M.

The statement of the associated banks, issued from the Clearing-house on Saturday last, shows a gain of $3,454,775 in surplus reserve, which raises the excess held by the banks above legal requirements to $24,268,000. The most favorable and significant change in the statement is the gain of $3,085,900 in legal tenders. The other changes are a decrease of $1,761,500 in loans, and $25,400 in circulation, and an increase of $1,237,500 in specie, and $3,474,500 in deposits.

The following shows the condition of the banks on Saturday last, as compared with the previous statement, and with the statement for the corresponding week last year:

	Jan. 13, 1877.	Jan. 20, 1877.	Jan. 22, 1876.
Loans	$254,173,000	$252,411,900	$260,806,900
Specie	39,737,400	40,975,300	22,772,300
Legal tenders	37,042,900	40,128,800	46,367,900
Deposits	223,868,300	227,342,800	217,324,900
Circulation	15,517,300	15,491,900	17,892,000

And the following the relations between the total reserve and total liabilities of the banks:

Specie	$39,737,400	$40,974,900	Inc. $1,237,500
Legal tenders	37,042,900	40,128,800	Inc. 3,085,900
Total reserve	$76,780,300	$81,103,700	Inc. $4,323,400
Res've required as'st deposits	55,967,075	56,835,700
Excess of res've above legal requirements	20,813,225	24,268,000	Inc. 3,454,775

The money market was easier than last week, especially toward the close. The banks and trust companies were free lenders at 4@5 ₱ cent. on acceptable collaterals, while, finally, Stock Exchange balances lent at 3 ₱ cent. The ease in money follows naturally the settlement of accounts for 1876, and the return flow of currency from the interior, which was sent hence to move cotton and pack hogs. The lower rates for call loans started a demand for mercantile paper, and prime names were readily taken at 5@6 ₱ cent. The amount of paper being written, however, continued moderate.

The foreign advices reported a firm market for British Consols, and the steadiness of this class of securities may be regarded as indicative that capitalists abroad, notwithstanding the critical phase the Eastern question has assumed, do not regard war as inevitable. United States bonds were firm and higher. The Bank of England, for the week ending Wednesday last, lost £643,000 in specie; but no change was made in the rate of discount, which remains at 2 ₱ cent.

The gold speculation was comparatively tame early in the week. The market was subsequently strengthened by apprehensions of a hostile collision between the rival parties in New-Orleans, and the price advanced to 107, but later receded to 106¼, with closing transactions at 106⅜. On gold loans the rate for carrying ranged from flat to 5 ₱ cent., with the bulk of the business at 4@4½.

The sterling exchange market was quiet and without especial change. The nominal rates were $4 83½ and $4 85½, with business at the close at about $4 83 and $4 84¾. The offerings of bills were in excess of the demand.

The Government bond dealers have had another important week, some large orders having been executed for financial coporations here and elsewhere, while a considerable business was done for small investors. The continued demand has more than offset the decline in gold, and prices have recorded an advance of ⅛ to ¾ ₱ cent. in the entire list.

There is a growing disposition among capitalists to regard absolute security a greater object than a high rate of interest, and it is undoubtedly to this that the unusually large investment demand for Governments this year is due. Many institutions and investors last January put their money into railroad stocks which were then paying large dividends and were regarded as prime securities, but which have since ceased to pay anything and have greatly depreciated in value. It is, no doubt, the losses sustained by investors in these stocks which induced many this year to give Government bonds the preference. The steady appreciation in the latter affords, also, the best evidence of the confidence placed by our merchants and financiers in the administration of the finances of the country. In railway mortgages business was on a moderate scale, the demand being only fairly active. Some issues advanced sharply, notably the Missouri bonds, South Pacific being 3½ ₱ cent. higher, North Missouri firsts 1 ₱ cent., Pacific of Missouri firsts 1 ₱ cent., and do. seconds 1½ ₱ cent. Harlem and New-York Central firsts were firm, and a good inquiry prevailed for the Pacific issues. Among the weak mortgages were Milwaukee and St. Paul, La Cresse Division, and sinking fund bonds, New-Jersey Central, and Hannibal and St. Joseph convertibles. State bonds were quiet. Missouris and Tennessees were alternately weak and firm on narrow fluctuations. Louisiana consols advanced over 3 ₱ cent., selling up to 59½. There was an increased demand for District of Columbia 3.65s late in the week, and sales were made as high as 73@73¼.

The stock speculation during the week was irregular. Western Union, which was most actively dealt in, made a still further advance, rising to 76¾. The success which has attended the efforts of the pool in this stock to manipulate an advance, is, in view of the lack of support from the outside public and the steady reduction in rates resulting from the active competition of the rival line, something remarkable. The widest fluctuation of the week was in Illinois Central, which declined to 56¾, with a recovery of 1⅛ ₱ cent. at the close. The coal shares declined early in the week, but subsequently partially recovered. The St. Paul stocks were notably weak on the continued falling off in the earnings of the company. Among investment shares, New-York Central was strong, rising to 104¼.

GOSSIP OF THE WEEK.

THE ASSEMBLY IN THOROUGH WORKING ORDER—NEW MEMBERS WHO ARE BECOMING KNOWN—THE JUDICIARY COMMITTEE—IMPORTANT CITY LEGISLATION IN PROSPECT.

From Our Own Correspondent.

ALBANY, Saturday, Jan. 20, 1877.

The little asperities of temper invariably engendered by the appointment of the standing committees of the Legislature have by this time been almost wholly smoothed down; the Assembly is in good shape and tone, and thus far has given excellent promise for the session. It has begun to find out the men who can be relied upon to work, those who can talk only, the men who talk because they have something to say, and those who talk only to hear the music of their own voices. Another week or two will be required to perfect this necessary preliminary knowledge, but much progress has already been made. For instance, everybody now knows that Mr. Spinola is not, as he was expected to be, dangerous, but only silly; he is therefor not formidable, but annoying. Sometimes he becomes exasperating to his own party friends. Mr. Purdy, of Westchester, has shown that he can talk for an indefinite time without contributing a solitary idea to the common stock of information, or throwing one additional ray of light on the subject under discussion; also, that he will talk every time he gets a chance. He is therefore already set down as one of the "wind-bags" of the House. Mr. Grady, on the contrary, another new Democratic member and young man, has spoken two or three times, and displayed good sense, thorough information, ease in handling his facts, and liveliness in presenting them. Mr. Cozzens has also spoken, and made a favorable impression on the House; and Mr. Peter Mitchell is growing in the esteem of all. Mr. Cowdin, on the Republican side, is a gentleman who will carry considerable weight. Young Mr. Langbein appears determined to show that he came to work, and he has a special knowledge of the scope and working of some departments of the City Government which will be found valuable before the session is over. He will do well, however, to avoid excise bills. They are regarded with extreme distrust by the Republican country members. There are a number of these on the back rows who have not spoken yet, though they have seen service before. When they do get on their feet they make warm work. Mr. James E. Coulter, ex-Police Justice and one of the hangers-on of Tweed, comes to the front with his "strike" at the Elevated Railroad. His bill has not the shadow of a chance of passing, but it is quite in the fitness of things that he should have introduced it.

At the close of the session yesterday, the total number of bills introduced in the Assembly was 157; of these, 32 related to New-York. Some half a dozen or more were relief bills, for the several clerks of the District Courts, as already mentioned in THE TIMES; but all have now been embodied in a general bill by the Judiciary Committee, and in that shape reported to the House. A condition precedent to the passage of this bill, or that introduced by Mr. Strahan, empowering the Judges to appoint their own clerks, should be a liberal reduction of the salary of these officials. It is nothing but criminal extravagance to pay $3,000 a year for the duties they have to perform. Most significant of the rashly different scale on which the State and the City pay their employes is the proposition made to pay the new Assistant Superintendents of Public Works, who must be competent engineers, and will have much hard and difficult work to do, an annual salary of $2,500. For court Clerks, whose night duties require little if any previous training, and who work, on an average, about 24 hours a week, the City is made to pay $3,000 per year. Of course these clerkships are simply "soft places" for ward politicians. The Salary bill, which failed last year, and has been introduced this year by Mr. Langbein, cuts off the extravagances referred to, as well as all others of a similar kind. The progress of this bill will be watched with close attention. It must be patent to every one that the time has gone by when it could be safely smothered. This process, however, may very properly be applied to the annually recurring armory claim bills, of which two are already in the Legislature—one in either house. The Assembly bill is almost impudent in its demands.

The number of bills passed up to date is seven, all of them insignificant. Nineteen bills are on the general order calendar. The various committees are getting a good share of work before them, but the mass of it has fallen to the Judiciary, Cities, and Ways and Means. A good word may justly be said of the former. This committee has determined that it will stop, as far as it may, that endless tinkering with the statutes which has been a yearly growing evil. Every Legislature is deluged with bills to amend, repeal, re-enact, or otherwise tinker the statute book. The Judiciary Committee of the last House, of which Mr. Strahan was Chairman, as he is of the present, killed these bills by the dozen, and with the very satisfactory effect of considerably reducing the year's statute book from its accustomed bulky dimensions. The same sensible severity will be exercised this session, and the committee have already reported adversely on a number of bills sent to them, all of which reports the House has promptly agreed with. It is simple justice to members who introduce these frivolous bills to explain that they often do so against their own judgment, and only to oblige some pertinacious constituent, who thinks it his mission to supply long-felt want or correct some grave defect (wholly imaginary) in the existing law.

An important bill will be introduced into the Legislature next week. Many of its features are substantially the same as those in what was known as the Woodin charter, which caused so much excitement among Democratic politicians a year ago. The present bill is well calculated to disturb the equanimity of the Tammany "powers that be," because, among other things, it provides for the election of a Controller and Corporation Counsel by the people, the abolition of the office of Collection of Arrears of Personal Taxes, and prohibits any officer or employe of the City Government from acting as a Referee or Receiver in any case before the courts. The following is a synopsis of the bill:

Section 1 vests in the Common Council the legislative power of the City. Section 2 provides that it shall require a three-fourths vote to pass a measure over the Mayor's veto. Section 3 requires a four-fifths vote of the Common Council to pass resolutions, &c., involving expenditures of money. Section 4 provides that no ordinance shall be passed by the Common Council for public improvements unless the owners of at least one-fourth of the front feet on the line of the improvement shall have petitioned for the same. When no assessment for the improvement can be imposed, the ordinance shall not be passed unless the head of the department who has charge of the matter says that the work is necessary. Section 5 provides that expenditures for public improvements for which assessments may be imposed, shall be limited to $1,000,000 a year, until the indebtedness of the City on account of works payable from assessments are reduced by the collection of assessments to $8,000,000. After such reduction no work is to be authorized which would increase the debt of the City beyond the maximum sum of $8,000,000. All work is to be completed by contract.

Section 6 authorizes the Controller to issue consolidated stock to pay assessments made upon property belonging to the City, at not less than its par value; also for the amount or cost of street improvements chargeable under special laws to this City; also for the amount of deficiencies in assessments arising under existing laws, from the insufficiency of the value of property benefited by certain street improvements to bear an assessment for the costs thereof. Section 7 limits the amount to be raised on bonds for the execution of work for which no assessment can be imposed to $1,000,000 annually. One-half the bonds may be issued in sums varying from $100 to $500 each. Section 8 provides that all work shall be done by contract, the terms of which shall be approved by the Corporation Counsel. Section 9 requires heads of departments to open the bids publicly. Section 10 declares that the work shall be given to the lowest bidder, or, if it should be for the public interest, to reject it. The reasons for its rejection are to be furnished to the Controller. If the latter declines to concur with the reasons given, the contract is to be awarded to the lowest bidder. Sections 11 to 19 inclusive provide that the Controller shall certify the amount of the appropriation for such works; that no appropriation shall be made by the Board of Apportionment for work in excess of the amounts authorized by law; that no extra work shall be authorized by any contract; that the City shall not be liable on any contract beyond the amount of the appropriation for the same; that any person who certifies to the performance of work that has not been done shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor; that inspectors of work shall have had at least three years' practical experience of the kind of work they are appointed to superintend; that any head of a department who knowingly appoints a person not qualified for this office shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor; that inspectors shall be in daily attendance, except when absent from sickness or other sufficient cause, and that all assessments for work shall be made by the Board of Assessors on the certificate of the head of the department charged with its execution. Contractors are to be charged 7 per cent. interest on advances made by the City on account of the work.

Section 20 authorizes the Board of Revision and Correction of Assessments to require contractors to perform all the obligations of their contracts before confirming assessments for the work. It also declares that no proceeding to vacate any assessment which shall hereafter be made shall be commenced after the expiration of four months after such assessment has been confirmed; and no petition to vacate any such assessment which has heretofore been confirmed shall be commenced after the expiration of two months from the passage of this act. No assessment against any property shall exceed one-half of its assessed valuation.

The twenty-first and twenty-second sections continue the Board of Street Opening and Improvement, and declare that in all proceedings for opening or widening streets or avenues, any Judge of the Supreme Court of this district may appoint "three discreet, disinterested, and competent persons, being citizens of the United States, and freeholders in the City of New-York, and not being in the employ of the City of New-York, or of any of the departments thereof, as Commissioners of Estimate and Assessment to perform the duties in that behalf." The compensation of the Commissioners is not to exceed $3,000 a year each. They are not to serve in any proceeding where they have an interest in land affected by their action. The opening, &c., of one or more streets, avenues, squares, parks, or places, may be included in a single proceeding; the expenses of clerk-hire and assistants are not to exceed $15,000 a year, and the rent of an office not to exceed $1,000 a year.

Sections 23 to 25 inclusive continue the sinking fund of this City, and provide that any excess in the fund, after providing for the payment of bonds payable therefrom, shall be applied to the payment of the bonds and stocks of the City payable from taxation, except revenue bonds, whenever the Commissioners of the sinking fund shall deem it advisable to do so; that the funds and revenues of the City pledged to the sinking fund for the redemption of the City debt shall be accumulated and applied only to the purposes of the said sinking fund until all the debt is fully paid. Sections 26 and 27 declare that no official or employe of the City shall after July 31, 1877, be paid his salary from the proceeds of City bonds, and no rents for public offices shall be paid from the same source after that date, and that no claim of any character or for any purpose not payable from the proceeds of bonds shall form a charge against the City if it be in excess of the annual appropriation made therefor; that no judgment or verdict against the City for any sum, when no appropriation has been made, or where a liability is incurred in excess of the amount appropriated, shall be paid, except upon proof that when the claim was incurred there was an appropriation to meet it. Section 28 authorizes the Mayor or Controller to require any claimant to be sworn before him and answer touching his claim. Section 29 prohibits any reference to hear and decide the whole issue in suits against the City. Referees, however, may be appointed to take testimony for the information of the court. It also provides that "no clerk, attorney, or other person in the employ of the City of New-York shall be appointed Receiver or Referee in any proceeding brought in any of the courts of this State."

Sections 30 to 32 inclusive, declare, among other provisions, that all balances of appropriations made for 1875 and previous years shall lapse into the City Treasury, and that balances for years subsequent to 1875, which shall remain unexpended at the end of two years after the one for which such appropriations were made, except such amounts as may be necessary to pay claims to which they were appropriated, shall also lapse into the City Treasury, and that the sinking fund for the payment of interest on the City debt, after providing for paying interest on City stocks and bonds payable therefrom, may be used for the payment of interest on the stocks and bonds payable from taxation. That the estimated surplus of the sinking fund, and the estimated revenues of the general fund, shall be deducted by the Board of Apportionment from the final estimates of the amount to be raised by taxation in each year.

Section 33 declares that no person who is not a citizen of the State shall be eligible to appointment in any office or position under the City Government, whether legislative, executive, or judicial. Section 34 provides that in case of judgments against the City a transcript thereof shall be filed with the Controller. Section 35 authorizes the Mayor and Controller by a concurrent vote to designate five banks in which to deposit the public moneys. No bank is to be designated unless it agrees to pay interest on daily balances at the rate of not less than 2½ per cent. per annum. Such interest is to be accounted for monthly to the Controller and paid into the sinking fund. A chief bank of deposit is to be designated by the Mayor and Controller, and all moneys heretofore paid to the Chamberlain shall be deposited therein. This bank is to pay all warrants drawn upon the Treasury.

Sections 36 and 37 relate to the payment of the quota of the State taxes by the Controller to the State Treasurer, this duty to be performed without compensation, and also to the investment of moneys of the sinking fund. Section 38 appoints the Receiver of Taxes to act as attorney for the Collection of Arrears of Personal Taxes, without additional compensation. Section 39 authorizes the Receiver of Taxes to appoint a Marshal for their collection. Section 40 abolishes the office of Commission of Accounts. Section 41 transfers the Bureau of Licenses to the Finance Department, and creates an officer to be known as Register of Licenses. Section 42 transfers the Dock Department to the Department of Public Works, and terminates the office of the present Dock Commissioner. Section 43 merges the Department of Buildings into the Fire Department. The term of office of the last appointed Fire Commissioners is to terminate upon the passage of the act, and the President of the Fire Department is to appoint a Chief of the Building Bureau.

Section 44 declares that the Police Department shall have a board consisting of two Police Commissioners, who shall, except those first appointed, hold their office for two years, unless sooner removed; but those first appointed shall hold office until Jan. 1, 1879. The term of office of the present Police Commissioners is to cease 10 days after the passage of the act, and the Mayor is to appoint the new Commissioners, both of whom shall not be members of the same political party.

Section 45 provides that the Board of Police shall transfer to the Board of Health all property belonging to the Street-cleaning Bureau, and that the Board of Health shall reorganize and make such changes in the administration of the Bureau as they may deem best. Sections 46, 47, and 48, inclusive, legislate the present Commissioners of Charities out of office, and authorizes the Mayor to appoint one Commissioner to perform the duties of the office. This Commissioner is to hold office until the second Tuesday in January, 1879, and his successor to hold office for two years from that date. Sections 49 and 50 terminate the office of Commissioner of Parks, and vests their power in one Commissioner, to be appointed by the Mayor and to hold office until the second Tuesday in January, 1879, his successor to be appointed for two years from that date. Section 51 provides that the Mayor, the Controller, and the President of the Chamber of Commerce shall constitute a Board of Estimate and Apportionment, which shall be vested with all the powers of the present board.

Sections 52 to 54, inclusive, ordain that at the annual election in November next there shall be elected a Controller and a Counsel to the Corporation of this City; that they shall hold their respective offices for four years from the 1st of January after said election, on which day they shall enter upon the discharge of their duties; that either of said officers may be removed by the Governor for cause in the manner now provided for in the case of Sheriffs; that if either of said offices become vacant by death or otherwise it shall be filled temporarily by the appointment thereto of some person by the Mayor, to hold his office until the 1st day of January succeeding the next general election thereafter held in the City, at which election a person to fill said office so temporarily filled by an appointment shall be elected, who shall enter upon the duties of his office on the 1st of January thereafter.

Section 55 declares that all taxes confirmed prior to Jan. 1, 1877, "and which at the time of the passage of this act" have been returned to the Clerk of Arrears for collection, may be paid in three equal installments, as follows: The first on or before Dec. 31, 1877; the second on or before Dec. 31, 1878, and the third on or before Dec. 31, 1879, with interest at the rate of 8 per cent. per annum. Persons have the option of paying the whole of their taxes in one payment if they so desire. Sections 56 and 57 declare that no lien shall be enforced by the City if taxes are paid as provided by the previous section, and that upon a failure to pay them as provided the privileges of the statute thus conferred shall be forfeited.

LOCAL MISCELLANY.

A PIOUS SWINDLER.

A REMARKABLE YOUNG MAN WHO "RAISED" TREASURY NOTES—HE CLAIMS TO BE A WRITER FOR RELIGIOUS PAPERS, A METHODIST IN RELIGION, AND THE AUTHOR OF SERMONS FOR A CONVERTED JEW—SOMETHING ABOUT HIS PAST RECORD.

James L. Manker, the young man arrested by Capt. Leavy, of the Third Brooklyn Precinct, on Saturday night, while attempting to pass a two-dollar United States Treasury note altered to a ten on Bernard Frevert, a confectioner at No. 316 Court street, was confined in the Third Precinct Station-house yesterday, and is to be taken before Justice Ferry this morning, and sent before United States Commissioner Winslow for examination. He positively denied that he had passed a similar note on C. Mollenhagen, a baker, at No. 197 Atlantic avenue, on the 6th inst., although Miss Transon, Mollenhagen's niece, positively identified him as the man. Mrs. Alexandrina Van Vlak, at whose house Manker had boarded, and where, in his room, the implements for altering notes were found, said yesterday that Manker was a regular attendant at either the Pacific or Fleet Street Methodist Church, and professed to be a devout Methodist; that he used to write sermons for M. L. Rossvally, a converted Jew, and publisher of a weekly paper called the Hebrew Evangelist and Converted Jew, and that he never went out at night because, as he said, there were "so many wicked people in the streets," but would sit at home with her and read to her his sermons and religious articles which he had written, which was a labor of love, for she was very deaf, and he would have to strain his voice to make her hear. Manker, on being questioned yesterday, said that he was a Methodist, and that he came from Sydney, Iowa, where his father was a Methodist minister. On being asked where he got the stencil plates and other materials used to alter notes, he said that they dropped from a parcel of tracts that Rossvally had brought to his room, and that he had put them aside, not knowing their purpose. After evading the question for some time as to how he came into possession of the note he attempted to pass at Mr. Frevert's, he finally said that he got it from Rossvally. He said that Rossvally's paper had only about 200 subscribers, but had a good advertising income, and that Rossvally agreed to give him $10 a week for writing for the paper, and to increase his salary to $25 when business improved. In addition to writing for Rossvally's paper he wrote for the Methodist and the Evening Mail in New-York. Manker contradicted himself frequently, answered questions in a very evasive manner, and was extremely nervous. Two young men who had heard of Manker's arrest came to the station-house and identified him as a fellow-student at Exeter Academy who had stolen property of the students, which was found in his trunk, and that when his trunk was searched articles for altering notes, like those found in Manker's room in Henry street, were discovered.

A CLOTHING CLERK'S SUICIDE.

A YOUNG MAN SHOOTS HIMSELF IN BED—THE MOTIVE FOR THE DEED A MYSTERY.

William H. Lynch, aged 24, who was employed as a clerk in the clothing store of S. L. Petit & Co., Nos. 70 and 72 Bowery, committed suicide yesterday morning by shooting himself in the breast with a revolver. The deceased was the only support of his widowed mother, who resides in Tremont. During the past few days he had appeared depressed in spirits, but from what cause could not be ascertained. He told his fellow clerks, Frank Wills and George C. Rushmore, that he was tired of living, but gave them no reason for his despondency. He was in the store on Saturday until 7 o'clock in the evening, when he went out to get supper, and returned at 9 o'clock, remaining until the store was closed, when he went to bed in a room in the rear of the store, where Wills and Rushmore also slept. His room-mates heard a slight noise early in the morning, but paid little or no attention to it. Shortly after 7 o'clock the noise was again heard, and his room-mates got up, and on attempting to rouse Lynch discovered that he was dead. He was lying in bed covered with blankets. On turning down the coverings they found the bed saturated with blood, which had flowed from a pistol-shot wound in his left breast. The revolver with which the wound was inflicted was still in the dead man's right hand. It was evident that Lynch had placed the muzzle of the pistol to his breast and covered himself with the blankets to deaden the sound of the shot which ended his existence. The bullet passed through his heart, causing almost instant death. Coroner Woltman held an inquest, at which the above facts were testified to. The Coroner was entirely unsuccessful in his endeavors to discover the motives which prompted Lynch to take his life. He had been in the employ of Petit & Co. for nearly two years, during which time his conduct was good. He was sober, steady, and industrious, and his employers had no fault to find with him. He was singularly reticent in his manner and refrained from making a confident of any of his business associates, and very little is therefore known as to his antecedents or domestic relations.

THE BALL SEASON.

Following are some of the more important balls and receptions which have been announced to take place within the next few weeks:

The New-York Caledonian Club will hold its nineteenth annual reception at Ferrero's Assembly Rooms, in Fourteenth street, on Thursday evening.

The twelfth annual ball of the Cercle Francais de l'Harmonie will take place at the Academy of Music this evening.

The annual ball of the Benevolent and Protective Order of Elks will be held at Irving Hall on Thursday evening, Feb. 8.

Company E, Twenty-second Regiment, will hold a reception at the Lexington Avenue Opera-house this evening.

Company K, Seventy-first Regiment, will hold its annual reception at the regimental armory, corner of Broadway and Thirty-fifth street, next Wednesday evening.

The Francais de l'Opera will give a fancy dress ball at Irving Hall this evening.

A "grand charity" ball will be given at Terrace Garden, in East Fifty-eighth street, on Tuesday evening, Jan. 30. The proceeds of the entertainment will be devoted to the benefit of the poor of the Thirteenth Ward.

The united Swiss benevolent societies of this City and vicinity will give a charity ball at the Teutonia Assembly Rooms, No. 154 Third avenue, to-morrow evening.

The New-York Masquerade Club will hold its eighteenth reception at Ferrero's Assembly Rooms next Wednesday evening.

A complimentary ball will be given by Koltes Post, No. 32, Grand Army of the Republic, at the Germania Assembly Rooms, No. 291 Bowery, next Wednesday evening.

The thirty-ninth annual charity ball of the Emerald Benevolent Association will take place on Wednesday evening, in the Brooklyn Academy of Music. The Academy is to be artistically decorated with flowers, and a magnificent fountain will fill the air with perfumes. The ball is for the benefit of the Orphan Asylum.

FUNERAL OF JOHN P. SCHERMERHORN.

The funeral of the late John P. Schermerhorn, Jr., took place at the house of his father-in-law, Mr. John Jacobus, No. 70 St. Mark's place, yesterday afternoon. Large delegations from the Veterans of the National Guard, Seventh Regiment, Knickerbocker Lodge, No. 642, F. and A. M., and Chapter No. 215 of the R. A. Masons were in attendance. The Episcopal funeral services were performed at the house by Rev. Dr. Rylance, of St. Mark's Episcopal Church, and at the vault Masonic rites were performed by William R. Payne, Master of Chapter No. 215, Royal Arch Masons. The floral offerings were numerous, the most noticeable being a crown surmounted by a cross resting on a base of calla lilies; also, a pillow of immortelles bearing the inscription, "Rest," in violets. On the lid of the rosewood casket was a silver plate bearing Masonic emblems and the inscription, "John P. Schermerhorn, born Dec. 1, 1840, died Jan. 18, 1877." After the services at the house an opportunity was afforded the friends of the deceased to view the remains, after which the casket was enveloped in a black velvet pall and borne to the vault by the following gentlemen: J. H. Kemp, J. F. Freeman, W. H. Smith, J. D. Cameron, G. L. McLean, L. J. Sherman, P. A. Crafford, G. Colgin, C. Johnson, C. A. Miller, G. Resiyea, and C. H. Housley.

SEEKING TO NULLIFY A WILL.

William A. Virtue, a publisher and bookseller, died in August, 1875, leaving a fortune estimated at $200,000. He bequeathed the 99 years' lease of premises No. 12 Dey street, supposed to be worth $75,000, in consideration of one cent, to a Miss Helen Ballou, who was formerly an actress. The administrators of the estate will bring suit to-day before Judge Donohue, in the Supreme Court, to set aside this and other transfers of property made by the deceased to Miss Ballou, on the ground that they were procured by fraud, and while he was in an enfeebled state of mind. Gen. Funk is also made a party to the suit, as it is alleged he induced Virtue to purchase of him his leases of Irving Hall and an adjacent building at the exorbitant price of $6,500.

ANOTHER ROBBERY IN ASTORIA.

As Mrs. Charles Lambert, of Astoria, was about to lock up the house on Saturday night she heard a rap at the front door, and supposing that her husband was there, she went to let him in. The moment she opened the door a strange man rushed into the hallway, knocked her down, and after beating her until she became insensible, proceeded to ransack the house. When she recovered her senses, she found that the desperado had disappeared, and with him about $20 in money.

TALMAGE TALKS TO LAWYERS.

THEIR TRIALS AND TEMPTATIONS—HOW TO AVOID THEM.

At the Brooklyn Tabernacle yesterday, Rev. T. De Witt Talmage preached the third of his series of sermons to the different professions. His discourse was addressed to the members of the legal profession, and he preached from one of his characteristic texts, taken from Paul's Epistle to Titus, iii., 13: "Bring Zenas, the lawyer." Everyone, he said, admired the heroic and rigorous side of Paul's nature. Sometimes, however, they caught a glimpse of the genial side of his nature, and one of these occasions was given in the text when the Apostle wrote to Titus to "Bring Zenas the lawyer." Paul, according to Mr. Talmage, had a very warm attachment for Zenas, whom he had perhaps met on the trial of some great case in the courts. There was no profession, the preacher said, that needed God more than the legal profession. There were in it both good and bad men, and among the mightiest pleas that had ever been made by the tongue of a barrister were those made in behalf of Christianity. Yet, notwithstanding these pleas in the cause of Christ, there was a feeling against the profession which it was well nigh impossible to understand. The famous Dr. Johnson, said Mr. Talmage, once wrote an epitaph for one of them as follows:

"God works wonders now and then.
Here lies a lawyer, an honest man."

This prejudice against the profession had been transmitted from generation to generation, and he accounted for it by the fact that they make men pay debts they do not want to pay and they arraign criminals who want to escape punishment. He had known many of them for a great many years, and had yet to find a more genial and honest-hearted set of men. If I was on trial," said Mr. Talmage, "for my integrity or my life, I would rather have my case submitted to a jury of 12 lawyers than clergymen." And this, he explained, was because he was of the opinion that the men of the legal profession had more sense of justice than those of the sacred college. No other profession more needed the grace of God to keep them safely through the world and sustain them in their trials and temptations. While he would ask his auditors to bring the merchants, the mechanics, and the men of every other class to God, he would address them, then, in the words of his text, "Bring Zenas, the lawyer." It had been said by Lord Brougham that the lawyer should know, in the words of the world—his client—and on the other side it had been said they must never plead the case of a bad man. How were the men of the legal profession to decide what course they should pursue in this grave matter? God alone could help them. They must be appellants to that Court of Chancery, and they would get an answer in an hour. They would doubtless ask, as was the custom of their profession, for the citation of authorities on this point. He would cite them from the Holy Scriptures, and he read the passage beginning, "If any man lack wisdom, let him ask it of God, who giveth liberally," &c. Speaking of the trials to which lawyers are exposed, he said it was no easy thing to urge a settlement upon, by encouraging litigation, they could get large remuneration. Every attorney needed the sustaining power of the old-fashioned religion of Jesus Christ. They were subjected to many kinds of temptation, principal among them being skepticism. He would request them to give up asking questions about religion and believe in it.

Next Sunday Mr. Talmage will preach to the medical profession.

AN ALLEGED GANG OF BURGLARS.

Philip Smith, aged 17, who has no residence; Frank Flynn, aged 21, of No. 250 Spencer street, Brooklyn; Joseph McCarthy, aged 18, of No. 180 Steuben street; John Robinson, aged 17, of No. — Schenck street; John Burns, aged 19, of No. 71 Grand avenue; Nicholas Dolan, aged 18, of Grand and Park avenues, and Thomas Miles, aged 16, of No. 199 Water street, were arrested late on Saturday night, by detective Price and a section of men from the Fourth Precinct, in a liquor saloon kept by Mrs. Finerty, in Jackson Hollow, Brooklyn, in which were found secreted 3 boxes of cigars, 9 silver teaspoons, 4 silver-plated tablespoons, 2 silver-plated butter-knives, 1 silver-plated fork, 1 cut-glass "Bourbon" decanter, 7 billiard balls, a brass faucet, and a dark lantern. Of this property, one box of cigars, the faucet, and the billiard balls have been identified by Frank Eckert, of No. 496 Myrtle avenue, whose saloon was robbed on the 7th inst. Among the articles not identified are a silver teaspoon marked "E. S." two silver teaspoons marked "C." and one silver-plated tablespoon marked "N. C. G." The gang were held for examination.

FATAL BOILER EXPLOSION.

A boiler exploded in the Glen Cove starch factory, at Glen Cove, Long Island, at 12:15 P. M., on Saturday, resulting in the instant death of two persons, and the wounding of four others. Fortunately, when the explosion took place, nearly all the men in the factory had gone to dinner, or the loss of life would doubtless have been much greater. The explosion occurred in what is known as the sugar department, which was made a perfect wreck, the roof being blown off, and the rest of the structure badly shattered. The two persons killed were Dr. Oscar Wiele, a chemist, and his assistant, Adolph Grimm. The former was blown about 100 feet from the place. The injured are, Henry Kesk, who was badly scalded on the face and body, and whose injuries may result fatally; Jacob Kief, a factory boy, slightly scalded; and George Crane, the office boy, struck on the head with a brick. Mrs. Evans, who was coming to the factory with her husband's dinner, was also injured on the head by a flying brick. One of the proprietors, Mr. Edgar Duryea, was in the works talking with Dr. Wiele only a few minutes before the explosion. The damage to the factory is estimated at $20,000. The building will be repaired without delay.

RAID ON A DISREPUTABLE SALOON.

Sergt. Randall, of the Eighth Precinct, with a posse of Police, made a raid last night on the premises No. 51 Thompson street, in which is situated a vile den frequented by whites and blacks of the most degraded character. The raid was made because the Excise law was violated in the place, liquor being sold on Sunday. The Police captured four white men 16 colored men, and nine colored women, who were found carousing. Thomas Ballantyne, a white man, the proprietor of the vile resort, was absent when the Police paid their visit, and thus escaped arrest. His barkeeper, James E. Woodruff, was, however, arrested and locked up. Ballantyne is a notorious character, and is now under bail for making an outrageous assault upon Oscar Taylor, a negro habitué of his establishment. He cut the negro on the head on the 15th inst., inflicting five severe scalp wounds. He was arrested, but admitted to bail in the sum of $300. The negro was taken to Bellevue Hospital, where he still remains. His condition is very critical, erysipelas having set in, and it is feared that his injuries will prove fatal.

MME. LUCCA'S DIVORCE SUIT.

Maria Pauline Lucca, the celebrated cantatrice, obtained a decree of divorce in this City last June from her husband, Baron Adolph Von Rhade. Ten days after obtaining the decree she married Baron Von Wallhoffen. Subsequently, the General Term adjudged the decree to be irregular, and the plaintiff was notified to appear and defend the action in which it was obtained. This litigation was an expensive one to Mme. Lucca. The matter comes up to-day in Supreme Court, General Term, for hearing on appeal. The argument will be upon an appeal in a suit brought against Messrs. Newcombe & Lerenbrieth, her lawyers, in which she charges them with having "managed said action against said Von Rhade in an unskillful manner, and with inexcusable negligence, in consequence of which the judgment of divorce obtained by them has been adjudged by the General Term as irregular." She claims $10,000 damages, together with the costs of the action.

THE OUTRAGE AT SOURLAND MOUNTAIN.

Mrs. Ida Shepherd, the young woman who was tarred and feathered near her home at Sourland Mountain, New-Jersey, last Wednesday night, the particulars of which were published in Saturday's TIMES, is reported to be in a precarious condition from the shock to her nerves while undergoing the brutal outrage. Seven men have been arrested on suspicion, and it is alleged that the proof of their guilt is conclusive. Their names are Isaac Peak, Richard Van Liew, the two brothers Docherty, John Corbett, Alfred Cray, and Charles Huff. The last mentioned three were taken before a magistrate, who committed them to Somerville Prison, in default of $1,000 bail, to await the action of the Grand Jury.

THE QUESTION OF THE HOUR

DEBATING THE COMPROMISE BILL IN THE SENATE.

POWERFUL SPEECH BY SENATOR MORTON, OF INDIANA—HIS FORCIBLE OPPOSITION TO AN UNCONSTITUTIONAL MEASURE—RUTHERFORD B. HAYES DECLARED LEGALLY AND HONESTLY ELECTED—SPEECH BY SENATOR FRELINGHUYSEN—SENATOR EDMUNDS' ATTEMPT TO APPLY THE GAG.

Special Dispatch to the New-York Times.

WASHINGTON, Jan. 22.—The scene in the Senate to-day at the conclusion of the morning hour was an extraordinary one. Every seat in the galleries was occupied, and hundreds of persons unable to obtain seats were standing. Sir Edward Thornton, the English Minister, occupied a conspicuous place in the Diplomatic Gallery, and on the floor were seated Gen. Sherman, Gen. Garfield, S. S. Cox, Col. Robert G. Ingersoll, and many members of the lower House. They were all present to listen to the debate on the Compromise bill for counting the Electoral vote. Mr. Frelinghuysen was entitled to the floor, but as he was not present, it was accorded to Mr. Morton, who was pale, weak, and evidently in great pain, but who nevertheless signified his desire to be heard in opposition to the measure. He spoke for nearly an hour, sitting in his chair during the time, and made one of the clearest and most forcible arguments that has ever been listened to in the Senate. He commenced amid an unusual silence, and was listened to with close attention to the end. There could be no doubt, he said, that there was great uneasiness in the public mind to have the Presidential question settled. Other Senators went further than this, and believed that the country was threatened with violence and disorder if a settlement was not speedily had. He did not believe that such would be the case. Indeed, he was sure that the report that there was such a public feeling came from Democratic sources, and was circulated for a purpose. It was circulated for the purpose of intimidating Republicans, and preventing the representatives of the people from doing their duty as their reason and their judgment directed. The shadow of the Mississippi plan had entered the Senate chamber, and the so-called Compromise bill was the result of its appearance. This declaration created a marked impression upon the Senate, and caused a flutter of excitement and some applause in the galleries.

Then the Senator continued, and for a few moments his intense feeling and the depth of his conviction made him forget his pain and weakness. The power of his mind rose above the infirmities of his body. He became truly eloquent. His voice rose high and sonorous above the whispered comments of his associates. There was no use mincing matters, he said. Rutherford B. Hayes was elected President of the United States. He had been legally, fairly, honestly elected, and he should be inaugurated after the Electoral vote had been counted by the President of the Senate, as it had been counted since the foundation of the Government. To talk compromise was to talk in opposition to the letter and spirit of the Constitution; for the moment Congress, or any power created by Congress, attempted to go behind the return made by a legally-constituted Board of Electors acting according to State laws, that moment the action of Congress became revolutionary. The Constitution said nothing about Congress counting the Electoral vote, and if the President of the Senate had no right to count that vote, then for 82 years the Chief Magistrate of this country had been counted in without warrant of law. Regarding the objects of the joint committee in appointing four Justices of the Supreme Court on the commission to count the votes, and allowing these four to select a fifth, Mr. Morton went more into detail than did Mr. Edmunds in his speech Saturday. He said that the four Justices had been selected, not according to a geographical division, as had been stated, but because of their political antecedents and the political faith which they were now supposed to hold. This was all wrong. The Justices of the Supreme Court should be kept free from all political discussions, and it was an insult to them to assume that political opinion, feeling, or bias could enter into their consideration of any case submitted to them. No matter what tribunal, or court, or person should finally count the vote, it would be unlawful for that person or body to attempt to judge or decide as to the elegibility of the Electors, or to ask whether they were duly elected or appointed. It would only be legal and constitutional for the person or body so counting to discover if the Electors were duly and lawfully certified. Were their certificates correct and in proper form properly issued? that was the question and the only one. He noticed that the Democrats were generally in favor of the bill under discussion. They were so because they saw in it their only hope of counting Mr. Tilden into a seat which another man was entitled to.

At this point the Senator became so exhausted that he was obliged to stop speaking. It is expected that he will finish his address to-morrow. When he concluded to-day the proceedings were interrupted to administer the oath of office to Senator Blaine, who appeared in the chamber for the first time since his election by the Legislature. When the oath had been administered he immediately took his seat, which had been previously decorated with flowers, and then the debate proceeded.

Mr. Frelinghuysen was the next speaker. He delivered a carefully-prepared address, similar in tone to that made by Mr. Edmunds yesterday. Its most noticeable feature, or at least the one which attracted the most attention, was a reference to the Oregon matter. Regarding the Democratic trick in that State, he said that if by that cheat the Democratic candidate for the Presidency was to be counted in, then he would have to be so returned; but if he did succeed in that way, the Republican Party, after his term, would control the country for generations. Relative to this part of the Senator's speech Col. Bob Ingersoll was heard to remark: "The gentleman don't know how well them Democrats stick." At the close of Mr. Frelinghuysen's speech, Mr. Mitchell, of Oregon, moved to adjourn. This was lost. Then Mr. Sherman moved that the Senate go into executive session. Upon this Mr. Edmunds took the floor and stated that he hoped the motion would be withdrawn and the debate go on. He was exceedingly anxious that the bill should be acted upon, and he would be obliged to call for a vote on it to-morrow. Mr. Sherman objected strongly to this, saying that he wished to examine the bill more fully and intended to speak upon it, but was not yet prepared. He believed the subject to be the most important one which had ever come before the Senate, and he could see no reason for the undue haste which was proposed. According to the time-honored usages of the Senate, this appeal, and the statement of the Senator from Ohio that he desired time to prepare a speech, should have sent the bill over for another day; but Mr. Edmunds, forgetting the many courtesies of the same kind which he has received, persisted in his demand that the debate go on, and again declared that, having charge of the bill, he would to-morrow call for a final vote.

Messrs. Thurman and Bayard followed in favor of the bill, and in support of the position taken by Mr. Edmunds. Mr. Sherman then renewed his motion to go into executive session. This was again lost, and the bill was about to be read a third time, after which it would be impossible to amend it. Senator Sherman protested against this, as did also Senator Morton. Senator Cameron, of Pennsylvania, obtained the floor, and created a sensation by declaring that he wanted more light on the bill before he could vote for it. As far as he knew now, it was a Democratic measure, and he could not give it his support. He was an old man, he continued, and he spoke his mind fully. He thought that when four of the ablest Republican Senators had gone into the Joint Committee they would have produced some plan which would have given their party some kind of a chance, but he now found three of them voting for what he considered a Democratic scheme to seat the Democratic candidate. In conclusion, he strongly denounced the proposition to make the Justices of the Supreme Court Judges of the election, saying, amid loud laughter, that the moment they become partisans they become office-seekers, and that when the Presidential question was decided they would be hanging about the White House and the Departments looking for places for their sons and their nephews and cousins. This ended the debate, and the bill went over until to-morrow.

SENATOR MORTON'S SPEECH.

Mr. Morton addressed the Senate as follows:

MR. PRESIDENT: As the member of the committee who did not agree to this bill I have thought it proper that I should make a brief statement of the grounds on which I did not concur with my colleagues, but I am not well this morning and am unable to speak as I should desire; still, as the bill is about to come to a vote, apparently, I will very briefly state the reasons why I could not give my assent to its being reported. This bill is presented for the consideration of Congress under very peculiar circumstances. The Congress of the United States is scarcely left free for its consideration. We are aware that there is great uneasiness in the public mind throughout the country. Apprehensions are entertained of violence—of revolutionary action on the part of the House of Representatives—of some course being taken that may result in disturbing the peace of the country. A member of Congress has said in a speech in this city, that 100,000 men would be here on the 14th of February to witness the counting of the votes. That may be regarded as an extravagant utterance, but it is one of very many of the kind that come up to us from different parts of the country, so that the business interests of the country have become alarmed, and there is a disposition to take almost any measure that may be proposed that will give assurance of peace, without very much regard to the character of the measure. I do not think I am at all out of the way when I say that this bill is a literal product of "the Mississippi plan;" that the shadow of intimidation has entered this chamber, and that in proposing this bill, and in consideration of it, the members of the Senate and of the House are acting under the apprehension of violence—of some great revolutionary act that will threaten the safety and continuance of our institutions. I do not myself believe in the reality of this danger. I believe that this sort of talk is intended for a purpose, and very much fear that it will accomplish that purpose. The real danger that we are in results from not daring to stand up to do our whole duty as we understand it. It is said by geologists that there was a period in the history of the earth's crust when there were skulless vertebrates, and it would seem now that we have come to that period when there are vertebrates skulls. The thing to do is to do what is right, and to do it fearlessly. For one, I am not afraid that if this vote shall be counted as it was for the first 72 years in the history of our Government, there will be any revolution. I believe that any one who attempts it will be utterly destroyed. I regard this bill, Mr. President, as a compromise. It will take its place alongside of the compromise of 1820, and the compromise of 1850. By the compromise of 1820, all the territory south of latitude 36° 30′ was given over to slavery, and when the time came to settle the territory north of that line the compromise was destroyed. By the compromise of 1850 the institution of slavery got the immediate benefit of the Fugitive Slave law, which gave it such prestige, power, and confidence as made it aspire to the complete conquest of the country.

HAYES ELECTED ACCORDING TO LAW AND IN THE HEARTS OF THE PEOPLE.

I believe that Rutherford B. Hayes has been elected President of the United States. He has been elected under the forms of law and according to law, and he is elected in the hearts of the people. I believe that if he should be counted in as 18 Presidents were successively counted in from the beginning of the Government, he would be inaugurated, and there would be no violence and no revolution. There have been upon this question a great many loose opinions given, from time to time, on the first impression, without examination, and perhaps most Senators have indulged in them, so that very few can entirely claim to be consistent. I have indulged in them myself, but within the past few weeks this question has been presented as a case in hand, not simply as a matter of speculation—something to come in the future—and there has been a flood of light poured upon it such as had never been before. Many things have been said, and we have the counsel of the best legal minds all over the country. I brought forward a bill some two years ago, which was afterward reported by the Committee on Privileges and Elections, for the purpose of having a law for the counting of the Electoral vote. I did not claim that that bill was perfect. It was not, in view of any contingency or case. It however was, in one respect a safe bill, and that is leaving out of view who should count the vote, whether the President of the Senate or the two houses. It contained no word by which the two houses could be authorized to go behind the returns of a State to go behind the decision made by the Returning Officers of the State, appointed by the State for that purpose; and the bill of 1800, if I remember correctly, expressly provided that the two houses should not go behind the returns, so far as to count the votes for Electors. I am not an advocate for State sovereignty; I never have been; but I have been a consistent advocate of State rights, as I am now. The Constitution of the United States confers upon the States the power to appoint Electors in such way as the Legislatures of the States may prescribe. This is the absolute right of each State. The determination as to who have been appointed is left entirely to the State. Should Congress assume to determine who have been appointed, so far as to go behind the action of the officers of the State, appointed by the laws of the State for that purpose, Congress would absorb to itself the entire power; would become a grand Returning Board, without limit and without restraint. The very moment we undertake to go behind the determination of the officers of the State, as to the result of a State election, and to count and determine the result for ourselves, that moment we establish a revolution, which ultimately will be the end of Presidential elections. I am not now referring to the certificate of the Governor, which is prescribed not by State laws, but prescribed by act of Congress, but I am referring to that determination of the result of elections as prescribed by the laws of the States. The States have the right to appoint Electors. The Legislature has the right to prescribe the method; and the evidence as to the appointment, as to who have been appointed, is left to the States as absolutely and completely as the appointment itself.

SENATOR EDMUNDS' ARGUMENTS ANSWERED.

I listened to the very able speech of the Senator from Vermont [Mr. Edmunds] on Saturday last, with great interest. If I understood him correctly, he assumed that there was no provision of the Constitution that executes itself except one, and that is in regard to the recovery of fugitives from labor—fugitive slaves; that the rest of the provisions of the Constitution are not self-executing, but require legislation to carry them into operation. He made a distinction, I believe, which is correct, that there are two classes of powers conferred by the Constitution. Where a power is conferred directly upon any department of the Government by the Constitution, that power cannot be taken from that department—that power cannot be delegated; but where the Constitution simply imposes a duty, but does not vest any particular department with the performance of that duty, then Congress may by law determine who shall discharge that duty. If I understand the Senator aright, he took the ground that the counting of the votes was a duty imposed by the Constitution, but that the Constitution had not located it—had not said who should count it. He denied that the duty was imposed upon the President of the Senate. He said the President of the Senate was directed to open all the certificates, but he was not directed to count them. He was directed to open them, "and the votes shall then be counted." The power and duty to count was not located in the two houses. The Constitution did not say that, any more than it said the President of the Senate should count them. It said the votes should then be counted. Assuming for the sake of the argument his position to be true, that there is nothing in the Constitution, in any part of it, that indicates that the President of the Senate shall count the votes as well as open them; assuming it to be true that the Constitution simply imposes a duty to count the votes, but does not say by whom the duty shall be performed, and, therefore, that Congress is left free to impose the performance of that duty upon a commission and upon any person it sees proper to put in that situation, his position would be tenable. The Senator, in applying that to this case, made use of the following language:

> But as I have said, I only intended on this occasion to explain, in as brief a way as I could, exactly what the bill is and, in a general way, the grounds upon which its rests. The illustrations that might be still further made to show that this deciding power of which I am speaking does not rest with you, and, as I think, to show equally that it does not rest with either house of Congress until Congress provides a law that allows it to rest there, are so numerous that the whole day might be spent upon them.

The position of the Senator is that the Constitution created the duty to count the votes, but did not locate the power or duty anywhere, and that Congress, under the general power to pass all laws necessary and proper to carry into execution the powers given to any department or to the Government of the United States, may, by law, devolve that duty upon a commission or upon any person. If I do not state his position correctly I hope he will correct me.

MR. EDMUNDS—Mr. President, if the Senator wishes me to correct him now, he states a part of my position correctly; but he only states half of it. I will take the opportunity to correct him, so as not to disturb him afterward.

MR. MORTON—Well, Mr. President, I am stating the Senator's position correctly and fully as I understand it; and I understand this position of his to be necessary to another part of his argument, because, if the power to count the votes, which I believe he expressly disclaims, is lodged in the two houses by the Constitution, and is not a general power to be executed by law, then this power must be exercised by the two houses only, and cannot be delegated; whereas, if it is simply imposed to count the votes, then Congress may locate that duty wherever it sees proper by law. The position of the Senator is, that neither the President of the Senate is vested with this power, nor are the two houses of Congress; that neither can exercise it in the absence of a law passed for that purpose.

IMPORTANT PRECEDENTS CITED.

And this bring us, then, to a very great fact, which is, that for 84 years Presidents were counted in and inaugurated without any authority in point of law by any person. The President of the Senate had no power to do it, because there was no law authorizing him to do it. The two houses had no power to do it, because there was no law authorizing them to do it. It was a part of the Constitution, which had not been carried into operation by legislation. Now, Sir, is it true that for 84 years Presidents were counted and inaugurated without authority of law? That would be a very great discovery, if it were true. It would show that the men who made the Constitution did not understand it. I believe that they thought the first President, and all succeeding Presidents, were counted in and inaugurated according to law. They may have been mistaken; their opportunities for knowing what the Constitution is were not so good as ours. I suppose they undoubtedly believed that the votes were properly counted for George Washington, John Adams, Thomas Jefferson, and so on. I believe that this power is located somewhere, that if it does not rest with the President of the Senate, it belongs to the two houses. It is in one place or the other. But whatever may be the location in theory, that the two houses cannot exercise this power without legislation I think is correct. I think the Senator from Vermont occupies a sound position in that respect, and whatever we may say in regard to the duty of Congress to legislate, and considering that as I have done heretofore and have presented bills to the chamber upon that hypothesis heretofore, yet that in the absence of legislation the President of the Senate must count the votes; that this result has not been necessary, but results from necessity to prevent a dead-lock, to prevent the Government from coming to a stand-still; that until legislation has been had under which the vote can be counted by the two houses, or providing some tribunal for it, the President of the Senate must count the vote, and the vote was counted for 72 years upon that theory. If that theory was not correct, then it was unlawfully counted without authority, and for three-quarters of a century this Government proceeded illegally. Chancellor Kent stated the law on this subject, as I think it has been generally understood, in Congress, and out of it, until recently. The President of the Senate, on the second Wednesday in February succeeding every meeting of the Electors, in the presence of both houses of Congress, opens all the certificates, and the votes are then to be counted. The Constitution does not expressly declare by whom the votes are to be counted and the result declared. In the case of questionable votes and a closely contested election, this power may be all-important, and I presume in the absence of all legislative provision on the subject, that the President of the Senate counts the votes and determines the result, and that the two houses are present only as spectators, to witness the fairness and accuracy of the transaction, and to act only if no choice is made by the Electors. Now, conceding, as Chancellor Kent seems to do, that there may be legislation on the subject—a doctrine to which I have subscribed—yet, in the absence of legislation, the President of the Senate must count the votes, to prevent the Government coming to a halt; and he has counted the vote for 84 years—at least for 72 years, from 1789 until the time of the adoption of the 22d joint rule. I do not intend now to go into an argument as to the right of the President of the Senate to count this vote under the power of Congress. I am simply stating what I have heretofore understood to be the general doctrine—that in the absence of legislation the President of the Senate must count this vote; that if now we fail to agree upon a bill, we should simply leave this question where it has been left for 84 years, and that the President of the Senate, in counting this vote, would be guilty of no greater usurpation than he has been guilty of for three quarters of a century. We are discussing this bill in the presence of a case; we are discussing it in the presence of an actual condition of things. I shall be anxious to have a full bill adopted; I was exceedingly anxious to agree with the committee in the recommendation of a fair proposition, but when we are preparing a bill in the presence of a case made up, ready to be tried, the paper will signed and in due order, I insist that it shall be a fair bill, under which the condition of things shall not be unfairly changed. As I said before, I believe Rutherford B. Hayes is elected President, elected upon the papers, elected under every form of law; that he ought to be inaugurated, and that he must be inaugurated, unless a bill shall be passed which shall allow him to be counted out in defiance of the well-settled principles of law.

CONGRESS NOT AUTHORIZED TO DELEGATE ITS POWER.

I am not well enough, Mr. President, to go into the question to-day as I should like to do. I wish to say a few words in regard to this bill. If the power to count this vote is vested in the two houses, and is not in the President of the Senate, then the duty must be performed by the two houses. It cannot be delegated. This was the precise point, as I understand it, of the argument of the Senator from Vermont, because if he were to admit that the power is vested in the two houses under the Constitution, he would be compelled to admit, good lawyer as he is, that that power cannot be delegated. But by placing it as a floating power, that is, located nowhere until it is located by an act of Congress, then Congress would have the right to deposit this power with a commission. The commission created is a mixed commission, partly inside and partly outside—five Senators, five Representatives, and five Judges. The Judges are taken, not because they are Judges, not because they are members of the Supreme Court, but because they are men of eminent character who happen to occupy that position. Four of them are chosen by circuits. The Senator from Vermont hardly did himself justice on Saturday, when he argued that they were chosen by circuits on account of geographical distribution. They were chosen by circuits, as I understand it, not because of geographical distribution, but because of the political antecedents of the men who preside in these circuits. When the bill, instead of naming the Judges, names the circuits, it presents a harmless little sham that deceives nobody. Four Judges are taken by the bill because of their political antecedents; two on each side. In other words, the four Judges are selected upon political grounds, equally divided, it is said, in order to make the bill a fair one. Nevertheless, a selection is made in the Supreme Court on political grounds. If we are to deal with the Supreme Court—and I confess I looked upon that proposition with more favor than the other—I thought we ought to have taken the whole court, and not admit, by any form of provision, that we believed politics entered into the court; not divide it up on political grounds; not assume that the duties of that court are liable to be influenced by their political prepossessions; but take the whole court as a court. I thought that the least objectionable. It is true, the other day, when there was a Constitutional amendment here, referring this matter to the Supreme Court, I voted against it; but I did so chiefly because it re-enacted the Electoral College, and re-enacted an election of the President by the House of Representatives by States. But if we are to take an outside tribunal, it seemed to me far better that we should take the court, and take it as a court; take all the Judges, and not pick around among them to get an equal number on political grounds. I thought that was a blow at the court and would do it more injury than any course that could be taken. They are to take a fifth; four Judges are to select a fifth. Here is a very grave question prevented right at the threshold. What is the character of these Commissioners? Are they officers? They are sworn. The very highest duty is imposed upon them—the decision of the greatest case that can arise under our institutions. If they are officers, are they not to be appointed as other officers under the Constitution of the United States are appointed? Can we take four men by name and authorize them to appoint a fifth, and submit to this court, thus organized, this great case? Is it not a court to all intents and purposes? You call it a commission; but names are nothing. It is a court, invested with the very highest jurisdiction, to decide both law and fact, expressly charged with deciding the question. What are the powers of each or of both houses of Congress, and expressly charged with finding the fact as to who have been elected Electors for President of the United States. If it is a court, should it not be appointed as the Constitution requires other courts to be? And if these men are public officers, should they not be appointed as officers of the United States are required to be appointed?

A CONTRIVANCE, A PATCHED-UP THING.

This is a contrivance—to use the very mildest words—a contrivance; a patched-up thing. Five Representatives, five Senators, four Judges first, and they to choose a fifth; and thus this tribunal is to be created that is to make a President of the United States. There are no analogies for it in our Constitution, or in our laws, or in our history. We have had no tribunals made up in that way. If we were to make this tribunal exclusively in the two houses—make it consist of Representatives and Senators entirely—and stop there, the question would then arise. Can we do it? If the decision of this question belongs to the two houses, can you leave it to a few members of these two houses to agree to be bound by their decision? Can you pass a law in that way? Can you, by joint resolution or by law, authorize a conference committee to pass a law to make it binding unless it is reversed by a majority of both houses? Committees are but facilities of Congress, and their action amounts to nothing unless ratified by Congress. The decision of a conference committee amounts to nothing in point of law until after both houses shall have confirmed its action; but here you create a commission partly of Senators, partly of members, and partly of the Judges of the Supreme Court; and you provide that the finding of that commission shall be valid unless reversed by a majority of both houses. Here is a clear delegation of power. If it were provided that the finding of that commission should be valid until confirmed by both houses of Congress, there would be no delegation of power. You could just as well provide that it should be binding unless reversed by two-thirds of each house, or you could provide that it should be absolutely binding and that there shall be no appeal at all. Here you create a court, and you give an appeal from this court, not to a higher court known to the Constitution of the United States, but you give an appeal to the Congress of the United States, provided that, if the appeal shall be sustained by both houses concurrently, the decision of the court below shall be reversed. I will say one word further in regard to the bill. It is a fundamental principle of law, in connection with the election of a President, in preserving and defining the rights of the States, that the action of the States shall be received unquestioned by the Congress of the United States, or by that power, whatever it may be, that shall count the votes, and any authority conferred upon this commission, or that might be conferred by an act of Congress upon the President of the Senate, or any other agency selected to go behind the Returning Board of a State and count the votes, would be, in my judgment, a gross violation of the spirit and letter of the Constitution, revolution, and the end of Presidential elections under our system.

THE JURISDICTION GIVEN BY THE BILL.

I wish briefly to call the attention of the members of the Senate to this bill. I speak of the jurisdictional part, of that part conferring jurisdiction upon this commission, and it is the vital part of the bill. We need not deceive ourselves for a moment about this business. We know that both parties are looking intently to that question, and at that particular point. We may affect to be oblivious of it here, but we understand that the decision of this Presidential question depends absolutely upon that question; for, if the principle shall stand, that the action of the State authorities—those who are appointed to count the votes and to say by State laws who are elected—Rutherford B. Hayes is elected, and Mr. Tilden cannot be counted in except by overturning that principle. It is all in that, and the able lawyers of the Democratic Party on this floor and everywhere understand that just as well as we do. I call attention to that part of this bill which gives the jurisdiction to this tribunal: "Every objection shall be made in writing, and shall state clearly and concisely, and without argument, the ground thereof; shall be signed by at least one Senator and one member of the House of Representatives before the same shall be received. When all such objections so made to any certificate, vote, or paper from a State shall have been received and read, all such certificates, votes, and papers so objected to, and all papers accompanying the same, together with such objections, shall be forthwith submitted to said commission, which shall proceed to consider the same, with the same powers, if any, now possessed for that purpose by the two houses acting separately or together." I may here remark that the bill proceeds upon a theory different from that of the Senator from Vermont in his argument. He assumes that the Constitution does not locate this power anywhere, but says it is to be located by law, while the bill goes upon the hypothesis that this power is located in the two houses, and that this commission shall have what the two houses have, more or less, "which shall proceed to consider the same, with the same powers, if any now possessed for that purpose by the two houses acting separately or together, and by a majority of votes decide whether any and what votes from such States are the votes provided for by the Constitution of the United States, and how many and what persons were duly appointed Electors in such States, and may therein take into view such questions, depositions, and other papers, if any, as shall by the Constitution and now existing law be competent and pertinent in such consideration." First, they are required to find what were the constitutional votes of a State. They are required to do a thing there which, in my opinion, the Constitution does not authorize, whether the power to count the votes be vested in the President of the Senate or in the two houses. They are required to find, for example, under that provision, whether the Electors were eligible or ineligible as to their qualifications; while I maintain there is no time or place under the Constitution, when the votes are counted, for an inquiry of that kind. The duty is short and simple. The President of the Senate shall open the certificates in the presence of the two houses, and the vote shall then be counted. There is but one thing to do, and that is to count the votes. There is no time, there is no place to try the eligibility of the Electors. Suppose it should be said, if you please, that the President himself, the candidate, is not a citizen of the United States, that he is not eligible to be elected, and that the charge should be made when the votes are counted. The candidate takes issue; he says he is a citizen, was born in this country; or he says he was 35 years old. That may be denied; an issue of fact arises. Can you try that issue, then? Will you count him out because you say he is not 35 years old, when he says he is? You cannot try that question of fact, then. Will you count him out because it is said he was not born in the United States? He says that he was; that there are those living who were present and can prove it. If that issue is made, you cannot possibly try it at that time. And so with regard to Electors. If they suggest that an Elector was not eligible—that he was Postmaster, if you please—he may deny the fact; he may insist on the fact that he had resigned before that time, and his resignation had been accepted. Is there any time or place there to try the issue of fact whether he was Postmaster or not? Whether he was qualified or not to become an Elector? No, Mr. President, whoever may count the votes, there is no time or place when you count the votes to try that question. The two houses are to come together; the President of the Senate is to open all the certificates. That does not mean every kind of certificate that may be placed in his possession. It does not mean any paper that may purport to be a certificate, but he is to open all the certificates from the Electors of the several States, and the votes shall then be counted. The votes in those certificates, be they good, bad, or indifferent; be they for an Alien, or be they for a citizen of the United States, as that time and that place, there is but one thing to do, and that is to count the votes. That the candidate is not qualified to be elected, it may be said, or that the Elector was not qualified to be an Elector, but you cannot try that issue of fact then and there. There is but one thing to do, and that is to count the votes. The President of the Senate has his duty, and that is to open the certificate that comes from the Electors of the States. He is not bound to open certificates from pretended authority, from outsiders, from persons unknown officially.

NO POWER TO GO BEHIND THE RETURNS FROM THE STATES.

I am going on a little further, Mr. President. This bill requires the commission to find the facts, whether these Electors were duly appointed. We will just put the word "elected" instead of "appointed;" for in this connection it means the same thing. They are required to find, Were these Electors duly appointed? They are not required to find whether they have been duly certified by the State authorities as having been elected; no, Sir; but they are required to find the fact, Were they duly appointed or elected? If it had said that this commission shall find how many Electors there were, and whether they were duly certified as having been elected by the State authorities, or the Returning Board created for that purpose, we could understand that; but they are required to find the fact as to who was elected, and thus, as I understand this bill, they are required to go behind the returns from the States. If it was intended that they should find who had been certified by the State as having been appointed or elected, that would be simple and easily understood; but the bill quietly and innocently requires the commission to find the fact as to who was duly elected. Then it provides that, for that purpose, they may therein take into view such petitions, depositions, and other papers, if any, as shall by the Constitution and now existing law be competent and pertinent in such consideration. Then it invites them to look at these papers, invites them for a purpose, and there can be no use in looking at them if the other principle of law is to be observed, that they are to be governed by the returns made by the officers of the several States. Now, Mr. President, I think I do the intelligence of these distinguished Democratic Senators but justice when I say that they would not go for this bill except that it gave them a chance for the only thing that can count Mr. Tilden in, and that is to go behind the returns. Outside of that he has no chance, no possible hope, and that these distinguished and eminent lawyers go for a bill which, at the very beginning, cuts off and shuts out this, their only hope, I must be excused for saying that I do not believe it.

Mr. President, I am not able to proceed further to-day.

A VOTE TO BE FORCED.

PASSAGE OF THE BILL IN THE SENATE EXPECTED TO-DAY—NO SPEECHES PREPARED AGAINST THE BILL—BUT IT WILL BE OPPOSED BY A FEW DETERMINED SENATORS—HOW IT WILL BE PRESENTED IN THE HOUSE.

Special Dispatch to the New-York Times.

WASHINGTON, Jan. 22.—The expectation of the managers of the compromise bill in the Senate is to have a vote at a not very late hour to-morrow, and to pass the bill. Mr. Bayard has the floor, and after him Senator Sherman will speak. It is expected Mr. Conkling will reply to Senator Sherman. The speeches are not likely to be very long, though the end of such a debate is apt to be extended in some unexpected manner. There is not now known to be a single speech prepared against the bill, though it is reported to-night that Mr. Blaine will oppose it. Thus far there are not more than 12 or 15 Senators declared in any way against the bill, while there are perhaps 10 or 12 who are uncommitted, but will probably vote against it. If the vote had been taken to-day there would probably have been a two-thirds majority. The persistent effort to read the bill a third time this afternoon, and thus prevent the offering of amendments, was an unusual proceeding in the Senate, where any rule or any act in the nature of a previous question has always been stoutly resisted. The opposition is growing. This is well understood, and it urges the committee, who have become wonderfully attached to their production, to speedily force the vote by any means. They will be able to do this, because many who will vote against the bill do not wish to conspicuously oppose it, and will satisfy their own views of their duty by simply recording themselves in the negative. The debate will begin in the House to-morrow, and the committee proposes to have the Senate bill sent to the House, so that when the previous question is called on Wednesday, it may be upon concurrence in the passage of the bill. It still remains true that the opposition is of a kind that cannot be well measured, and that there is the possibility of an unexpected development of strength which may defeat the bill.

THE DEMOCRATIC CAUCUS.

AN INHARMONIOUS GATHERING—DAVID DUDLEY FIELD'S BID FOR EMPLOYMENT—AN OLD-FASHIONED DEMOCRATIC ROW.

Special Dispatch to the New-York Times.

WASHINGTON, Jan. 22.—The Democratic caucus held this afternoon, immediately after the adjournment of the House, was not so harmonious as was anticipated. Mr. Lamar called the gathering to order, and Mr. Payne, of Ohio, Chairman of the House Committee on the Electoral count, offered a resolution that it was the sense of the Democracy that eminent counsel be employed as soon as the bill creating the tribunal to supervise the Electoral count should pass, to prepare and present the Democratic case before the tribunal. Mr. Payne presented a few points in behalf of his proposition, but Mr. David Dudley Field was its principal advocate. He very earnestly indorsed Mr. Payne's proposition, but, assuming that the bill would pass, he thought that counsel should be employed at once. He contended that there was no time to be lost, and that the counsel employed would need every day that could be spared from their other duties, from now to the meeting of the tribunal, to prepare the case. He thought the best lawyers of the land should be at once engaged and set to work. The proposition did not seem to strike the caucus very favorably, however, for it was without further debate referred to the Standing Caucus Advisory Committee of thirteen.

After this disposition had been made of Mr. Payne's proposition, a resolution was offered which, in effect, was that the bill prepared by the Joint Committee on the Electoral Count was against all Constitutional methods and precedents for determining this matter, and, therefore, the Democracy of the House were committed against it. This proposition raised a tumult, and various motions were made, half the caucus being on their feet at the same time. The efforts of the mover to be heard in behalf of his resolution were utterly futile, as the large majority of the caucus were endeavoring to stifle any adverse expression in relation to the work of the joint committee. One prominent member of the caucus, when asked what was done at this point, said that "the noise was so great that he could not hear." He said, however, that there were things said and done that should not go before the public. In the midst of the disturbance it was suggested that there should be no party action on the bill, and that every man should act as his judgment dictated; that the policy of the party, as well as the friends of the bill, was against taking any action that would savor of dictation to any man in either house who felt inclined to oppose the bill. With this idea pending the caucus adjourned in great confusion, to meet at the call of the Chairman. The proceedings of the caucus have been very carefully guarded, and every effort made to keep all information from the press. It is understood, however, that it was Bright, of Tennessee, or Knott, of Kentucky, who offered the obnoxious resolution which caused so much commotion in the caucus. It is stated to-night, on good authority, that there will be no more caucusing by either party until after action on the bill.

TILDEN'S PARTY FAVOR THE BILL.

IT HAS THE APPROVAL OF THE JOINT CAUCUS COMMITTEE — WHAT PROMINENT DEMOCRATS HOPE FOR.

WASHINGTON, Jan. 22.—It can be stated that the bill has the approval of the Joint Caucus Committee, heretofore appointed to look after the several interests of the Democratic Party. This committee consists of Messrs. Randall, A. S. Hewitt, Wood, Lamar, Watterson, Sparks, Atkins, Warren, Payne, and Holman, of the House, and Messrs. Thurman, Bayard, Stevenson, Eaton, and Bogy, of the Senate. Several prominent Democrats to-night say that the bill will certainly pass both houses in the form reported, and it is known that the President will promptly approve it.

VIEWS OF THE STATE LEGISLATURE.

OPINIONS OF MEMBERS OF BOTH HOUSES PRETTY FREELY EXPRESSED—THE REPUBLICANS IN THE MAIN OPPOSED TO THE CONGRESSIONAL MEASURE—NOT A COMPROMISE, BUT A CONCESSION—GENERAL CONCURRENCE IN SENATOR WOODIN'S RESOLUTION—VIEWS OF DR. HAYES, THE ARCTIC EXPLORER.

Special Dispatch to the New-York Times.

ALBANY, Jan. 22.—Senator Woodin's resolutions on the counting of the Electoral vote are the special order in the Senate for to-morrow morning. Whether the compromise plan of the Congressional Committee now under discussion in Washington will cause a postponement of the resolutions, or in any way affect the action of the Senate upon them, is uncertain. Mr. Woodin has not yet returned from Auburn, whither he went on the adjournment last Friday, and only 11 of the 15 Republican Senators were in their seats this evening. All of them on being questioned expressed their approval of Woodin's resolutions and their intention to vote for them, but three out of the 11 were, nevertheless, inclined to favor the plan reported from the Congressional Committee, in the absence of any legislation on the subject. The Republicans in the Senate, and, for the most part, in the Assembly also, are of the opinion that the Vice President has the right to count the vote and declare the result, without interference from either house of Congress; but some of them think that inasmuch as Congress has gone so far as to propose a compromise plan, which has been put before the country and meets with the approval of a large portion of the business community, it may perhaps be better to adopt it.

Senators Harris, of Albany; Vedder, of Cattaraugus, and Sprague, of Erie, say that in view of these considerations, if they were in Congress they should support the plan of the committee. Senator Robertson expresses himself decidedly opposed to it. "If I have a coat," said he, "that belongs to me, I do not see why I should take it off and arbitrate as to its ownership."

Senator Cole, of Orleans, said that while he, with everybody else, would be glad to see a speedy adjustment of the dispute over the Presidency, yet he could not see how the plan proposed was going to help matters. In his opinion it was unconstitutional. He believed the President of the Senate had the power under the Constitution to count the votes and determine the whole question. If he were in Congress he would vote against the proposed plan. He did not regard it as a compromise, but as a concession by the Republicans of a clear constitutional right; a concession which, if the Democrats had the Presidency at the Senate, they would never think of making.

Senator Selkreg said he could give his views in four words: "I am against it." Senator Doolittle, of Oswego said: "I am opposed to it. I am in favor of the acting Vice President counting the vote and declaring the result, as the Constitution requires him to do." Senator Sayre, of Utica, said: "I am opposed to it and in favor of the views expressed in Mr. Woodin's resolutions." In answer to a question as to how the Republicans of Utica, the home of Conkling, regarded the plan, he said that so far as he had heard them express their views, they were generally opposed to it. Senator Moore, of St. Lawrence, said: "I am opposed to it, and if I were in Congress I would vote against it. I do not think Congress has any power to delegate such authority to a committee."

Senator Carpenter, of Dutchess, said: "I do not take any stock in the plan. I am opposed to it, decidedly. I shall go for Mr. Woodin's resolutions, and only wish they were stronger. Senator Harris, of Albany, said that while he had not a particle of doubt that the President of the Senate has the right to count the vote and declare the result without any interference from Congress, yet the question had got into such a muddle, and there so many conflicting opinions about it, that he was inclined to favor the plan proposed as the easiest way of ending the controversy. Senator Coleman, of Troy, said he had not made up his mind on the subject. He wanted to read all the speeches in Congress upon it before he could say whether he approved of the plan or not.

Among the Senators absent this evening, Messrs. Woodin, Prince, McCarthy, and Madden are known to be decidedly opposed to the Congressional plan. Indeed, all of the Republican Senators approved of the Woodin resolutions when they were introduced, and whatever change has taken place since the report of the Congressional committee relates solely to the expediency of adopting the compromise, in view of all the facts, and not to the constitutional right of the Republicans to insist upon the Vice President counting and declaring the vote, without interference.

Of the members of the Assembly who have been spoken to on the same subject, those who declare themselves for various reasons against this proposed compromise are Mr. Alvord, Judge Hogeboom, Mr. Stephenson, and Mr. Suydam, of Brooklyn; Mr. McFalls and Mr. Lang, of St. Lawrence; Mr. Fish, of Putnam, Mr. Graham, of Orange, and Mr. Brown, of Cayuga. Those who would vote for it are Mr. Post, of Cayuga, and Mr. Baker, of Washington. Mr. Sloan is in favor of the compromise for the same reasons as those expressed by Senator Harris. Mr. Husted declines to say how he stands.

Dr. Isaac I. Hayes, the Arctic explorer, strongly objects to the plan agreed upon by the committee. He holds the President of the Senate is alone empow

ALBANY.

LAST EVENING'S SESSIONS.

THE SUPERINTENDENT OF PUBLIC WORKS BILL—DUTIES OF THE OFFICE—FORTNIGHTLY RETURNS FROM LIFE INSURANCE COMPANIES—COST OF TABULATING THE CENSUS—A STATEMENT OF BONDS ISSUED BY THE CITY OF NEW-YORK ASKED FOR—PUNISHMENT OF POOL-SELLERS.

Special Dispatch to the New-York Times.

ALBANY, Jan. 22.—The Assembly held a two hours session this evening. Mr. Baker, Chairman of the Canal Committee, presented a bill relative to the office of Superintendent of Public Works. It fixes the salary of this official at $6,500, and that of his deputies at $3,000 each. The Superintendent is charged with the duty of making all purchases of materials for repairing the canals, and of seeing they are maintained in good order. He appoints foremen to take charge of the various sections of the canals, and the foremen hire the laborers and watchmen. At the end of every month the foremen make out a detailed statement of wages, which is sent by the Superintendent to the State Controller. All bills for every purchase, &c., also go to the same officer. All payments are made through the Canal Auditor, who appoints paymasters. These paymasters are authorized to go to places where breaks in the canal have occurred, and pay for the extra labor on the spot. New constructions are only to be made after authorization by the Legislature, and upon surveys made by the State Engineers. The salaries of employes are fixed by the Superintendent, subject to the approval of the Canal Board. The office of Superintendent of Canal Repairs is abolished.

Mr. Fish introduced an important resolution, calling upon Life Insurance Companies of the State to report to the Assembly within 15 days the amount of all moneys loaned on real estate, where such real estate is situated, when such loans were made, the amount of interest paid thereon from the date of the loans, and the amount of interest defaulted thereon. Mr. Spinola offered an amendment to include the amount of counsel fees paid to or received by the counsel of such companies on every loan made. Both the resolution and the amendment went over under the rule. Mr. Case presented a bill fixing the pay of Presidential Electors at $15 per day and 10 cents per mile allowance. The Secretary of State, in reply to a House resolution, reported that the cost of tabulating, &c., the last State census would be $87,000. The cost of this work for the census of 1865 was $64,000, but the census now required double the amount of labor. Every effort was being made to secure entire accuracy, and he was using the same methods as were used in the compilation of the United States census.

The House then went into Committee of the Whole and disposed of the following bills:

Requiring life-saving apparatus at sea-bathing places. Ordered to a third reading.

Fixing the compensation of the Deputy State Controller and other officials of the Controller's office.

Also, to pay the expense of the Court of Arbitration of the Chamber of Commerce.

Mr. Alvord moved to strike out the item of $13,000 to the Court of Arbitration.

After some discussion Mr. Ruggles moved that the committee rise, which was carried.

The Committee of the Whole took up the bill to regulate the execution and transfer of negotiable paper given for patent rights. Ordered to a third reading.

The following are among the bills introduced:

By J. G. Post—To compel railway companies to provide and keep in repair snow-plows.

By Mr. Maynard—Amending the Revised Statutes relative to divorces so as to prohibit judgment in cases of divorce for adultery until satisfactory proof is given by the plaintiff that no judgment or decree has been obtained by the defendant in any court, and that there are no like proceedings in any court.

By Mr. Gallagher—To provide for an additional District Attorney for Erie County, which gives the District Attorney authority to appoint, and directs the Board of Supervisors to fix his compensation.

By Mr. O'Hara—To authorize a recovery for printing and stationery furnished the Government of the City of New-York. It provides that the claimants may recover judgment notwithstanding their bills were not audited by the Board of Assistant Aldermen, providing it is proved that the printing and stationery were properly ordered and furnished. The sum to be recovered shall not exceed the sum of $1,576 53.

By Mr. Davenport, providing for the appointment of a Superintendent of the Poor of Oswego County to keep the Poor-house.

By Mr. Welsat, amending the law of 1876 making appropriations for the support of the Government. It proposes to strike out the appropriation for a trigonometric and topographical survey of the State.

THE SENATE.

In the Senate the following bills were introduced:

By Mr. Sayre—Authorizing Utica to borrow money for Police purposes; also, relative to the Rector of St. Luke's Church, Utica.

By Mr. Sprague—To confirm the official acts of the Real Estate Commissioners of the Young Men's Association of Buffalo.

By Mr. Gerard—For punishing defaulting trustees, executors, administrators, and guardians.

By Mr. Carpenter—Relative to claims against the City of New-York. The bill proposes to amend chapter 536 of the laws of 1867, as follows: No judgment in actions upon contract made in 1866 shall be entered by default or otherwise, in any court, against the Mayor, Aldermen, and Commonalty of the City of New-York, except upon proof in open court that the amount sought to be recovered in said judgment still remains unexpended in the City Treasury, to the credit of the appropriation for the year 1866, for the specified object or purposes upon which the claim sued for is founded.

Mr. Carpenter introduced another bill which proposes to amend chapter 379 of the laws of 1860, by directing that it shall not apply to any proceeding of the Mayor, Commonalty of New-York City for an injury to or claim affecting real estate, or damages in respect to the same if situated beyond the bounds of the City of New-York.

By Mr. Schoonmaker—Relative to pools and the registering of bets. The bill provides for punishing all persons found guilty of selling betting pools or keeping houses for that purpose, by a fine not to exceed $2,000, or by imprisonment for one year, or both.

Mr. Morrissey offered the following resolutions:

Resolved, That the Controller of the City of New-York be requested to report to the Senate within 10 days the following facts:

First—The bonded indebtedness of the City of New-York, specifying in detail each issue separately and with reference to each class, giving the date of issue, the law or laws under which issued, the amount outstanding, the date due, the rate of interest, and for what of the classes of bonds specified the revenues or sinking fund of the City are pledged.

Second—As near as can be conveniently ascertained the amount of the claims outstanding against the City disputed by the local authorities.

Third—The amount of the sinking fund of the City, specifying of what securities such sinking fund consists, giving such details that they may be identified whenever they are a portion of the bonds reported as outstanding under the first inquiry above.

Fourth—The amount and classes of the bonds of the City outstanding, and not already in the sinking fund, for the redemption of which the revenues or sinking fund of the city are specifically pledged.

Fifth—The outstanding assessments upon real estate unpaid, but constituting subsisting liens upon the property, omitting those where the amounts of the assessments have been realized by the city by a sale of the property.

Sixth—Approximately the amounts which the city has advanced upon uncompleted contracts or public improvements in progress upon which assessments can be hereafter imposed.

Seventh—What important works are now in progress or authorized by law, the expense of which is paid or authorized to be paid from bonds other than assessment bonds, and under what laws are they progressing, and what approximately will be the further amount required to complete them.

Mr. Morrissey said he desired to learn the correct amount of the indebtedness for the purpose of taking such legislative action as will allow the funding of the debt. Mr. Selkreg offered the following:

Resolved, That the Superintendent of the Department of Insurance be requested, in case the New-York Equitable Insurance Company, has filed a regular report of the bonds and mortgages held by it Dec. 31, 1875, to communicate that fact to the Senate; but if such report has not been filed, that he be further requested to immediately demand of the officers of said company, a prompt and full compliance with the statute regulations upon this branch of their duty. Adopted.

CLINTON COMMANDERY BALL.

The annual reception of Clinton Commandery, No. 14, Knights Templar, took place at the Brooklyn Academy of Music last evening, and was a brilliant affair. The parquet was floored over and covered with a rich carpet. A profusion of flags and banners gracefully arranged formed the principal decorations. At 10 o'clock the Knights went through a military drill in a manner that elicited much applause from their guests. After the drill the dancing commenced and was kept up until an early hour this morning.

NEW-JERSEY LEGISLATURE.

BOTH HOUSES RECONVENED LAST EVENING—A NUMBER OF BILLS INTRODUCED—THE GOVERNMENT OF JERSEY CITY.

Special Dispatch to the New-York Times.

TRENTON, Jan. 22.—Both houses of the Legislature reconvened this evening, and crowds interested in the Senatorial contest have gathered in the city from all parts of the State. In the House, a large number of bills were introduced, but they were mostly of a local character. One, directly aimed at the local Government of Jersey City, repeals all acts and parts of acts now in force which provide for the establishment of Commissioners, who are Republicans, and transfers all this power now exercised by the several Boards of Works, of Police, and the Fire Board, to the Board of Aldermen, whose acts, to be effective, must first be approved by the Board of Finance. The law at present in force requires the approval by the Mayor of all the resolutions and ordinances of the Aldermen. The Aldermen of the two parties are a tie. The Finance Board is Democratic. The bill was introduced by Mr. Drohan, who is himself a member of the Finance Board. The rest of the bills introduced are of no special interest.

LOVERS' QUARRELING.

A SING SING SCHOOL-MASTER ATTEMPTS SUICIDE—HIS INTERVIEW WITH MISS ANDERSON NOT SATISFACTORY.

William S. M. Ryder, a well-known resident of Sing Sing, on Sunday evening attempted to commit suicide by shooting himself in the region of the heart with a revolver. It appears that for some time past Ryder, who is engaged in teaching school with his brother Daniel B. Ryder, on Central avenue, Sing Sing, has been paying his addresses to Miss Mary E. Anderson, who, up to a recent period, had been employed as teacher in the public school in that village. Since her resignation of that position Miss Anderson has resided with some relatives in Harlem, but occasionally visited Sing Sing. It was generally understood that she was engaged to be married to Ryder. About two weeks ago she arrived at Sing Sing and took up her abode with the family of Mr. Leander Fisher, a clothier of the town, with whom she is connected by marriage. Since her arrival at Mr. Fisher's she has been repeatedly visited by Ryder. On Sunday afternoon he called and walked out with her, returning in time for supper. After tea they were left alone in the parlor, and about 7 o'clock Mr. Fisher, hearing the report of a pistol, entered the apartment, and was astonished to find Ryder lying on the floor with a pistol wound in his breast. Both Ryder and Miss Anderson refused to give any explanation of the affair, and a messenger was immediately dispatched for a physician, who extracted the ball which had penetrated the body to within one inch of the back.

Ryder was then removed to the residence of his mother, where he now lies. He declined last evening to make any statement in reference to the affair. The residents of the village believe that Ryder proposed to Miss Anderson, and that, while she did not absolutely refuse him, she declined to give him a positive answer, and that in a moment of rage he drew his revolver and shot himself. Early yesterday morning Ryder expressed a wish to see Miss Anderson, and in compliance therewith she called at his mother's residence. After a brief private interview she left and returned to New-York.

A PECULIAR CASE OF GRAND LARCENY.

A gentleman who gave his name as A. D. Owen, accompanied by his wife, called at the First Precinct Station-house last evening and informed Sergt. Cain that there was a young man in Brooklyn named William Bennett, of No. 693 Fulton street, who had stolen from them in Ohio a silver watch and some clothing. A detective found Bennett, at the number given, employed as a clerk in a hat store. He acknowledged the theft, and said it had occurred at a town in Ohio, the name of which he did not remember. The Owens, he said, traveled about in a wagon collecting rags, in which they dealt, and he was in their employ. After he had left, Mrs. Owens wrote to him, and as he alleges, asked him to elope with her to New-Orleans. Several letters passed between them. The Owens informed the Police that they did not want to prosecute Bennett, as they had to start for Columbus, Ohio, this morning. Neither Owen nor his wife, both of whom were well dressed and apparently well educated, look like people whose occupation was traveling around the country. The case is a peculiar one, and some interesting developments may be made when Bennett is taken before Justice Walsh to-day. Detective Curran learned that Mrs. Owen carried a formidable-looking dirk-knife in an outside pocket. Bennett left Ohio on the 21st of August.

SENATOR BAILEY OF TENNESSEE.

In responding to a serenade in Nashville on Friday night, Hon. James E. Bailey, United States Senator-elect from Tennessee, said: "Called to this position in a time of extreme peril to the Republic, when the gravest questions are agitating the minds of the people; when section is arrayed, in some degree, against section; when partisan feeling reaches its highest expression, I feel the grave responsibilities resting upon me. But I will say to Democrats and Republicans that, in my seat in the Senate of the United States, I will endeavor to represent, not the Democratic Party, not the Republican Party, but all the people of my native State. [Applause.] It is true that I will endeavor to carry into effect the principles of government, the tenets maintained by the Democratic Party, for it is by that method, I believe, that the greatest good of the greatest number of the people of the United States, but in doing that I will endeavor to do injustice to none. Democratic principles contemplate justice to all. I will weigh every question and give it my calmest consideration, and endeavor to do my whole duty, not only to my fellow-citizens, but to the people of the entire country. Grave questions have been presented for the determination of the Congress of the United States, temporary in their character, but still calling upon the whole country to exercise the utmost forbearance; calling upon your statesmen now assembled at Washington to exercise the greatest and most cautious deliberation; calling upon every man of every party in the country to exercise the broadest and most charitable feeling, that these grave questions may be settled for the lasting good of the Republic. As one of the arbiters, I will endeavor to execute justice, in the presence of my God and my country; I will endeavor to decide upon these questions in such a manner as will bear the light of future history. But there are questions beyond the questions of the hour that may be settled to-day. I believe that there is patriotism and virtue, and there are those qualities in the movements and efforts of the American people that will relieve us of the present crisis and carry us safely down to the great future. That future will present for determination every question of national policy as relating to economy, as relating to questions of finance, as relating to the revenue of the Government of our country. These matters I will endeavor to consider, so as to carry out the principles embodied in the teachings of the Democratic Party, and in this I can only say to you I believe I will represent the true interests of every man of Tennessee. [Applause.] Let me say, fellow-citizens, I do not propose to represent Tennessee alone, but while representing Tennessee, I will also represent the people of the whole country, and in that capacity I endeavor to discharge my duty to the whole country, looking to the utmost of my ability, only to the interests of the United States."

A YOUNG GIRL USES A PISTOL.

The Dayton (Ohio) Democrat of Saturday describes this street incident in that city: "Thursday evening appears to have been prolific of pistol practice by ladies who sought to protect themselves from the assaults and insults of loafers. An hour or two after Frankie Morris' shooting affair on Fifth street, two young ladies, while passing the corner of Third and Sears streets, were accosted by a number of loafers with, as they claim, indecent language. The ladies screamed for assistance, when one of them, named Mary White, was struck by one of the party of roughs. She is a plucky little lady, and promptly pulled her little pistol and fired into the mob, but, we are informed, did not hit any of them. The young women then were permitted to proceed without further molestation. The names of the mob who figured in this case have not been obtained, but the officers are on the alert."

A SAMOAN PRINCESS' HEAD-DRESS.

Speaking of the return of United States Consul Griffin as Commissioner from Samoa, the Louisville Commercial incidently says: "Among the curiosities which he brought home was the head-dress which the Princess Lonoluno, niece of one of the ex-Kings, is to wear when she is married. It consists of a band to fit the head, to which is attached a profusion of white satin-like ribbons, of about a foot in length, made of the skin of the cocoanut between the meat and the shell. It is a head-dress which one of our belles would not disdain to wear, and is a marvel of skillful fabrication. It is to be carried back to Samoa. Mr. Griffin describes this Princess as a beautiful maiden of 18, of fair complexion, with large, lustrous eyes, a profusion of long, soft, black hair, and a most musical voice."

THE COMPROMISE SCHEME.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR.

THE PROPOSED SURRENDER.

To the Editor of the New-York Times:

The Republican Party, embracing as it does the wealth, the intelligence, and the patriotism of the country, are the friends of peace, and they dread internal dissensions, revolution, and civil war. Consequently, Republicans everywhere, while mindful of their rights and the requirements of the Constitution, are prepared for any sacrifices to preserve the peace of the country.

The Democracy, on the contrary, composed as it is of those who were recently in open rebellion against the Union; of those who sympathized with the rebellion, and of the ignorant, reckless, and unscrupulous of all nationalities, desire nothing more than change and the spoils of office. Consequently, they openly threaten civil war, if they be not permitted to override the Constitution and inaugurate Tilden as President!

This constitutes the crisis; and to avert it, and to secure peace and revive the business interests of the country, the Republicans in Congress gravely propose to trample upon the Constitution, the constitutionally defined duties of the President of the Senate, and the action of the Electoral Colleges, by a device which, seemingly non-partisan, yields everything to the threats of the Democracy, thrusts aside the legally and constitutionally expressed will of the people and their choice for the Presidency, and places Mr. Tilden in the Presidential chair—and all from fear of the Democracy!

What are we to do? We cannot surrender our judgments in regard to the plain requirements of the Constitution, or our convictions that Rutherford B. Hayes is the President-elect or the United States; and if called upon, in the interests of peace, to yield to threats of violence, let us at least demand that our sacrifice be open and above-board. Let it be understood of all men that we make the craven sacrifice demanded with our eyes wide open. Let the title of the bill introduced by the Joint Committee be changed to what it really is, viz.:

"A bill to repudiate the Constitution in relation to the election of a President—to violate the constitutional rights of the President of the Senate—to usurp by Congress the election of the Chief Executive, and to declare Samuel J. Tilden President of the United States."

Let this be done—let the naked truth be fearlessly proclaimed—and I, too, am ready, in the interest of business, to become a craven, and yield to the threats of violence which appear to have wrested from the Republican Party all its manhood and all the patriotism which so recently punished as rebels the very men before whom we now quail.

Pass the bill reported—and what then? When the Oregon trick comes up for legislative—not for constitutional—action, and the five members of the commission appointed by the Senate will vote to give its three Electoral votes to Hayes, and so will the two Republican Judges. At the same time the five members of the commission appointed by the House and the two Democratic Judges will give one of those Electoral votes to Tilden. What next? Why, the Supreme Court Judge selected by his four colleagues on the commission will elect the President of the United States, and may well look for a reward!

And so with every other question which may arise. The Constitution, recognizing the difficulties incident to the very state of affairs which now exists, wisely selects, not an individual, but the incumbent of the second office in the Government, to act in such a contingency. This was done 82 years ago; but, because the incumbent of that high office happens to be a Republican, behold, the Congress of 1877 proposes to select some other individual, to pacify the warlike Democracy by giving them the Presidency.

There is absolutely nothing new in this bill. In 1801 the House of Representatives made a similar attempt to trample on the Constitution and to grasp the power, then and forever, to elect the Chief Magistrate. In that case, however, the grand committee was to consist of six members from each House instead of five, and it was ultimately killed in the Senate.

On that occasion Charles Cotesworth Pinckney, a Senator, one of the most distinguished and purest men of the revolution and a member of the convention which framed the Constitution, held the prophetic language we give below.

Query—Can Grant sign a bill the provisions of which he believes to be unconstitutional? If so, what becomes of his oath of office?

Extracts from Mr. Pinckney's speech in the Senate in 1801:

"If it is necessary to have guards against improper elections of Electors, and to institute tribunals to inquire into their qualifications, with the State Legislatures, and with them alone, rests the power to institute them; and they must exercise it. To give to Congress, even when assembled in convention, a right to reject or admit the votes of States, would have been as gross and dangerous an absurdity as the framers of the Constitution never could have been guilty of. How could they expect that in deciding on the election of a President, particularly where such election was strongly contested, party spirit would not prevail and govern in every decision? Did they not know how easy it was to raise objections against the votes of particular elections; and that in determining upon these it was more than probable the members would remember their sides—their favorite candidate, and sometimes their own interests? Or must they not have supposed that in putting the final and ultimate decision of the Electors in Congress, who were to decide irrevocably and without appeal, they would render the President their creature, and prevent his assuming and exercising that independence in performance of his duties upon which the safety and honor of the Government most feverishly depend?

They well know that, to give the members of Congress a right to give votes in this election, or to decide upon them when given, was to destroy the independence of the Executive and make him the creature of the Legislature. * * * *

If a minority in a particular State find that the candidate they have successfully supported is the favorite one with the majority of Congress, or their committee, they will easily discover the means of raising objections to the validity of the return of the Electors, insist that they themselves are elected, proceed to the length of the meeting and voting, and transmit to Congress a double return. * * * *

Why should we suppose that the Congresses which have preceded us did not understand this subject as well as we do, or any that may succeed us. * * * *

And here, Sir, let me ask whether from a Congress thus ably formed, and from an Executive thus discerning and independent, as much knowledge of the Constitution, its precise directions, and the agency it intended Congress to have in counting the votes and declaring the President, were not to have been expected as from the present? Were not the then Executive, and a number of the members of both Houses, members of the convention which framed the Constitution, and if it failed not to give Congress or authorize them to delegate to a committee of their body powers contemplated by this bill, could the Congress or the President of 1792 have been so extremely uninformed, and indeed ignorant of its meaning and of their duty, as not to have known it?

THE "COMPROMISES" OF THE PAST.

To the Editor of the New-York Times:

So ably has the lately adopted method of settling the Presidential question been analyzed, in its legal and constitutional aspect, through your editorial columns, that anything further in that direction would seem unnecessary. But to those to whom the experience of the past is a guide for the future, it will stand condemned without reference to its legal defects. Once more it brings before the country that hateful word "compromise," the practical meaning of which has been the giving of something for nothing—the yielding to great wrong for the maintenance of a little right. It has been believed for the last 20 years that compromise was one of the lost arts—a system in which the party of freedom in the North, as opposed to the slaveocracy and their Democratic hirelings, have stood in the attitude of a simple countryman to a professional trickster, and that no Republican, bearing in mind the facts of history, and with any regard for his reputation for intelligence, could be brought to utter the word.

Our first great compromise was in 1820, viz.: That Maine, which could by no possibility be other than free, should be admitted, and that Missouri, in which, from its position, freedom and slavery stood an equal chance, should come in as a slave State, thus waiving the rights of freedom where she had a good claim as an equivalent for recognizing them where there could be no possible dispute. To make this compact look respectable, a guarantee was given that slavery should never have any rights in the then unsettled territory which afterward developed into the States of Kansas and Nebraska.

Later on, at the close of the Mexican war, inaugurated simply for the purpose of carving out another slave State, when California was organized, and the spirit of the people was so determined that she forced her way into the Union as a free State, thus disappointing the slave-holding Democracy of their anticipated prize, that looked around for another "compromise." It culminated in the measure known as the "Compromise of 1850;" otherwise the Fugitive Slave act, which at one time all those State rights for which the Democracy now argue so vehemently, and made every State in the Union practically slave territory. What concession the North received in this "compromise" no one could ever find out, unless it was that the South would graciously permit California to remain free after her status had been established beyond recall.

But a short time passed when that territory which had been guaranteed to us by the compromise of 1820 (Kansas and Nebraska,) reached a condition to fit it to apply for admission in the form of States, and after a most violent attempt to force them in with slavery, the Nebraska bill—another "compromise" measure—was passed, by which the North was conceded the privilege of fighting the battle over again for the possession of what was already hers by previous agreement. Is it possible that any Republican in this country can utter the word "compromise" without feeling that he insults the common sense of the Northern people? The only other compromise since then was the famous Crittenden compromise at the beginning of the rebellion, by which the Government was coolly asked to waive its authority and yield possession to insolent force. That compromise, luckily, was not agreed to.

And now, after all this experience, we have made another compromise, by which we inaugurate a beaten party, throw away the results of a victory won in the face of appalling obstacles, and consent to throw the decision into an arena in which chance—if not something worse—is likely to have a predominating influence. E. M. G.

NEW-YORK, Saturday, Jan. 20, 1877.

IS IT A "SELL OUT?"

To the Editor of The New-York Times:

The demoralization of the Republican members of Congress upon the question of counting the Electoral vote is the most extraordinary spectacle of this eventful era. How many of the recognized leaders of the party can consent to ignore the constitutional precedents which have ruled on this question is amazing; but one conclusion can be arrived at by an outside observer; that they have been captured by the Treasury. The "salary grab" covered its perpetrators with lasting contempt. It is not too much to assume that should this iniquitous bill pass, its supporters will have sealed their political doom, not, indeed, for appropriating the nation's money, but for a more dangerous and unpardonable invasion of the constitutional rights of the people. Cannot the passage of this bill be delayed until the people can express a common-sense view of this issue, and show our legislators that the constitutional result is demanded, and that no temporary expedient will obviate the difficulties of the situation, but rather increase them? The crisis is alarming, and calls for prompt action from all who would avoid a dangerous precedent, that may have in its train greater evils even than the terrible war, too readily ignored by political leaders. F. G. W.

CONGRESSIONAL USURPATION.

To the Editor of the New-York Times:

Permit me to suggest that one point in the consideration of the Electoral Compromise bill seems to have been overlooked; at least I have not seen it in print.

The Vice President of the United States by the Constitution is elected by the people, is not a Senator, nor, except as ex-officio "a member of Congress." The fact that the present is an accidental incumbent does not alter the rights and duties pertaining to the office. What power or authority, therefore, can Congress, particularly the House of Representatives, dictate to him, an elected executive officer of the Government, how he shall perform the duties prescribed for him by the Constitution for the performance of which he has given his oath, or take away from him his right to perform them. His prerogative seems to be completely ignored. What if he should refuse to be governed by the dictates of the committee when rendered? The Democratic writers have for years "howled" against the tendency toward "centralization" of power in Congress. What do they call their present claim? RIGHT.

CHRISTIAN WORK.

TWENTY-FOURTH ANNIVERSARY OF THE YOUNG MEN'S CHRISTIAN ASSOCIATION—REPORT OF THE WORK OF THE PAST YEAR—ADDRESSES BY REV. FREDERICK COURTNEY, REV. DR. BEVAN, AND OTHERS.

The twenty-fourth anniversary of the Young Men's Christian Association was celebrated last evening at the Association Hall, on East Twenty-third street, in the presence of a very large audience. Among the prominent gentlemen upon the platform were Peter Cooper, Gen. T. V. Johnson, Frederick Marquand, Rev. Dr. John Hall, S. B. Schieffelin, Rev. Dr. Rogers, Hon. Salem H. Wales, Norman White, William F. Lee, Percy R. Pyne, Lewis E. Jackson, George W. Abee, and Judge Van Voorst. The exercises were opened with an address by Mr. E. B. Monroe, who presided in the absence of William E. Dodge, Jr. The Treasurer's report, which was read by Mr. Cornelius Vanderbilt, Jr., showed that during the last year the association had received $26,531 64, and had disbursed $26,345 32, leaving a balance in the treasury of $186 32. Mr. R. R. McBurney next read the report of the year's work. It reviewed the Hippodrome meetings of last year under the conduct of Messrs. Moody and Sankey, and the International and State Young Men's Christian Association's work, and gave the following interesting facts: $691 82 were raised and sent to Savannah for the relief of the sufferers by yellow fever. Five hundred and twenty-five volumes were added to the library, and 29,618 books were taken from the shelves at the call of readers, being 3,000 more than during 1875. Three hundred and eighty-seven papers have been kepton the files, representing the English, German, French, Spanish, Italian, and Danish language. Libraries free to members have been maintained in German, French, Spanish, penmanship, book-keeping, phonography, vocal music, and gymnastics. The average attendance at these classes was 270, while the average daily attendance at the gymnasium was 250. The library has distributed papers, magazines, and illustrated weeklies to 28 Army posts and naval stations. The average attendance at the Bible class conducted by Prof. William H. Thomson, M. D., on Sunday afternoons was 652. Fourteen lectures were delivered on Friday evenings, with an average attendance of 940. Twelve receptions, with entertainments, were given during the year, with an average attendance of 1,307 each evening; 55,535 invitations have been distributed by the Invitation Committee to young men to attend the religious meetings at the rooms; 1,234 young men have been admitted to membership; 695 young men, representing 23 nationalities, have been in attendance for situations; 66 per cent. of whom were of English-speaking nations; 66 per cent. of the English-speaking applicants were born in the United States and the rest were from Great Britain and Canada. Fifty-four per cent. of the whole number of applicants were under 25 years of age, 29 per cent. were between 25 and 35 years of age, and 17 per cent. were over 35 years of age. All these were counseled and assisted in their efforts to find work. At the Bowery branch, organized for the more needy and destitute men, 8,941 free lodgings were furnished to 1,230 different men; 39,998 meals were given away; 55,197 meals were sold at five cents each; 2,777 men placed in situations. At the railway branch in the Grand Central Depot dinner was given on Thanksgiving and Christmas days to 300 railroad employes connected with the roads running into the Grand Central Depot. Nine hundred religious meetings have been conducted by the Association in the Central building. Subscriptions to the amount of $900,000 have been secured toward the payment of the mortgage debt of $150,000 on Association building on Twenty-third street, and for the further extension of the work of the Bowery branch.

After the singing of the anthem, "America," Rev. Frederick Courtney, of St. Thomas' Church, was introduced, and delivered a very interesting address to the young men present. There was, he said, a singular correspondence between the Old and the New Testament in their allusions to young men. While the writer in the Old Testament said "the glory of young men is their strength," the writer in the New Testament, in something of the same strain, said "I have written unto you, young men, because you are strong." After speaking of the meaning of these Biblical references, he referred at some length to the importance of young men cultivating their physical, mental, moral, and religious strength. One of the most peculiar things he had noted in America was the very general disposition of different classes to ride in the street cars, even if they have to go only a block or two. They seemed adverse to the healthy practice of walking and taking outdoor exercise, which contributes to the glory of their physical manhood. It showed that a dangerous tendency of taking the least amount of trouble and hoping to accomplish the best results was creeping in among us, threatening to injure our activity and energy.

After singing, and addresses by Mr. John E. Parsons, and Rev. Llewelyn D. Revap, of the Brick Church, the audience were dismissed by the benediction pronounced by Rev. John Hall.

ASSAULT ON A TEAMSTER.

William Brown, a teamster in the employ of William J. Winges, provision dealer of No. 60 Washington street, Hoboken, was seriously injured yesterday afternoon. He was driving a sleigh through Willow street, when a number of boys jumped on it and attempted to put Brown off. Brown stopped the sleigh, and one of the boys picked up a large brick and hurled it at him. The brick struck Brown on the head, and he fell out of the sleigh. He was taken to a drug store, where he was attended to by Dr. Condon, who pronounced him to be in a dangerous condition. The Police were notified, and became convinced that the boy who threw the brick was Thomas Walsh, who was subsequently arrested, and frankly admitted that he was the one who threw the brick. He was held by Recorder Bohnstedt to await the result of Brown's injuries.

FORTY-FOURTH CONGRESS.

SECOND SESSION.....Jan. 22.

SUMMARY OF THE DAY'S PROCEEDINGS.

In the Senate a certificate of the election of Mr. Rollins by the New-Hampshire Legislature was presented. A bill was introduced to grant Mrs. Gen. F. P. Blair, Jr., a pension. A bill was also introduced by Mr. Merrimon to provide for taking testimony by commissions, instead of sending committees of the Senate away from the capital for this purpose, and a resolution declaring it not within the lawful authority of the Senate to charge committees with duties to be performed away from the capital while the Senate is in session. Mr. Blaine appeared in the Senate and took the oath. The bill to provide a tribunal for counting the Electoral vote come up as unfinished business, and Mr. Morton spoke at length in opposition. Mr. Frelinghuysen spoke in favor of the bill. At the close of Mr. Frelinghuysen's speech, no other Senator taking the floor, the question was on the third reading of the bill. Considerable discussion ensued on the subject of pressing the bill to a vote, Mr. Sherman holding that a vote should not be pressed, while Mr. Edmunds urged that a vote should be taken to-morrow in order to give the House and the President time to consider the measure before acting on it. Mr. Sherman moved to go into executive session, which was defeated. Further discussion of the same character followed. At the conclusion, Mr. Edmunds again gave notice that he would have a vote taken to-morrow, and the Senate went into executive session, and soon afterward adjourned.

In the House, Mr. Frye introduced a bill to establish a court to try contested Presidential elections, to consist of the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court, with six District or Circuit Justices, to be selected by the Chief Justice. Mr. Hunter, of Indiana, moved to suspend the rules and pass the joint resolution to amend the Constitution so as to prohibit payment of rebel war claims, but the motion did not obtain the necessary two-thirds vote. Mr. Ashe moved to suspend the rules and pass the bill to repay North Carolina the proceeds of sales of cotton seized after the close of the rebellion, which also was lost. A message was presented from the President in answer to a resolution calling for copies of orders referring to the employment of troops in certain Southern States since August last. In transmitting copies of the orders the President gives the reasons for employing troops, all of which was in obedience to the Constitution and the election laws. Mr. Wood offered a resolution for a committee to inquire whether there was any exercise of authority not warranted by the laws for which the President is justly responsible. Objection from the Republican side was overruled by the Speaker, but a vote was not taken and the matter went over till to-morrow.

SENATE.

The CHAIR laid before the Senate a certificate of the votes given in the New-Hampshire Legislature for E. H. Rollins, elected United States Senator from that State for six years from March 4, 1877, which was laid on the table. The credentials of Mr. Rollins were presented several days ago and placed on file. Also a telegram from the officers of the Chicago Board of Trade, transmitting resolutions adopted by the board on Saturday, approving of the bill reported by the joint committee in regard to counting the Electoral vote.

A PENSION FOR MRS. GEN. BLAIR.

Mr. COCKRELL, of Missouri, introduced a bill granting a pension to the widow of the late Major Gen. Francis P. Blair, Jr. Referred to the Committee on Pensions.

THE SENDING OF COMMITTEES ABROAD.

Mr. MERRIMON, of North Carolina, said recent experience had satisfied him that the practice of sending committees abroad is unwise if not vicious. It virtually deprived States of part of their representation. Recently the State of Wisconsin was without representation on the floor of the Senate when questions of great importance were under discussion. Twelve States had been deprived of half of their representation on this floor on account of Senators having been sent away on investigating committees. The practice also inflicted a Senator for business. During his absence he lost the run of business, and upon his return had to catch up. It also involved the expenditure of a vast amount of money unnecessarily. In his opinion, all testimony could be taken by a commission much better than by a Congressional committee. He was satisfied that one or two Commissioners in South Carolina could have taken the testimony in that State required by the Senate much better than the committee of the Senate, as the committee knew nothing of the local influences, character of the witnesses, &c. He therefore introduced a bill providing for taking testimony and collecting information to be used by Congress; also, a resolution declaring that it is not within the lawful authority of the Senate to charge committees of the Senate with duties to be performed away from the capital while the Senate is in session, both of which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

MR. BLAINE SWORN.

Mr. Blaine, of Maine, who was recently elected to fill the unexpired term caused by the resignation of Mr. Morrill, was escorted to the desk of the President pro tem. by his colleague, Mr. Hamlin, and the oath was administered to him.

THE COUNTING BILL.

The morning hour having expired, the Senate resumed the consideration of the unfinished business, which was the bill to provide for and regulate the counting of votes for President and Vice President, and the decision of questions arising thereon.

Mr. MORTON, of Indiana, spoke at length in opposition to the bill. [The speech is printed in full in another part of to-day's paper.]

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN, of New-Jersey, said, having been appointed a member of the special committee which framed the bill in regard to counting the Electoral vote, and having to the best of his ability discharged his duty, he felt he could not remain silent. While the reflecting and patriotic people of the country were interested in the measure to the extent that the dignity of the Government should be maintained, that an average attendance should be set, of 1,307 each evening; 55,535 invitations have been distributed by the Invitation Committee to young men to attend the religious meetings at the rooms; 1,234 young men have been admitted to membership; 695 young men, representing 23 nationalities, have been in attendance for situations; 66 per cent. of whom were of English-speaking nations; 66 per cent. of the English-speaking applicants were born in the United States and the rest were from Great Britain and Canada. Fifty-four per cent. of the whole number of applicants were under 25 years of age, 29 per cent. were between 25 and 35 years of age, and 17 per cent. were over 35 years of age. All these were counseled and assisted in their efforts to find work. At the Bowery branch, organized for the more needy and destitute men, 8,941 free lodgings were furnished to 1,230 different men; 39,998 meals were given away; 55,197 meals were sold at five cents each; 2,777 men placed in situations. At the railway branch in the Grand Central Depot dinner was given on Thanksgiving and Christmas days to 300 railroad employes connected with the roads running into the Grand Central Depot. Nine hundred religious meetings have been conducted by the Association in the Central building. Subscriptions to the amount of $900,000 have been secured toward the payment of the mortgage debt of $150,000 on Association building on Twenty-third street, and for the further extension of the work of the Bowery branch.

After the singing of the anthem, "America," Rev. Frederick Courtney, of St. Thomas' Church, was introduced, and delivered a very interesting address to the young men present. There was, he said, a singular correspondence between the Old and the New Testament in their allusions to young men. While the writer in the Old Testament said "the glory of young men is their strength," the writer in the New Testament, in something of the same strain, said "I have written unto you, young men, because you are strong." After speaking of the meaning of these Biblical references, he referred at some length to the importance of young men cultivating their physical, mental, moral, and religious strength. One of the most peculiar things he had noted in America was the very general disposition of different classes to ride in the street cars, even if they have to go only a block or two. They seemed adverse to the healthy practice of walking and taking outdoor exercise, which contributes to the glory of their physical manhood. It showed that a dangerous tendency of taking the least amount of trouble and hoping to accomplish the best results was creeping in among us, threatening to injure our activity and energy.

After singing, and addresses by Mr. John E. Parsons, and Rev. Llewelyn D. Revap, of the Brick Church, the audience were dismissed by the benediction pronounced by Rev. John Hall.

ASSAULT ON A TEAMSTER.

William Brown, a teamster in the employ of William J. Winges, provision dealer of No. 60 Washington street, Hoboken, was seriously injured yesterday afternoon. He was driving a sleigh through Willow street, when a number of boys jumped on it and attempted to put Brown off. Brown stopped the sleigh, and one of the boys picked up a large brick and hurled it at him. The brick struck Brown on the head, and he fell out of the sleigh. He was taken to a drug store, where he was attended to by Dr. Condon, who pronounced him to be in a dangerous condition. The Police were notified, and became convinced that the boy who threw the brick was Thomas Walsh, who was subsequently arrested, and frankly admitted that he was the one who threw the brick. He was held by Recorder Bohnstedt to await the result of Brown's injuries.

Electors was confided to the State, and Congress must accept the State's conclusion, just as the judgment of a court must stand. Congress could not be a grand returning board to investigate the votes of eight or ten million people. He denied that Congress had the right to go behind the Electoral certificate, and said the provisions of the Constitution were inconsistent with the idea that Congress could do so. He then spoke of the commission authorized by the bill reported by the select committee, and said it would have only such powers as were now conferred upon the two houses of Congress. He had no idea that the

LAW REPORTS.

A REMINDER OF TAMMANY RULE.

A BILL FOR REFRESHMENTS, GLOVES, AND CRAPE FURNISHED BY THE KEEPER OF THE CITY HALL TO THE COMMON COUNCIL.

A reminder of the manner in which Municipal affairs were conducted a few years since was afforded in the case of George W. Roome against the Mayor, &c., which came before Judge Donohue, in Supreme Court, Chambers, yesterday, on a motion by the plaintiff to have the case sent for trial before a Referee. Roome was formerly keeper of the City Hall, and sues to recover $8,584 for goods furnished at the order of the Common Council, as he claims, in 1870 and 1871. His bills were indorsed either by Alderman Ceman or by the latter and Alderman Dimond. The bill reads as follows:

To G. W. Roome, Dr.:
For refreshments furnished to the Common Council, on the occasion of the Review of the Societies on the 17th of March, 1871; also for firing the Salute; Stand, and Decorating the same, as per order of the Common Council..... $825 00
For Refreshments furnished the Common Council on the Reception of the Fenian Exiles at the City Hall by the Common Council. Also for Refreshments furnished on the review of the same by the Mayor and Common Council, as Order by the Joint Committee of the Feby..... $980 00
For refreshments furnished to the Common Council on the reception of Hon. William H. Seward at the City Hall as per order of the Committee..... 375 00
Also for refreshments on the 19th March, 1870, on occasion of the review of the society..... 250 00
For expenses incurred on the 4th of July, 1870, in furbishing flags, poles, and decorating the City Hall on that day and preparing for the fire-works in the evening, and other incidental expenses..... 975 00
For gloves, crape, and other incidental expenses incurred for the funeral of the late superintendent Jourdan by order of the Joint Committee of the Common Council.. 750 00
Same for funeral of the late County Auditor Watson as per order of the Joint Committee on the same..... 1,085 00
Same for funeral of the late ex-Alderman Florence Scannell, also for decorating the Chambers of the Board of Aldetmen in mourning, by order of the joint committee, 12th July, 1870..... 558 00
Same for funeral of their late associate Henry Rogers, and also for decorating the Chamber of the Assistant Aldermen and chair, by order of the joint committee, July 30, 1870..... 525 00

C. P. Miller who appeared for the City, opposed the motion for a reference. He said the case was an eminently proper one to go before a jury. The bills were never authorised by any resolution of the Common Council. They were simply bills for refreshments and gloves for funerals when any of the illustrious members of the Common Council died.

Judge Donohue—Whether this was only in the case of illustrious members.

Mr. Miller said it was also in the case of members not illustrious. The Aldermen in this way laid in their stock of Winter gloves.

The counsel for Roome, claimed, however, that the case was one which involved the examination of a long account, and therefore a proper one for a Referee to try. Judge Donohue reserved his decision.

PAULINE LUCCA'S DIVORCE.

The appeal in the case of Maria Pauline Von Wallhofen, better known as Pauline Lucca, against Messrs. Newcombe and Levestritt, was argued before the Supreme Court, General Term, yesterday, the decision being reserved. The plaintiff was formerly the wife of Count Adolph Von Rhade, and on March 10, 1873, entered into an agreement with the defendants, who are attorneys, by which, as she says, she agreed to pay them $1,000, and they agreed in consideration to procure her a decree of divorce from Von Rhade within three months, they to obtain the necessary evidence at their own expense. On the procurement of the divorce she was to pay them $2,000 in addition. She paid them $1,500 down, and they procured the decree of divorce on June 2, 1875. She then paid them the additional $2,000. On June 12, 1873, she married her present husband. On Aug. 12, 1873, her first husband, Adolph Von Rhade, came into court and asked to have the decree of divorce against him opened, and that he be permitted to defend the action in which the same was granted, after some grounds that he had not been duly served with process in the said action, that due opportunity had not been given him to appear upon the trial of the same, that no evidence in proof of the allegations of the complaint had been introduced, and on other grounds. The decree of divorce obtained against Von Rhade was amended, after some further litigation, so as to allow him to defend the action in which it had been obtained. On appeal Von Rhade was given the right to put in an answer to the plaintiff's supplemental complaint. It appeared that there were many, and, as is claimed, inexcusable defects in the divorce proceedings conducted by Messrs. Newcombe and Levinstrett, and the plaintiff therefore brought the present suit for damages which she had to pay to other counsel for correcting the defendants' blunders. Her complaint was dismissed by Judge Donohue, who said she had evidently come into this State on purpose to procure a divorce, and then to annul her. She now appeals to the General Term. Townsend & Weed appear for the plaintiff, and ex-Judge Cardozo for the defendants.

IMPOSING CONDITIONS ON SHIPPERS.

A rather important question is involved in the case of James Kirby against the New-York Central and Hudson River Railroad Company, which was tried before Judge Barrett and a jury in Part III. of the Supreme Court yesterday. It appears that the plaintiff some time ago undertook to ship 202 head of sheep from Buffalo to this City over the defendants' road. The company's officials insisted that before shipping them he must consent to consign the sheep to the Union Stock Yard and Market Company and sign a contract to that effect, across which the following words in red ink were written: "Subject to regular yardage charges as established by the Stock-yard Company." After some hesitancy and discussion, the plaintiff signed the bill of lading, making a protest, however, against being compelled to do so. He claims the right to consign the sheep to "Seymour & Co., New-York, care of James Kirby," he being a partner in the firm of Seymour & Co. On the arrival of the sheep in this City the plaintiff demanded them, tendering the freight charges, but was refused their delivery unless he paid $10 yardage. He now sues therefore brought the present action on the ground of the illegal conversion of the sheep. Seymour & Co., it appears, have a stock-yard of their own, and the present action was brought in part to test the question of the power of the railroad company to impose conditions on shippers. Judge Barrett held there was no such coercion in the present case, or such dread of irreparable injury as to make the contract entered into knowingly, though with protest, void. He therefore dismissed the complaint. Mr. Seymour, who head of the plaintiff's firm, has, however, brought an equitable action in regard to the same matter in controversy, to enjoin the railroad company from imposing such conditions. In this latter case a temporary injunction has been granted, and the trial of the case will probably be had in a very short time.

THE BOYD WHISKY CASE.

The case of the Government against the firm of F. O. Boyd & Co., dealers in spirits at No. 59 Broad street, came up again before Judge Blatchford, in the United States Circuit Court, yesterday, and was once more postponed. Gen. Tracy, of counsel for the defense, moved that the case stand over, and that the defense be allowed to move to quash the inquictment. Assistant District Attorney Sherman said that the indictment had already been sustained, whereupon Gen. Tracy held that the case should be adjourned for the present at least, in consequence of the fact that Mr. Boyd was wholly ignorant of the matters charged in the indictment, they having been exclusively in the hands of his partner, Mr. E. P. Hill, who is now confined to his room in consequence of an injury to one of his legs received from a fall on the ice. A certificate from Mr. Hill's physician was exhibited, but as it was not sufficiently explicit to satisfy the court, it was directed that the case stand over until this morning. When doctors is directed to appear and testify to the nature of Mr. Hill's injuries. The defense also raised an objection to the bill of particulars furnished by order of Judge Benedict, and the court ruled that it was deficient because it did not name the distillery in each of the five counts of the indictment, and therefore ordered an amended bill.

A JUDGMENT AGAINST THE CITY.

The case of Francis Sheridan against the Mayor, &c., was brought to trial before Judge Van Brunt and a jury in Part II. of the Supreme Court, yesterday. The plaintiff sued, as the Assignee of Morgan Jones, to recover $9,745 80 for the plumbing in the brown-stone Court-house in the City Hall Park and in the Ludlow street Jail, done in 1871. The bills for the work were audited by the Board of Supervisors. On the first trial of the case the City's defense was that the assignment by Morgan Jones to the plaintiff was fraudulent, and was made in order to prevent the City's setting up, by way of counter-claim, its claims against Jones. The jury found a verdict for the City, which the Court of Appeals recently reversed, holding that the assignment, being for value, was good, no matter what Jones's motives may have been. At the trial yesterday, Judge Van Brunt directed a verdict of $13,633 19 for the plaintiff.

A WIFE SUES FOR DIVORCE.

Mary Ann Devoe has brought suit in the Supreme Court for an absolute divorce from her husband, Isaac L. Devoe, on the ground of the latter's adultery. In her complaint the plaintiff sets forth that she was married to the defendant on July 3, 1843, and that they lived together until Jan. 1, 1874. She says he is and has been for three years living in adulterous intercourse with one Jane Turpenny. Mrs. Devoe made a petition to Judge Donohue in Supreme Court, Chambers, yesterday, in which, after stating these facts, she alleges that three children were born to them. Two of the children are of age, and the third is 16 years old. The latter is weak and sickly, and requires more than ordinary care and comfort. She says the defendant's income is $20,000 per year, and that after she separated from him he gave her $150 per month until March 1, 1876, when he reduced his remittances to $80 per month, and gave her the occupancy of the house in which she now resides. She asked that he be directed to pay her a reasonable amount, and to allow her to continue in the quiet possession of the house. The defendant failed to appear yesterday, and Judge Donohue noted the default.

AN AUTHOR'S COPYRIGHT.

THE RIGHT TO PLAY "DIE DANISCHEFFS" ARGUED BEFORE JUDGE DONOHUE—HOW COPYRIGHTS ARE PROTECTED IN GERMANY AND AUSTRIA.

Argument was had yesterday before Judge Donohue, in Supreme Court, Chambers, as to the propriety and justice of continuing the injunction obtained by Messrs. Shook & Palmer restraining Adolf Neuendorf, the proprietor of the Germania Theatre, from giving representations of the play of "Die Danischeffs." The plaintiffs claim they are the proprietors of the drama "Les Danischeffs," of which "Die Danischeffs" is a German translation. The play was written by Alexandre Dumas, and Mr. Costa, otherwise known as Pierre de Newsky. The plaintiffs say the play was copyrighted by its joint authors, and that no version or translation of it has been made public with their consent. Messrs. Shook & Palmer purchased the proprietary right in the play for $1,000 gold and royalties. In behalf of Mr. Neuendorf, the affidavit of Max Freeman, the Stage Manager of the Germania Theatre, was read. He avers that he has an intimate knowledge of European theatrical affairs, and is thoroughly conversant with the facts concerning "Die Danischeffs." In February, 1876, he was an actor in the Carl Theatre in Vienna, Austria, of which Mr. Janner is Director and proprietor. Janner has a contract with M. Dumas, under which the latter is obliged to furnish all the dramas written by him or under his name to Janner for performance and publication in the German language in Austria. In the latter part of 1875, when "Les Danischeffs" was produced at Paris, and the authorship of the play was publicly attributed to Dumas, Janner wrote to the latter requesting a manuscript copy of the play under his contract. Dumas replied, saying he had nothing whatever to do with the drama, that one Pierre de Newsky was the author, and that the Société Dramatique of Paris, of which Newsky was a member, had the exclusive right to dispose of it. Newsky, through the society, sold the right to perform and publish the play in Austria to Baron Schen, the President of the Stadt Theatre Society of Vienna, for 10,000 florins. The latter society caused a German translation of the French manuscript to be made, and after its production at the theatre had it published in the German language by L. Rosner. The copies were sold openly in the market in the same way as the other plays procured by Baron Schen. The laws of Austria are very strict against the infringement of copyrights, and under the Franco-Austrian treaty of 1866 French authors are given equal rights with those of Austria in the latter country. No infringement of the rights of French authors has occurred since the treaty, although nearly every dramatic novelty which appears in Paris is reproduced in Vienna.

An affidavit was also read from F. Kalenburg, who avers that the play "Les Danischeffs" was published in Berlin, where the laws are also exceedingly stringent in regard to violations of copyrights. There is but one means in Germany by which unauthorized publications are repressed. In Leipzic there is an organization named the "Stage Society Association," to which belong most of the dramatists whose works are published in Germany. It denounces publicly every violation of the right in literary property, and by its efforts the books of delinquent publishers are excluded from the book market. This method is efficacious in Germany, since the principal market there is at Leipzic, where regular sessions are held during the year, at which the booksellers make regulations for their conduct and these regulations have the practical force of law throughout all Germany. So effective are these rules for the protection of copyright that since the treaty between France and Germany in 1862, which secured the copyright of French authors in Germany, not one instance has arisen in which a French drama was published in Germany without the authority of the authors, although successful French plays are reproduced and published in Germany.

Ex-Judge Dittenhoefer argued in behalf of Messrs. Shook & Palmer, claiming that the publications of the play were all unauthorized. Henry Wehle spoke briefly for Mr. Neuendorf, claiming that the exclusive proprietary right in the play had been lost by the publications in Austria and Germany. Judge Donohue took the papers, reserving his decision.

A DIVORCED WIFE'S CLAIM.

SHE SUES FOR PROPERTY PURCHASED WITH HER MONEY AND GIVEN BY HER DECEASED HUSBAND TO HIS PARAMOUR.

Judge Speir, in the Superior Court, Special Term, yesterday rendered a decision in the case of Barbara Schreyer against Andrew Dettinger, Christine Brodie, and others, in which he overrules a demurrer by the defendants to the complaint on the ground that it does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action. From the facts in the case it appears that the plaintiff and one Philip Schreyer, now deceased, were married in 1858, and that two children were born to them. In 1860 they purchased a lot in this City, and the deed was taken in their joint names. The $3,000 consideration for the purchase was from the separate money of the plaintiff. A brick house was erected on the land, and has during the past three years yielded a rental of about $60 per month. In 1873 the plaintiff obtained a limited divorce from her husband on account of his cruel treatment of her, and by the terms of the decree he was ordered to pay her $7 50 per week for her support and for that of her children. This alimony her husband failed to pay, and the plaintiff brought proceedings to have sequestrated the rent of the house and lot referred to, and to have a Receiver of the same appointed. Her husband then, to prevent these proceedings, and also to relieve himself from them and from other proceedings to enforce the decree for the payment of the alimony, agreed to give the plaintiff a mortgage upon the premises for $2,500 for 10 years, and bearing interest at the rate of 7 per cent. per annum. In order to carry out this arrangement they got the defendant, Andrew Dettinger—a mutual friend—to intervene, and they jointly executed a conveyance to him of the premises for the nominal consideration of $1. Dettinger was to, and did, execute and deliver the mortgage mentioned, without any bond. Philip Schreyer, the plaintiff's husband, died in May last. Up to the time of his death, however, he received and appropriated the rents of the premises in question with Dettinger's knowledge and consent, notwithstanding the deed and mortgage. Schreyer himself occupied a portion of the premises, where he and the defendant, Christine Brodie, lived together as man and wife, though they were not married. A few days after the death of Schreyer, the woman Brodie presented for probate a paper purporting to be his last will. By this he left to this woman all his estate, including the premises conveyed to the defendant, Dettinger, and she was also made sole executrix. The plaintiff claims all these proceedings are a cheat and fraud upon her and her children. She asks that the conveyances referred to be set aside as void, and that the defendants be compelled to reconvey the premises to her and her children.

TWO GAMBLERS PUNISHED.

Joseph Lyons and Edward Saunderson, dealer and "steerer" for the faro den at No. 17 West Twenty-eighth street, which was recently raided on, were called up for sentence by Assistant District Attorney Rollins yesterday, in Part I. of the Court of General Sessions, having pleaded guilty several days ago. Judge Gildersleeve said that since the prisoners had pleaded guilty, he had been besieged by applications for clemency in their behalf. He had no doubt that they were men of excellent characters previous to their connection with this gambling operation, but, insomuch as they had offended against a law for which punishment of two years in the State Prison and a fine of $1,000 could be inflicted, he saw no reason why their offense should be dealt with differently from that of a thief or any other offender. Persons engaged in gambling had heretofore got off with punishments entirely inadequate to their offense, and when the last case came before him he had stated that he should, as he believed he ought in the discharge of his duty, deal with the next offense as with any other crime. The present offense, however, had been committed before that time; he therefore felt justified in imposing a lighter sentence than he otherwise would. The sentence of the court was that they each be confined in the Penitentiary for a term of six months, and pay a fine of $100. Lyons, who is a Brooklyn man, described himself as a produce dealer, and Saunderson as a printer.

A FEMALE BIGAMIST.

Maria Heuser, a most attractive-looking German woman, 35 years of age, was called up for trial on a charge of bigamy yesterday, in Part II. of the Court of General Sessions. It appeared that, the prisoner had been married to a widower named Anthony Borbee, living at No. 89 South Fifth avenue, on Dec. 3, by Rev. August H. Held, Pastor of St. John's German Lutheran Church. Borbee subsequently discovered that Miss Heuser had a husband still alive, she having been married to Charles Ritter on April 5, 1870, by Rev. Gottfredt Scheibel, whereupon he had her arrested and indicted for bigamy. Assistant District Attorney Bell, after a careful examination of the case, stated that the woman, having separated from her husband, had given a lawyer $25 to procure a divorce. The lawyer informed her that a divorce had been procured, which she, in her ignorance of the English language, believed, and considered herself at liberty to marry again. Judge Sutherland, said that under the woman's confession he had no alternative but to sentence her to one year in the Penitentiary. He would, however, lay the facts before the Governor, with a view of procuring her pardon, a proceeding in which he would be joined by Assistant District Attorney Bollins.

HOW A NEWSPAPER WAS RUN.

A TYPE FOUNDER'S SUIT AGAINST THE TRUSTEES OF THE REPUBLIC PUBLISHING ASSOCIATION—THE CASE GIVEN TO THE JURY.

The counsel in the case of David W. Bruce against Caleb C. Norvell, Edward B. Wesley, and T. C. Platt, summed up before Judge Van Vorst and a jury, in Part I. of the Supreme Court, yesterday. The jury, failing to agree, were locked up for the night. The action is against the defendants as the Trustees of the New-York Republic Publishing Association. This corporation sought, in 1874, to establish a newspaper called the Republic, but, after about three months' publication of the same, the association suddenly disbanded, leaving a number of unpaid bills outstanding, including debts due to editors, reporters, and others. Among the creditors was the plaintiff, who is a type founder, and supplied $5,189 49 worth of type. The type was seized by other creditors and sold. The plaintiff then brought the action for damages against the association itself, and recovered judgment for the full amount claimed. His judgment proved worthless, however, as there was no property for him to seize. He then brought the present suit, in which he seeks to hold the Trustees of the corporation liable, on the ground that they failed to file their report within 20 days after Jan. 1, 1875, and by such neglect rendered themselves personally liable, under the statute, for all of the debts of the corporation. Norvell makes really no defense to the action, but Messrs. Wesley and Platt do. Both claim that the goods were furnished at the order of Mr. Norvell before the certificate of incorporation was filed, and that therefore Mr. Norvell alone is liable. Mr. Wesley also claims that he resigned before the certificate of incorporation was filed, and that he agreed to become a Trustee only when $200,000 of the capital stock had been subscribed for, and $100,000 actually paid in. This, he claims, was never done, Mr. Platt claims that he never was a stockholder, and therefore could not be a Trustee. On the argument yesterday, William H. Arnoux, who appeared for the defendants, claimed that the corporation could not be in debt for the goods, since these were furnished before it had an existence. Mr. Norvell had not been authorized by either of the other defendants to buy goods on credit. Even if the corporation had been formed, no by-laws had been adopted, and Mr. Norvell could have had no authority to bind the corporation. On the other hand it was claimed that the goods were furnished to the corporation itself, and that the defendants were aware of the necessity of the type, and therefore knew that it had been furnished to the corporation. The testimony of Mr. Wesley was commented on with the view of impeaching the credibility of the witness. His pretended resignation as a Trustee was declared to be invalid, since it had not been regular, not having been seat in at any meeting of the Trustees. The counsel said that Messrs. Wesley and Platt went into the venture for the purpose of making money, if there was any to be made, at the same time shielding themselves from responsibility for the corporation's debts.

A READER OF THE TIMES INJURED.

The case of George L. Dale against the Delaware, Lackawanna and Western Railroad Company was argued on appeal before the Supreme Court, General Term, yesterday, the decision being reserved. It appears that in 1871 the plaintiff was a resident of Orange, N. J., and was in the habit of traveling to and from this City over the defendant's road. At Newark the railroad crossed over a bridge at Ogden street. Over the bridge the track curved slightly toward the south so that the cars in passing over swayed or inclined toward the southern side of the bridge. When the road was built narrow cars were run and sufficient space was left between the cars and the truss on the southerly side of the bridge. Broader cars were afterward run on the road. The plaintiff was on the cars on his way home one evening, and was reading an interesting paragraph in THE TIMES to his partner, and consequently on it. He was sitting with his elbow over the sill of the car window. As the car passed the bridge the plaintiff's elbow struck the truss, and his arm was broken. He recovered a verdict for $2,000, and the company now appeals, claiming that the plaintiff is responsible for his own negligence.

THE BOY ACROBATS.

The cases of the Ellis boys, the youthful acrobats who were taken from Alfred Smith, alias Leon, while performing in a circus at Poughkeepsie, were brought before Judge Donohue, in Supreme Court, Chambers, yesterday. The boys were taken in charge by the Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children. Their father, however, has now made application to have their custody given to him. He says he is both able and willing to take care of them, and offers to give guarantees that the boys shall not be employed as acrobats in the future. He claims that the society has no right to the custody of the children. After some argument the cases were adjourned until tomorrow, when they will be more thoroughly discussed.

A SUIT FOR DETECTIVE'S SERVICES.

The case of William M. Hall against William C. Templeton was tried before Judge Sheridan and a jury in the Marine Court yesterday. The plaintiff in the action sued to recover a balance of $165, with interest, for services rendered as a detective in obtaining evidence in the case of Duncan C. Templeton, the defendant's son, who was indicted in 1873 for shooting his wife in Eighth avenue. The defense interposed was that the plaintiff rendered the services gratuitously, the plaintiff and defendant having been intimate friends for more than 25 years. The jury gave a verdict in favor of the plaintiff for the full amount claimed. F. J. Dupignac appeared for the plaintiff and Samuel J. Crooks for the defendant.

DECISIONS.

SUPREME COURT—CHAMBERS.

By Judge Lawrence.

Trenton Banking Company vs. Duncan.—In this case I do not see the necessity for having the issues proposed tried before a jury; so far as I can discover those issues can be readily disposed of by the special Term, before whom this cause comes on to be tried. If when it is reached the Justice deems it proper to send the issues of fact before a jury, it will be competent for him to do so. (Brinkley vs. Brinkley, 66 N. Y. 192.) Motion denied.

Stapleton vs. Mallory.—The proposed order is broader than the decision.

By Judge Donohue.

Granted—Shaw vs. Stevens; Ross vs. Cross; McCaffe vs. Clifford.

Devoe vs. Devoe—Memorandum.

Goldsmith vs. Dailey—Cause set down on day calendar for first Monday of February.

Dana vs. Murray—Motion granted on payment of costs, with leave to plaintiff to discontinue.

Spring vs Murray—Motion granted on payment of costs, with leave to plaintiff to discontinue.

By Presiding Judge Davis.

Bogert vs. Bogert—Let an order be drawn simply directing that judgment be entered on the report of the Referee. Thereupon judgment will be entered on upon other Referee to hear and determine." The court finds no facts or conclusions of law; these are to be found in the report of the Referee.

SUPREME COURT—CIRCUIT—PART II.

By Judge Barrett.

McManus vs Reilly—Case and amendments settled, and charge corrected.

SUPERIOR COURT—SPECIAL TERM.

By Judge Speir.

Mears vs. Kearney.—Plaintiff is entitled to foreclosure of the note in question, with costs. Opinion.

Westerman vs. Remington, Jr.—I think this case is properly in a court of equity. It is possible some of the questions involved may be ordered to be tried by a jury.

Schreyer vs. Dittinger et al.—The demurrer is overruled, with costs, and leave given to amend. Memorandum.

Brust vs. Meyer.—Order discharging Receiver from his trust, &c.

Bell vs. Spotts.—Order advancing cause on calendar.

COURT NOTES.

William T. Williams, a Jersey City sneak-thief, who entered the room of Thomas Leary, No. 199 Washington street, and stole therefrom $36, pleaded guilty yesterday in Part I. of the Court of General Sessions. Judge Gildersleeve sentenced him, to one year in the State Prison.

The pleadings in the case of Charles Westermann against Thomas P. Remington, Jr., were filed in the Superior Court Clerk's office yesterday. The parties were formerly partners, but each is now charging the other with fraud, and both lay claim to $25,000 damages against each other.

Chief Justice Davis, in Supreme Court, Chambers, yesterday declined to sign findings of fact and conclusions of law in the Begert divorce case. He holds that this was the province of the Referee in the action, and orders the counsel to enter judgment simply on the Referee's report.

The suit of John Patten against the New-York Elevated Railroad Company was summed up by counsel before Judge Joseph F. Daly, in the Special Term of the Court of Common Pleas yesterday. Henry A. Cram argued on behalf of the plaintiff, and ex-Judge Emott performed a similar service for the defendants. Decision was reserved.

John Quinn, Henry Beekman, Christopher Smith, Patrick Brady, and Christopher Keenan, employes on board the steam-ship Montana, were arraigned at the Washington Place Police Court yesterday, on a charge of having assaulted a sailor named John Kelly, by stabbing him in the head, during a drunken quarrel on board the vessel. They pleaded not guilty, and were held to answer.

On the 8th inst. Benjamin F. Raynor, who gave his address as No. 192 Chatham street, entered the apartments of Sarah Reilly, No. 288 Front street, and stole therefrom clothing and other property valued at $26. On being called up by Assistant District Attorney Bell, in Part II. of the Court of General Sessions, yesterday, Raynor pleaded guilty. Judge Sutherland sent him to the State Prison for two years.

Assistant District Attorney Bell, in Part II. of the Court of General Sessions, yesterday, accepted pleas of guilty from Denis Donovan, of No. 653 West Forty-first street, and Patrick Lynch Laregy, of No. 164 Third avenue, in a drunken row at No. 103 Bowery, and John P. Sullivan, a seaman, who fired a pistol at a negro named Solomon Dean, wounding him in the side. Judge Sutherland sent each to the State Prison for one year.

Judge Lawrence, in Supreme Court, Chambers, yesterday denied a motion for the framing of issues in the suit of the Trenton Banking Company against Alexander Duncan and William D. Shipman. The plaintiffs in the case obtained judgment for $136,368 98 against the late firm of Duncan, Sherman & Co., and are now seeking to set aside as fraudulent the conveyance of property to Alexander Duncan which were put on record on the day before the firm's failure.

John Kelly, of No. 331 West Thirty-sixth street, and Edward Leonard, of No. 136 Henry street, two of a gang of four youths charged with breaking into the premises of Thomas Stanton, No. 307 East Twenty-fourth street, on the night of Nov. 2, and stealing therefrom property valued at $145, were tried before Judge Sutherland yesterday, in Part II. of the Court of General Sessions. The jury, being unable to agree, were discharged, and the prisoners remanded.

Before Judge Sedgwick and a jury, in Part I. of the Superior Court, yesterday, was begun the second trial of the suit of Shepherd F. Knapp, Receiver of the Bowling Green Savings Bank, against Walter Roche. The latter was Vice President of the bank, and is charged with having converted to his own use $66,200, for the recovery of which suit is brought. The defendant puts in a general denial. Develin, Miller & Trult appear for the plaintiff, and John T. McGowan represents the defendant.

In Part I. of the Court of General Sessions, yesterday, Thomas Welch and George Carroll, of Williamsburg, two mechanics who left the paths of honesty and commenced a criminal career by breaking into the warehouse of John Thornton & Co., No. 62 Walker street, and stealing therefrom 1,500 worth of pearl buttons, which were found in their possession, pleaded guilty. Judge Gildersleeve, in view of its being their first offense, sentenced them to the mitigated penalty of two years and six months in the State Prison.

Judge Van Brunt, in Part II., of the Supreme Court, yesterday ordered judgment for $2,600 for the plaintiff in the suit of Louisa Miller against Fidelia W. Hovey, Executrix. It appears that the plaintiff and her sister kept a boarding-house at Nos. 34 and 36 Bleecker street, at which the defendant and her deceased brother were boarding. The latter was a bachelor, and was in the habit of borrowing small sums of money from the plaintiff. On one occasion he borrowed $2,000, which the plaintiff obtained by selling some bonds. He made out a check for the plaintiff as a memorandum of the transaction, and died before paying the amount.

A BROKER'S COMMISSIONS.

The case of John C. Graff against Mary H. Field and her husband, William R. Field, was brought to trial before Judge Van Brunt and a jury in Part II. of the Supreme Court yesterday. The plaintiff is a broker, and claims that he was employed by Mary H. Field to negotiate an exchange of $48,000 of property. He says he succeeded, and that thereupon her husband brought him for his commissions a demand note for $1,000, made by her, and indorsed by him. Judge Van Brunt dismissed the case as to Mr. Field as having been brought prematurely. Mrs. Field put in the defense that the alleged exchange was no exchange at all, as the other party to the trade had not been able to give title to his property, and that the plaintiff knew at the time that the exchange was an impossibility. The case is still on.

YONKERS RELIEVED OF $10,000 IN TAXES.

Judge Dyckman has granted a motion to vacate the stay of proceedings recently granted by him in the case of the Board of Supervisors of Yonkers against the Board of State Assessors. Yesterday the Board of Supervisors met, and the writ of mandamus went into effect. The matter of crediting the City of Yonkers with the over-assessment of $10,000 was referred to a committee of that body, who will not make any report for several days.

The Senatorial advocates of the surrender plan of counting the Electoral votes show a natural anxiety to rush it through with as little delay as possible. The people are beginning to have a clearer perception of its unconstitutionality, and of the heritage of confusion and mischief which its adoption would entail. As will be seen from the opinion expressed by prominent Republican Senators at Albany, the opposition to the plan is gaining strength and decision among the members of the State Legislature. The same is true of other States, and, judging from the shoal of letters which we receive on the subject, public sentiment is rapidly assuming a tone of indignation over what is stigmatized as the craven course of sundry Republican leaders at Washington.

Before leaving office, United States District Attorney BLISS has commenced suit against SAMUEL J. TILDEN for arrears of unpaid income tax. We regard this as a manly and courageous act, for which Mr. BLISS is entitled to the respect of all honest men. However clearly he may have recognized the duty imposed on him to take such action, he might easily have left it, with all the misrepresentation and abuse which it will entail, to his successor. He has chosen to accept the responsibility and the odium of beginning the suit, and Gen. WOODFORD will find such a mass of evidence at his disposal that its prosecution will be easy. There has been a disposition of late to sneer at Mr. TILDEN'S perjury and tax-grabbing as mere campaign charges, to be quietly shelved after the election. When the case comes to trial, the Presidential Pretender and his friends will discover that neither SINNOTT'S pettifogging nor HEWITT'S bounce will be considered valid evidence by a United States Court. The books of the Pittsburg and Fort Wayne and other railroad corporations will convict Mr. TILDEN of defrauding the Government, even without the aid of his own, which will, no doubt, be conveniently missing.

An important witness came before the House Sub-committee on the South Carolina election yesterday. This was BEVERLY NASH, a colored member of the State Senate, and a Presidential Elector on the Republican ticket. He testified with great minuteness to a private interview with one Z. D. CHILDS, a banker in Columbia, at which the latter offered him $10,000 down and $40,000 when TILDEN was inaugurated on condition that he should vote for the Democratic candidate at the meeting of the Electoral College. It will be remembered that a rather more tempting offer was made to a Hayes Elector in Louisiana, and though the statement of Mr. NASH or gh't, of course, to be received subject to its possible disproof by the accused banker, there is everything to sustain its truthfulness in the character of the Democratic methods put in practice before and since the election. As in the case of the Oregon corruption fund, there can be but one opinion about the source whence the purchase money for Electoral votes was to be drawn.

The Economist, of London, has given us another illustration of the old maxim that we must go from home to hear the news. It informs us of "a policy of provocation deliberately adopted by the Republicans" to "drive the Democrats, especially the excitable and undisciplined members of that party in the South, to projects of violence and disloyalty," which policy has been defeated by the "singularly cool temper of the Southern Democrats," "warned by their sagacious Northern advisers." This statement is as correct as the definition of the crab as a red fish which goes backward. All the politics of everycation there has been has come from the Democrats; the Northern members of that party have been guilty of proclaiming it, and the Southerners have had to warn them to keep cool. The Economist has also discovered that the "Republican majority in the Senate will insist on rejecting at any rate the returns (which are in duplicate) from Louisiana and Florida" for the purpose of throwing the election of President into the House and that of Vice President into the Senate. This desperate plan, we presume, originated with that arch conspirator whom the Economist describes as "Mr. CHANDLER, the Secretary of the Treasury." If the editor of the Economist were caught blundering in this way about the affairs, let us say, of the Fiji Islands, he would be heartily ashamed of himself, and justly.

The charter amendments summarized in yesterday's TIMES will probably be introduced in the Assembly to-day. They embody all the reforms in City administration which have been ineffectually urged on the attention of the last two Legislatures, and they contain besides several new features of the most salutary character. It should be distinctly understood that the bitter hostility of Tammany Hall will be much less of an obstacle to the adoption of these reforms than the more potent opposition of City Republicans in league with Tammany Hall. There can be no question that the proposed changes will vastly simplify the cumbrous machinery of our local Government, to the great advantage both of its efficiency and cheapness. As such they will have the support of the great body of tax-payers, and will be resisted at every step by the hungry crowd of tax-eaters. Country Republicans should be cautioned against shaping their course on these amendments by the promptings of the patriots of the Police Board or their agents in the Albany lobby. The people of this City are sick of having their property virtually confiscated to sustain a horde of political jobbers and hangers-on, and every step of the course of a practical and sweeping measure of relief like the one in question will be narrowly watched. We can promise for the Republicans who may be disposed to do the dirty work of Tammany Hall in regard to these amendments all the publicity which our columns can give them.

We trust that at to-day's conference between the Mayor and certain representatives of the mercantile interests of the City, more attention will be paid to facts than rhetoric. There are a few plain questions which ought to be propounded to the Mayor, and to which plain answers ought to be given. It is admitted on all hands that the debt is already too large. How does Mr. ELY propose to check its increase and provide for its reduction? It is equally certain that taxation is too heavy. In what direction does the Mayor propose to economize? The pay of City laborers has been somewhat reduced, but the pay of clerks, court attendants, and petty officials of nearly all grades, remains as high as it was during the palmy days of the Ring. Does Mr. ELY favor immediate legislation to meet the whole question of reducing salaries? Does he propose to lend himself to the extravagant schemes of new street-openings, of up-town parks and boulevards, &c., which find so much favor in the Board of Aldermen? Is he prepared to enforce a more rigid standard of official accountability than his predecessor? If so, how does he propose to deal with the Police Commissioners who first invented a legal quibble to sustain them in refusing to clean the streets, and then found it necessary to squander public money in quarrying out masses of ice which their neglect had permitted to accumulate? Does he think that the payment by the same persons of some thirty patrolmen out of the proceeds of fines and penalties—which are pledged to the Police Insurance Fund—was a willful misappropriation of money, and if so what action does he propose to take in regard to the officials who were guilty of it? Other questions, equally seasonable and pertinent, will probably occur to some of the members of the deputation.

OPPOSITION TO THE COMPROMISE.

The scheme of Messrs. CONKLING, THURMAN, and EDMUNDS for submitting the late Presidential election to a commission, is not to go through without meeting some obstacles. In the House it is understood that the Republicans from Ohio, with two exceptions, have set on foot a movement for effective opposition, and they are reported to have the active aid of Senator SHERMAN, and their action is likely to have some effect in giving strength to others who think with them, but who have been hesitating what to do. Of course, it is natural that some special importance should attach to this movement because it begins with the representatives of Mr. HAYES' own State. But it is unnecessary to connect that gentleman with it, or to suppose that he has departed at all from the dignified and reserved course which he has so consistently held throughout this unfortunate dispute. The position of the Ohio delegation is sufficiently accounted for by the fact that the most prominent member of the delegation, Mr. GARFIELD, is a man of independent mind, profoundly versed in the history of the Government and in the principles and precedents by which the Constitution is to be interpreted. Mr. GARFIELD has, moreover, the power of logical and persuasive argument beyond any other Representative not distinctly connected with the commission scheme, and when he is found ready to take the post of leader it is not surprising that his immediate associates should show a good degree of courage and decision. We trust that the health of Mr. GARFIELD, which has been much impaired of late, will sufficiently recover to enable him to bring his full strength to bear upon the discussion of the compromise. We shall then have the satisfaction at least of knowing that the House cannot adopt so extreme and extra-constitutional measure without having its faults exposed; that it cannot follow the committee as blind men hurry after blind leaders; and that if a precedent which we deem to be so dangerous is to be established, the representatives of the people will at least be compelled to adopt it deliberately and after weighty warning.

In the Senate yesterday Mr. MORTON opened the debate in opposition to the commission project in a speech of characteristic energy and directness. He began by stating that he "had supposed that all agreed that, in the absence of legislation, the President of the Senate must count the vote." This is a supposition in which he was not without warrant in the current of opinion expressed in the debates of the last four years on this subject. In the discussion of March 13, of last year, Mr. MORTON stated his view very clearly. He said:

"If there are two sets of returns, and there is no means by which the two houses can pass upon them, who is to decide that question? We cannot read both sets; both cannot be counted, because the State can have but one vote, or series of votes, according to its population. Somebody must decide it. If the two houses do not decide it, the President of the Senate must decide it." (Record, 44th Cong., vol. iv., Part 2, p. 1,666.)

This doctrine was indirectly combated, and several Senators advocated legislation as necessary to avoid this mode of counting. Others, however, held the opinion stated with emphasis by Senator WHYTE, of Maryland, as follows:

"I differ with Senators who doubt for a moment that our fathers meant to have it in the power of the President of the Senate to open the certificates, to state the votes of the people of the States, and to declare what the people had determined should be in the future their will. I am surprised that we should stop here to-day to discuss the question whether we have a right by legal enactments to take away from the people that power put in the Constitution of the United States for their benefit, merely authorizing the Vice President of the United States to enunciate their will." "I do hold that the Vice President of the United States is the proper person to state which vote shall be counted, because the Constitution put it in his hands."—(Record, p. 1,670.)

Mr. MORTON yesterday restated this view, as far as it relates to what must be done in the absence of legislation, and reinforced it by precedents. Having thus shown that Congress is not driven by the want of a regular and constitutional method to adopt any plan not warranted by the Constitution, he turned his attention to the question of the power of Congress to refer the question to the proposed commission. He declared, and justly, that if the power to count the votes does not rest in the President of the Senate, it must rest in the two houses; and if it rests in the two houses it cannot be delegated. In this view of the case we venture to suggest to Senator MORTON that he has support from an authority which Mr. EDMUNDS would undoubtedly consider very high authority indeed, being that of the Senator from Vermont himself. On the 14th of March last an amendment to Mr. MORTON'S bill was introduced giving the House of Representatives, voting by States, the right to decide between returns where more than one was sent from any State. On this point Mr. EDMUNDS remarked:

"To say that we may, by law, (not in the exercise of our function to confer powers upon some judicial tribunal described in the Constitution to settle something,) confer powers upon a body not judicial and not legislative in a constitutional sense, is, to my mind, going entirely outside of any authority that we possess."

If Mr. EDMUNDS had been trying to describe in advance, and to condemn explicitly the proposition which he submitted to the Senate on Friday, he could not have done so more clearly than in the above quoted words.

Mr. MORTON will resume the debate this morning. We need not now point out in further detail the points of his argument, which will be found in full, as far as it has gone, elsewhere. It is evident that the friends of the plan for evading the Constitution are not to carry their bill by default. Meanwhile the opinion of the country is by no means steadily with them. It will be seen by our dispatches that the Legislature of Illinois has reconsidered its approval of the scheme. The sober second thought of the people is against it.

BUSINESS AND POLITICS.
